Jewish citizenship—using the word in the more extended sense—depended on compliance with the terms of the covenant. The sacred was here the basis of the civil; and they only who by circumcision had been received within the bonds of the covenant, and afterwards conformed themselves to the rites and obligations it imposed, were entitled to a place in the commonwealth of Israel. The place thus acquired might be again forfeited by committing those transgressions which had capital penalties annexed to them, and doubtless in all cases when these were incurred, and when no repentance followed, the guilty individuals were excluded in the reeking of Heaven; such souls, according to the oft repeated formula, were cast off from among their people. But if we look to the outward, or human administration, this result by no means uniformly followed; and men might be, too commonly were, recognized as members of the Hebrew commonwealth after they had broken some of its fundamental laws. The right of citizenship, therefore, would vary, according as it might be a human or a divine point of view from which it was contemplated.

In one passage—though the relevance is lost in our translation—St. Paul designates the place and calling of Christians from their connection with a city; he says, "our citizenship or commonwealth, for in one or other of those related senses must we render to be understood is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour" —that is, even now we have our names enrolled as members of that celestial community, of which Christ is himself the ever living Head, and it behooves us to act in accordance with the exalted position we occupy, and the animating prospect it sets before us.

CITY. This word is evidently used with some latitude in Scripture, so as to include the smaller towns, and sometimes even what must have been little more than struggling villages. For example, Cain is represented as building a city, 6:14; and Bethel, the ancient Luz, is called a city at the time of Jacob's passing sojourn in it, Gen. xlvii. These could then have been nothing but hamlets; and many similar cases might be referred to. Most commonly, however, the term was applied to larger places, and such as were surrounded with walls, strengthened at proper intervals by fortresses, and usually possessing besides a citadel or tower of greater strength in the centre. The cities of Palestine seem to have been commonly of this description, even so early as the conquest by the Canaanites; for the spies reported that their cities were "walled and very great," and Moses himself describes them as "great and fenced up to heaven." Num. xiii. 31. The gates in the walls appear to have been made of different materials, sometimes of stone, and sometimes of wattle, or burnt lime, which seems to imply that they were of wood, and sometimes they are said to have been made of brass. Acts vii. 49, 50.

The cities also differed very much as to the character of the streets; in most cases they must have been very narrow, while there were others, though we know of none such in the land of Canaan, which had large open spaces and ample gardens within their precincts. Babylon, in particular, is well known to have been of this description. But the distinguishing feature of each city will fall to be noticed in connection with the individual name.

City of David has a different sense in the New from what it bears in the Old Testament. By the angels who announced the birth of Christ, Bethlehem was called the City of David, Luke ii, as being the place where David had been born, and where he resided till he was anointed king. But the fortress of the Jebusites, which David took, and which he afterwards chose for his peculiar dwelling place, was by the name of his city, 2 Sam. xx. 1. It was more commonly called Mount Zion.

City of God was applied as a designation of Jerusalem, Ps. cxvii, on account of its being from the time of David the place where God more peculiarly put his name, and where the temple stood. The designation expressed its most glorious distinction.

of with respect, though he was a weak man, the tool of women and of favourites, and among some good things did many also that were bad. His name occurs only twice in sacred history; first in connection with a famine, which was felt with severity in the East, Acts 13:28, seq; and then as the author of a decree, which obliged all Jews to flee from Rome, Acts xviii. 2. In regard to the former, his reign was noted for the frequent occurrence of scarcity (Hardouin, Deichrich, and.); and in regard to the second, we have the express testimony of Suetonius, who in his life of this emperor (ch. 20) says, "He expelled the Jews from Rome, who were continually raising disturbances. Christus being their leader." (Immanuel Chresten.) It has commonly been supposed that by Caesars is here meant Jesus Christ, and that Suetonius having heard of the fame of Jesus, imagined he had something to do with the local disturbances which led Claudius to banish the Jews for a time from Rome, or possibly meant to state that the disturbances themselves arose from contending about the truth of Jesus. The point either way must still be held doubtful; but apart from it the passage contains a very explicit testimony to the fact recorded by St. Luke.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN are terms of frequent occurrence in connection with the rites and usages of the old covenant. Like everything there, while they have a primary bearing on the outward state and behaviour, they have also a higher and symbolical import. To get any distinct idea of the lessons intended to be conveyed by the arrangements respecting clean and unclean, it will be necessary to consider these in some detail.

1. The first distinction of the kind that meets us in Scripture is clean and unclean in respect to ANIMALS—animals, however, not in themselves, but in their relation to man's use. It appears so early as the deluge, and is referred to as an already existing distinction, not as one then for the first time introduced. Noah was commanded to take with him into the ark of every clean beast by sevens, and of the unclean by twos; for the reason, no doubt, that the one were required for purposes which the other were not, and which would render a single pair of each an inadequate supply for the necessities even of the small remnant of the human family preserved in the ark. These necessities, however, were not connected with food; for up till the period of the deluge there is no appearance of animal food having been either granted to men, or indulged in by them. Presently after the deluge, however, the liberty was conceded, and when first conceded, it seems to have been without restriction: "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you, even as the green herb have I given you all things," Genesis i. 30;—not a certain portion merely of the living creatures, but the whole, in so far as man might find it serviceable for bodily support. The grant itself was unlimited; it was left to mankind themselves to set any limits they might choose to its application. We must look elsewhere, therefore, than to dietary regulations for the original ground of the distinction among animals into clean and unclean, and what we can think of as nothing but the ancient usages in regard to sacrifice. Indeed, the sacred narrative itself plainly enough points in this direction; for it tells us that Noah, on coming out of the ark, "built an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar," Genesis viii. 20. The clean, therefore, were those deemed fit for sacrifice, the unclean such as were unfit.

As the origin of the distinction is lost in primeval antiquity, the principles on which it proceeded, and the lines of demarcation it drew, cannot be known with certainty. Our reasoning upon the subject must be to some extent conjectural. The history of the fall, however, forms the ground of a certain distinction in the animal world; the serpent being thenceforth pronounced accursed above all creatures, it could scarcely fail to be looked upon as the extreme type of an existing evil in nature—the palpable embodiment of something mischievous, and, as such, unclean, not to be brought into familiar contact with the pure and good. Observation and experience would seem to enable the earlier inhabitants of the world to add to the same class, according as indications were discovered of wild natures or noxious qualities in the different species of creatures around them. And though there might be many with which their acquaintance was made, distinguishing its category to which they properly belonged, yet we can easily understand how birds and animals of prey, creatures armed with fangs or other obvious weapons of offence, or animals like the swine, disgusting in their smell and filthy in their habits, would as by common consent be assigned to the class that had some affinity with evil, that bore on them the impress of impurity; while the tame and docile creatures of the ruminant species—the cow, the goat, the sheep—and in the feathered tribe the cock, the goose, and the swan, being connected with these naturally as reflections of the opposite qualities, because seeming to have something akin to the human instincts of mankind. Thus from the first there were found the occasion and elements of a certain distinction among the inferior creatures; and as animal sacrifice occupied the chief place in religious worship, the latter class of creatures, in which the good so obviously preponderated, would, as a matter of course, be deemed the proper materials wherewith to conduct the sacrificial service. Such a mode of thinking, in itself natural, would be greatly confirmed and rendered in a sense imperative, if—as there is good reason to believe—the Lord by an overt act laid the foundation of animal sacrifice, by himself taking the life of one or more animals, in order to provide a symbolical, as well as a real clothing for the first transgressors. (See SACRIFICE.)

The distinction thus begun, and probably at first confined within very narrow limits, was in process of time more fully developed, and extended from the institutions of worship to the articles of daily food. When the law entered, the scattered elements of sound thought and symbolical action which previously existed were in this, as in other departments of religion, fashioned into a regular system, so as to be made subservient to a properly varied and wholesome instruction. Probably little alteration was needed in regard to the victims for sacrifice, except to fix the line more definitely on the negative side between the clean and the unclean, as the general corruption of worship was in particular the practice, very early introduced, of sacrificing to evil as well as to benignant deities, had gradually led to the introduction of nearly all sorts of animals. In Egypt pigs were sacrificed as well as sheep and oxen, and not only geese and bulls, but also...
that lifts the several species mentioned somewhat above the crawling, slimy breed that are more properly comprised under the name of insects; and though even these allowed for use form very poor and many kinds of food, they yet want the filthy and repulsive character which attaches to the insect tribes generally.

Now, it is clear, on a moment's reflection, that whatever may have been the design of drawing such distinctions between clean and unclean in food, there was nothing ascetic in the matter: the object could not have been to make any material abridgment of the ordinary pleasures of the table. For, with all that was cut off, enough was still allowed to gratify every reasonable indulgence; in each department of animal existence the best, the most wholesome, the most agreeable to the palate were freely allowed. So much was this the case, that the view might with some appearance of truth be maintained as it has once and again been propounded, for example by Michaelis, and by Beards in Kitto's Cyclopaedia, which treats the regulations as in their main object a sanitary nature, restraining the covetous people from such articles of food as might tend to facilitate venereal and other diseases, and directing them to those which were suited to the climate and likely to produce cleanly habits and a beneficent husbandry. This might not unfairly be said, if one looked simply to the physical aspect of the matter, and made account only of the relation between the animal nature to be sustained and the animal food given for their nourishment. But in the revelations of God to Israel, and the institutions he set up amongst them, nothing bears this merely natural and economical character; all is pervaded by the ethical spirit, and ever aims at bringing into view the eternal distinctions between good and evil of a moral kind, of right and wrong. Nor did the Lawgiver leave it at all doubtful that such also was his object in establishing the distinctions between clean and unclean in food. For the things forbidden are not simply laid under an interdict as unlawful, but they are pronounced abominations. Defilement, not merely some certain or contingent uncleanness, should ensue on partaking of them, (Levi. xi), &c.

And not only so, but the reason of all the prohibitions respecting food is at the close traced up to the holiness of God, and the necessity of his people being conformed to his image therein. "Ye shall not make yourselves abominable, . . . for I am the Lord your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy, for I am holy; neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that crawleth upon the earth. For I am the Lord that beareth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God; ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy," (Levi. xi). What explicit intrusions, and strong inducements in regard to the connection between the dietary restrictions laid upon them and the moral character they were to maintain!—as if God would have no member of the covenant to be ignorant or unmindful of the relation in which all stood to holiness of heart and conduct.

We may not on this account require to overlook the propriety and wholesomeness of the restrictions in a dietary point of view; for here, as in many other respects, the moral may have based itself upon the natural, and the good in the one sphere served as a handmaid to point the way to a higher good in the other. But in regard to this higher good itself, we are not, like the Jewish doctors and their too numerous followers in Christian times, to think of the mere external separation which was to be maintained between Israel as a people on the one hand, and the different nations of the world on the other— as if Israel were isolated in the clean animals, Egyptians, Babylonians, Philistines, &c., in the unclean. For such a separation might have been kept up by mere diversity of custom, apart from anything essentially moral; and in itself was never set forth as an end to be aimed at, excepting in so far as it might be necessitated by the holiness of the one class and the unavoidable corruptions of the others. Otherwise than as a precaution for maintaining, or the means of exhibiting Israel's distinctive holiness, national isolation would have been an evil rather than a good; it could only have tended as was proved by the actual result—to nourish in the covenant-people a spirit of self-complacent pride, and shut them up in a hardened exclusiveness from the surrounding nations, to whom they were called to be a blessing. We must therefore look deeper to get at the true rationale of the matter. Corporeal things were here the ordained symbols of spiritual; and as in the one Israel had to look primarily to himself, so had he in respect to the other. The clean and the unclean in the animal world had its counterpart in his own soul; and the watchfulness and the care with which he had to guide his choice among the living creatures around him, that were fitted to minister to his support or comfort, must perpetually admonish him of the like watchfulness and care he should apply to the region of his spiritual being. There also he is constantly in danger of coming into contact with abominations which may leave the taint of impurity behind. He must know every day, every hour of his waking existence, to refuse the evil and choose the good; and he can do so, only by accepting that which the law of his God declared to be akin to his own moral nature, precisely as the same law prescribed what was most akin to his physical nature for the materials of his bodily food. Thus the things of the corporeal life were made to serve as an image of the spiritual, and the restrictions laid upon the appetite, when properly understood, became like a bit and bridle to the soul.

The view now given of the distinction between clean and unclean in food, is in perfect accordance with the use made of it in the vision of St. Peter, &c. When the door of entrance into the church of God was to be laid open to Gentiles as well as Jews—unclean—censed as well as circumcised—he was made to see a great sheet let down from heaven, filled with all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air; and heard the word addressed to him, “Rise, Peter; kill and eat.” His Jewish feeling led him instinctively to reply, “Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything common or unclean.” But the voice again rejoined, “What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common.” It is a superficial explanation of this parabolical vision to say, that it pointed directly and merely to the abolition of external distinction between Jews and Gentiles: which would imply, that the prohibition for long existing in regard to the eating of unclean things had no other end than the maintenance of such distinctions. Its immediate and primary object was to teach that the sanctification wrought by God was the grand thing, and that where this had been accomplished, all other things, as of inferior moment, must be regarded as of themselves falling into abeyance. The distinction between clean and unclean in food was itself but an imperfect mode of helping the true sanctification of men, and was hence destined to go into desuetude the moment higher means were brought to bear with effect upon the end in question. Hence the ready application of the principle to the case of Cornelius and his family. God puts his Spirit into them, and gives them the undoubted seal of salvation, while they are still outwardly uncleaned; but what of this? The end is already reached: the Lord himself has sanctified them; they have become under his own hand vessels of honour, fitted for the Master’s use; “What then am I that I should withstand God?” So the apostle reasoned with himself, and justly. He thought that if the spiritual reality were now secured by the direct action of the word and Spirit of God, there was no longer any need for the old fleshly symbol; Heaven above had dispensed with it, and so should the Church on earth. We thus, no doubt, reach the abolition of any formal distinction on the part of God between Jew and Gentile: but only by first arriving at a deeper truth—the establishment of the new and more effective method of purification through the grace of Christ, whereby the old fleshly ordinances and symbolical distinctions became antiquated. This was the more immediate point aimed at.

11. There were various other grounds and occasions of uncleanness under the old covenant, but they all rested on the same fundamental principle as that now unshackled: and it is consequently the less needful to dwell upon them. In them also the external defilements were but the image of the internal; they continually spoke of a higher purification being needed than that which concerned the flesh.

For example, the mere touch of the dead defiled; though it were the curse of a clean beast, yet if a man came anywhere into contact with it, he remained unclean till the even, i.e., if it were the curse of a beast in itself unclean, the impurity became intensified, and he could only be cleansed by a trespass-offering, i.e., if it were the dead body of a relative, or of some other fellow-creature, as the occasion was greater so the defilement also rose higher, and he could only be cleansed by the application of water mingled with the ashes of the red heifer, continued at intervals during seven days. Nu. xix. 11, 12; and whenever death happened in a house or tent, all in it and about it remained under the taint of defilement for seven days. It was not that there was anything directly sinful in the contact itself with the dead in such cases—this may have come about without the slightest blame, or even in the discharge of imperative duty; but still the individual was brought into contact with that which was the wages of sin and the awful image of its accursed nature. Therefore, to carry up his thoughts to the source of the evil, and impress him with a salutary horror of the real defiler, the symbolical system under which he was placed made the occasions of accidental, or even necessary intercourse with the dead, the means of awakening salutary impressions in the soul. It virtually said, by all such appointments, Beware of sin, which is the death of the soul, and which is the ultimate cause of all that interferes with the enjoyment of life in the kingdom of God.

The same explanation is to be given of the uncleanness connected with leprosy, which was viewed as a sort of living death, the disease that bore the most exact image of sin. (2 Cor. 11.)

But another, and indeed the only additional class of defilement of a general kind, springing from what may not unfitly be called the opposite quarter—the generation and birth of children. Uncleanness was contracted, though in different degrees and differing also as to the form of purification by which cleansing was to be obtained, on the part of men by irregular discharges from the generative organs, and on the part of women by their periodical issues, and more especially by childbirth, to wit. This can only be understood by a reference to the list of generation, as the channel transmitting the depravity which by reason of the fall has become inherent in human nature. It pointed to the pollution which has tainted the very foundation of life on earth, and perpetually pressed on men's attention the great truth uttered from the depth of the prophet's experience, when he confeced. Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." Thoughtful persons could never have reflected on the legal ordinances of this description, without perceiving in them the clear indications of the power and the plan of God, by which the polluting circumstances in their own history, such as that which called forth the penitential cry of David, would at times give additional force and pungency to the lesson. On the same ground, perhaps, may best be explained the striking peculiarity in the case of a female, as compared with a male birth—the uncleanness in the former case being appointed to last for sixty-six days, or such a sense to last, that the mother could only then come to the house of God, and present her purification offerings, while in the other the one half, or thirty-three days, were sufficient. Is it with women that the fall was more directly connected? In her condition also that its present effects are more conspicuously manifest; and it was not unfit, that a standing testimony to such things should be embodied in the ordinances connected with her purification. Besides, the ordinance of circumcision, in the case of the male child, came at the commencement of the second week, to separate, in a sense, twixt it and the mother, and raise it to an individual sovereign position, while nothing of a like nature was administered to the female child. But considered either way, the link of original sin, connecting parent and child in a common evil, and the child of one sex more peculiarly than another, is what seems most naturally to account for the difference of time.

CLEMENT (Gr. Κλεμέντηος) is named only once in the New Testament, but named with much esteem and honour by St. Paul, as one of those fellow-labourers who had been especially serviceable to him at Philippi, and whose names were in the book of Erec-

C Tia. Early tradition, appearing first in Origen, then confirmed by Eusebius, Jerome, and others of the fathers, have identified this person with the Clement of Rome, who, toward the close of the first century, wrote the epistle addressed by that church to the church at Corinth, included in the writings of the apostolical fathers. Roman Catholic authorities have universally over-liked this tradition; but among Protestant writers opinions have varied. And, indeed, there are no grounds to go upon for any definite opinion apart from tradition. So far as Scripture is concerned, we merely know that at the time of Paul's imprisonment at Rome, and within a short period of the close of his career, Clement was at Philippi, and apparently holding some office in the church there. He was, of course, afterwards removed to Rome, and have been raised to the charge of the church there formed. But the tradition is too late in its origin, and too variable in its statements, to begot much confidence in its favour. Jerome's version of the story makes him succeed Peter as Bishop of Rome, and Tertullian represents him as ordained by Peter. Others place Linus before Clement; and a still further variation places Cletus and Anacletus between Peter and Linus. But Linus endeavored to harmonize the discrepancies to some extent by making Linus apostle to the joint bishops. Modern Rome authoritatively determines Clement to have been the second from Peter; her order of succession is, Peter, Linus, Clement, Cletus, Anacletus. But this is nothing history, rather than following it. (See under Peter.)

The epistle which goes by the name of Clement is certainly a writing of great antiquity, has every appearance of being a genuine production, is in perfect accordance with the teaching of Paul, and on several accounts is the Epistle which was now of the age immediately subsequent to the time of the apostle. In the first centuries it was often read in the churches. It has survived to modern times in a single copy, forming part of the MS. that contains the famous Alexandrian copy of the Greek Scriptures, known as Codex A.

CLEOPHAS (Gr. Κλεόφας) one of the two disciples who travelled to Emmaus on the day of the resurrection, and had the memorable interview with Jesus recorded in Lk. xxiv. The name of the other disciple is not given, but Cleopas is expressly mentioned in ver. 18. And it has been a question, whether he is the same with the person called Cleophas, Kyrar, in Jn. xix. 25. This latter person is more commonly called Alpheus, Gr. Αλφαύς, which is but another mode of pronouncing the Aramaic original, and was the father of James the Less. Opinions have varied as to the question of his identity with Cleopas, and there are no grounds for arriving at a determinate judgment. It seems strange if they were not the same, and if the same person named Cleophas was now for the first time men- tioned in gospel history, that our Lord should stand on such an occasion have appeared to one so comparatively obscure as to be hitherto overlooked. But the circum-

CLOUD. There is a frequent figurative use of cloud in Scripture, which sometimes bears a more special respect to the peculiarities of a Syrian climate, but which can still without material difficulty be understood by the inhabitants of nearly every region of the habitable globe. The long continued and often scorching heat of summer, which for months prevails throughout Syria with little or no interruption, naturally renders clouds an image of refreshment and blessing beyond what persons living in a more temperate and variable climate might be disposed to make them there is at least a certain force and emphasis in such a use of the natural phenomena, for the natives of eastern climes, which the others can but imperfectly apprehend. Thus Solomon takes "a cloud of the latter rain" as the most fitting emblem, under which to represent the hopeful and gladdening influence of the king's favourable countenance upon those who enjoy it, Ex. xvi. 15; and the commanding of the clouds to rain not, or as it is again expressed, shutting up the heaven so that there be no rain, was wont to be given as the most appalling sign of coming sternness and desolation, Ps. iv. 6, ix. 17. On the other hand, the darkening of the sky by the intervention of clouds gave to those, when considered by themselves, and especially as contrasted with the habitual clearness of an eastern atmosphere, an aspect of gloom, and rendered them the natural emblems of frowning events in providence and seasons of darkness and sorrow.

So, for example, J o e l represents the period of approaching judgment as "a day of clouds and of thick darkness," ch. ii. 2, and the desolating host of God appears in the vision of Ezekiel as "a cloud covering the land," ch. xxiii. 9. The cloud, with reference to the severer aspect of his character, the punitive righteousness which is ever ready to take vengeance on sin, is described as having "clouds and darkness round about him," without respect also to the mysteriousness of the procedure in which this not infrequently shows itself, Ps. xxiv. 1; Isa. iii. 19. The fleet, airy, vision-like appearance which the clouds often present in the higher regions of the atmosphere, taken in connection with the terrible elements of power, the falls of lightning, sometimes presented up in them, rendered them again appropriate signs of Jehovah's movements in providence—the chariots, as it were, on which he rides to the execution of his purposes, Ex. xiv. 19; Isa. xix. 1; Ps. cv. 11.

Finally, their height above the earth serves as a symbol of what is lofty in character, and they are employed as a kind of synecdoche for the visible heavens; thus God's faithfulness is said to reach to the clouds, and in the clouds his strength has its seat, Ps. xi. 5; Prov. xxx. 14; both alike are above the measure and limit of earthly things, they partake of the vastness and perfection of heaven.

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. This is constantly represented as the more peculiar seat and symbol of the Lord's presence with his ancient people, during the most singular period of their history; that namely which commenced with their deliverance from the power of Pharaoh, and reached to their settlement in the land of Canaan. On the very night of the deliverance this remarkable symbol made its appearance; and the same passage which first announces its existence tells us also of its continued presence with the covenant-people during their unsettled condition. "And the Lord went before them by a day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way: and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light, to go by day and night. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people," Ex. xiii. 21, 22. Within a very brief period of their starting, they reaped an important benefit of an outward kind from this supernatural cloud; for on the occasion of their passing through the Red Sea, the cloud removed from the front to the rear of the Israelitish host, so as to form a screen between them and the Egyptians, under cover of which the passage to the opposite shore was securely and quietly effected; to the escaping party it "gave light by night," while to their pursuers it "was a cloud and darkness." This alone shows the variable appearance which the cloud was capable of presenting; it assumed different forms and aspects, according to the circumstances of the time, and the ends more immediately to be served by it. From the standing designation of a pillar, which is applied to it with considerable frequency, we must suppose it to have usually presented a columnar appearance rising toward heaven; while occasionally it seems to have expanded itself, in order to form a covering, whether, as in the passage above referred to, from the violence of the enemy, or as other passages would appear to imply, from the intense heat and brightness of the sky, Ps. cvi. 3; Ps. iii. 5. It is expressly stated, that by day it was like a cloud covering the tabernacle, while by night "there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire until the morning," Num. xiv. 5. We may therefore describe it as a fiery column, enveloped in a cloud-like smoke—the fire being so repressed as not to be seen during the day, but shining forth with a mild radiance during the night.

This cloud-like and fiery column might no doubt have served as the sign of the Lord's immediate presence with his people, without having any peculiar aptitude for the purpose—that is, it might have been arbitrarily chosen to be the symbol of the divine presence, though there should have belonged to it no special aptitude for such a design, beyond the circumstance that the Lord had thought good to select it. But such is not usually the way in which sacred symbols are chosen; they have a natural use or significance that forms the basis of the higher end to which they are applied, and in a measure also supplies the key to a right understanding of their import. And there is the more probability that the same was the case here, as the pillar of cloud and fire was, above all others, that with which God identified himself in Israel. Nor is there any difficulty in discerning the natural aptness of the symbol. For regarding the internal fire as the heart and body of the appearance, this, whether considered in respect to the light it emitted, its radiant splendour, or its fervent heat (all which are in Is. iv. 5 associated with the sacred pillar), constituted one of the most striking emblems of the divine nature, and one of constant recurrence in Scripture. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all," says the apostle John, 1 John i. 5, meaning by light, of course, what is such in the moral sphere, unspotted holiness and truth, but in the very mode of expressing it indicating the affinity between the natural and the spiritual; as was done also by the psalmist, when he represented God as covering himself with light as with a garment, Ps. cx. 2. Fire as light, then, is the natural emblem of God's purity: as splendid it is the emblem of his ineffable glory, Ex. xiv. 17; Ps. viii. 17; and as fervent the emblem of his holy hatred and consuming wrath against sin, De. iv. 21; He. xii. 29. So that in every aspect of it, this fiery column was a peculiarly fit and expressive symbol of the character of God in his relation to the covenant-people; and the cloudy form, which even by night veiled the fiery brightness, and during the day altogether overshadowed it, reminded them that he was a God who concealed at the very time that he manifested himself; that the light in which he really dwelt was inaccessible and full of glory; and that it became his people to tremble before him, as incapable yet of knowing more than a small part of his ways, even while they rejoiced in the goodness that he made to pass before them.

Still elements of terror lay within; and the fiery visitations that sometimes burst forth from it to consume the transgressors gave solemn testimony to the fact that the same righteousness which was pledged to protect and bless the people, if they remained steadfast to the covenant, was also ready to chastise their unfaithfulness. Ps. xxv. 42-44.

No mention is made of the cloud after the people left the wilderness and took possession of the Promised Land, until the consecration of Solomon's temple, when, in token of the Lord's owning the place as his peculiar dwelling, in lieu of the now antiquated tabernacle, the cloud again appeared as the symbol of the divine glory, Zech. iv. 2, 4. There is no reason, however, to suppose this to have been more than a momentary sign, given for the occasion. It would have been against the genius of the old covenant to render any symbol of the Lord's presence stationary and permanent; to have done so would have been to give a dangerous encouragement to the idolatrous tendencies of the people. Hence, while God did not wholly abstain from the use of symbolical manifestations of himself, he took care to vary them, so as to keep up the impression that they were only symbols; nor did he ever employ them more than occasionally, that their design might appear to be but temporary help to his people's faith. The shining sign of his presence, and the fixed exhibition of his character, was to be found in the tabernacle, with its sacred ark and tables of the covenant. To this alone Israel was to look, and to the great realities cased in its structure and services for the living manifestation of God's favour, and the continued enjoyment of his blessing. It was in perfect accordance, therefore, with the whole nature of the old economy, that the pillar of cloud should cease, as a regular manifestation of Deity, to be connected with the tabernacle or temple after the people had been settled in Canaan and it is only from having overlooked these fundamental considerations, that Jewish, and also some Christian writers, have contended for its permanent existence till the destruction of the temple by the Babylonians. Ezekiel, indeed, speaks about that time of seeing the glory of the Lord leaving the temple, Eze. ix. 21; but it was of what appeared in vision that the prophet spoke; and, in the reality, it merely announced the fact that God had now, on account of the people's sins, actually deserted the house, and surrendered it to desolation.

Cnidus, the name of a city and peninsula in the southwest part of Asia Minor, and situated between the islands of Rhodos and Cos. It is mentioned in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage toward Rome, as a point which they had great difficulty in reaching, on account of the opposition of the wind, Acts xxvii.

COAL, COALS. Two Hebrew words are found in Scripture, which are rendered "coal" or "coals" in our version. One of these, הָעָלָם, pulhmon, is traced to a root signifying black, and accordingly its proper meaning seems to be coals not yet lighted. It occurs only three times; twice when the smith working in the coals is mentioned, Lev. xi. 13, 14, where the connection determines nothing as to the precise meaning; but the third time, Prov. xxv, 2, where the other word is also used, and plainly in contradistinction, so that on this occasion that second word "כְּעָלָם, pulhmon" is rendered "burning coals," "as coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire." And this meaning "burning coals" seems to be suitable to all the passages in which the word occurs, while it is absolutely necessary in some of them, as besides the one now quoted, Prov. xix. 26, Eccl. vi. 28, translated "hot coals." Ps. xxv. 22-24, xvii, in which last text the number of coals is obviously a metaphor for enkindling one's family and house, as similar expressions are used among ours-for such, see Job xxiii. 16.

It has been disputed whether the Hebrews had coals at all, in the proper sense of the word, or merely charcoal. But there is strong reason to believe that real coal, the same as ours, was employed in the ancient world, and the mountains of Lebanon do certainly contain masses of coal which occasionally shoot out at the surface. These have been worked by the present uncivilized and negligent governors of the country, so that we may well believe they were not neglected by the Phoenicians. There is therefore nothing improbable in the supposition that the Israelites were acquainted with mineral coal. This would admirably suit two passages of a poetical description, in which coals are said to be kindled by the breath of leviathan, Job xxii, and by the breath of the Lord in his glorious appearance, Ps. x. 3, but we must grant this to be the more natural way of understanding metaphors which would be strangely tame if we referred them to artificial fuel, we have no reason to think that mineral coal was in common use, and there are some passages of Scripture which distinctly point to wood as the substance from which the coal was derived. This is in harmony with the use of charcoal in eastern countries at the present day. Thus, coals of juniper, or brass, are mentioned, Lev. xiv. 22. In Is. xiv. 19, and Eze. xxiv. 14, we read of coals in immediate connection with the burning of wood spoken of in the preceding context. And in Lev. xvi, 12 the high priest is commanded to go into the most holy place, with a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar; on which altar we know that wood was regularly burned, whereas mineral coal could scarcely have been obtained by the Israelites as they moved through the desert.

In the New Testament coals are mentioned only in Ro. xii. 20, a quotation from Pr. xxv. 22. A slightly modified form of the word occurs in Lu. xviii. 19; xxvii. 9, which is well rendered "a fire of coals," but it determines nothing as to the material, whether it was wood or not.

One or two other passages occur, in which the sense is substantially given in our version, though the word "coal" is used with, at the best, questionable accuracy. In Lu. iv. 8, "their visage is blacker than a coal," the literal rendering is that of the margin, "is darker than blackness." In 1 Ki. xix. 6, Eliphaz saw "a cake taken on the coals," perhaps rather upon a hot stone; and a like remark may be made on the "live coal from off the altar," to v.s., which was laid upon the prophet's lips. A somewhat difficult word is twice used in Ca.vii. 6, "the cocks thereof are cocks of fire," perhaps it had been better left in general, "the burning cock," or "the burning thereof." This same word occurs in Hab. iii. 5, "burning coals went forth at his feet," more probably, burning, inflammations, that is, some sort of disease, as rendered in the margin, and also elsewhere in Scripture. of the Phoenicians, who traded to Cornwall for tin centuries before Rome was built. Under these circumstances their absence from Egypt, where in modern times they have been artificially led to seem an extent, becomes a remarkable and unanswerable fact.

COCKATRICE S. ADABER.

COCKLE, S. Wild Vine.

COLLEGE: the name applied in the English Bible to the place where Huldah the prophetess resides (Isa. 47:14). Huldah the priest, and Ahikam, and Achbor, and Shaphan, and Asaphah, went unto Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum the son of Tikvah, the son of Harhas, keeper of the wardrobe; now she dwelt in the college in Jerusalem; and they communed with her.

If the word college were to be understood in anything like its modern sense, as a place for academic pursuits or the study of sacred learning, it could not but appear strange that a woman should have had apartments in it. The idea is attributable to the rabbinical authorities, who explain מַרְבֶּה, middle, as some sort of school-house in the neighbourhood of the temple. However, the term is merely a numeral, second, and is always used of something in the second rank or second place, or, more generally, another as contrast distinguished from a first. So that when used here of the dwelling-place of Huldah, it must refer to a part of the city which might in some sense be regarded as second to that more immediately in view: "in the other, or lower part," that which was, so to speak, a second city.

Compare Zep. i. 19; Ne. xi. 9, where a part of the city is expressly so called.

COLONY, in the Roman sense, the only sense in which it occurs in Scripture, and even that only once. Acraig 15 was a kind of colony from the parent state, consisting of a body of citizens, who were sent out with the formal sanction and approbation of that state to found and possess a commonwealth. A law was passed, authorizing a colony in a particular place to be founded, fixing the quantity of land in connection with it to be distributed, and appointing certain persons, who varied in number according to circumstances, to superintend the execution of the decree. The members of the colony were to be the heads of the new field; no one was under any constraint to go; and those who went still retained the rights of Roman citizens.

Of course, if the place was distant, they could rarely exercise these; but in their new settlement itself they had civic rights precisely similar to those enjoyed by the members of the Roman state resident in the capital. So that a Roman colony was a sort of image of the parent city itself, strictly, a part of the Roman state, and within its own jurisdiction ruled and governed precisely like the other. (See Smith's dictionary of classical and Roman Antiquities.) Philippa is the only place mentioned in Scripture as possessing such a character; and the fact of its having become a colony will be shown at the proper place.

COLOSSE, sometimes spelled Koalasa, a city of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, a branch of the Maeander. The first mention of it occurs in Herodotus (iv. 130) as the historian narrates that Xerxes, when on his march to Greece, passed from Arama to Colosse, where "the river Lycus, sinking into a chasm in the town, disappears underground, and emerging at 5 stades distance, flows into the Maeander." That it was situated south of the Maeander appears from Xenophon's statement (Anab. ii. 7, 8), that Cyrus, on his way to the Euphrates, crossed the Maeander, and after a march of 8 parasangs, arrived at Colosse, which the historian describes as a large and populous city. Not far from it lay the towns of Apamea, Hierapolis, and Laodicea. It is said, in common with the two latter towns, to have suffered, shortly after its reception of the gospel, from an earthquake; but it must speedily have recovered from this calamity, as in the twelfth year of Nero it is spoken of as a flourishing place. It was never, however, regarded as the principal town of Phrygia; for when that province was divided into Phrygia Tarraicia and Phrygia Secunda, Colosse stood only sixth in the former division. Both Laodicea and Colosse were famous for their wool manufacture, and for their skill in the art of dyeing.

Great uncertainty formerly existed as to the exact site of the town. In the middle ages a place called Choma, celebrated for being the birthplace of Nicetas Choniates, the Byzantine writer, rose up in the vicinity, and Colosse disappeared. A village called Choma now exists on the site of the ancient Choma hamlet, six miles from the river Lycus, a soil seldom mentioned by the ancient writers. It is thought that Choma, and the hamlet, marked the position of Colossae, but the more accurate researches of Mr. Hamilton have fixed the actual site on a plain about 3 miles to the north of the present village. Here he found ruins, fragments of columns, and a quantity of pottery, which latter circumstance usually denotes the former site of an eastern city. He discovered too the cove of a theatre, with some seats still in preservation, and a large space of ground covered with blocks of stone, which, after some examination, proved to be the necropolis of the ancient town. In order to identify these remains with the Colossae of Herodatus, it is necessary to form some probable hypothesis respecting the city or town which the historian mentions as being in the midst of the town, and receiving into itself the river Lycus.

The following clear explanation of this circumstance is from the work of Mr. Hamilton. Amidst the ruins a bridge spans a rapid stream, formed by the junction of three rivers immediately above the bridge, the principal of which, now called the Tchornik, Mr. Hamilton supposes to be the Lycus. For many ages it was the stream, one from the north and the other from the south, pour their waters; both possessing, in a remarkable degree, the property of retarding the cataracts deposit of these rivers, settling on the banks and other obstructions which the stream meets with, converts them into its own substance; and in this manner deltas are formed, which gradually approach each other from either side, and in time would meet, forming a natural arch, beneath which the main current would continue to flow, its rapidity preventing the settlement of the cataracts matter. "It is indeed most apparent," writes Mr. Hamilton, "that this has been the case; that in the narrow gorge through which the united streams discharge their waters below the bridge, the two cliffs have been joined, and thus formed the χέφα τάς, through which, as Herodotus reports, the waters flowed by a subterranean channel for half a mile, the swift torrent having been in all probability broken up by an earthwork. The powerful is the action of the downward course of these rivers, that a brick thrown into it speedily becomes covered with a thick incrustation, and even has its pores filled up by infiltration. That this is the spot which Herodotus describes admits now of little doubt.

Colossae was the seat of a Christian church, to which St.
Paul addressed one of his epistles. By whom the church was founded is uncertain. In the Acts of the Apostles St. Paul is said to have made two journeys through Phrygia; the first, ch. vi. 9, to introduce the gospel into those regions, the second, ch. xviii. 23, for the purpose of confirming the disciples; but on no other occasion is any mention made of his having visited Colossae. The silence of the inspired history, coupled with the declaration of the apostle that the Colossians had not seen him in person, col. ii. 2, militates strongly against the supposition of his having founded this church.

The contrary opinion has however been maintained by some writers of eminence, especially Lardner, whose work, or Dr. Davidson's Introduction, may be consulted on this point. If St. Paul was not the founder, that honour must probably be assigned to Epaphras, who was with the apostle at Rome when he wrote the epistle to the Colossians, was written, and from whom, no doubt, he received the information which led him to address them. In ch. i. 7 of the epistle, the Colossians are said to have "learned" the gospel of the grace of God from Epaphras,
"a faithful minister of Christ in their behalf;" from which, in the absence of positive data, we may conclude that he was one at least of those to whom his fellow-countrymen were indebted for their knowledge of Christ.

It is very probable indeed that during St. Paul's lengthened sojourn at Ephesus, he was brought into commination; by means of visitors, with various cities of Asia Minor, which thus became acquainted with the gospel, and towards the churches of which, though he had never visited them in person, he stood virtually in the relation of a spiritual father. Such seems to have been the case with Laodicea and Hierapolis, col.
ii. 1.; and, in the vicinity of Colossae: and a similar hy-thesis will account for any peculiarities in the epistle to this last-named city. For thus it would be true that the apostle had never himself there; while, at the same time, he could address the Colossian converts with an intimacy of personal feeling, and assume a position between them which would have been out of place in the case of a church in the establishment of which he had had no share whatever. Thus too will the facts, on which so much stress is laid by Lardner and others,
be accounted for, that the epistle exhibits such an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of the church, and with so many of its members, and seems also to pre-suppose, on the part of the Colossians, an acquaintance with Timothy, who, we know, was Paul's companion on his first journey through Phrygia.

Nothing is more likely than that this intimate knowledge was gained on either side by visits, on the part of Epaphras, Archippus, Philemon, Apphia, and other members of the Colossian church, to St. Paul at Ephesus, and perhaps other places; where they would also be brought into intercourse with Timothy. The question must remain to some extent in uncertainty; but the probabilities are certainly in favour of the latter view, and against that of Lardner, which Theobald seems to have been the first to suggest.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. The genuinenness and integrity of this epistle were never questioned in ancient times; nor indeed in modern, until a few German critics, in other respects deserving of a hearing, but apparently unable to resist the pronouncements of unwarranted scepticism peculiar to their country, threw out doubts upon the subject. Mayerhoff of Berlin, in a work published in 1838, attempted to prove that the epistle is not the production of St. Paul; in which he was followed by Baur of Tübingen, whose researches have apparently led him to the conclusion that of all the epistles ascribed to the apostle, those to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians alone are beyond doubt genuine. The reasons which these writers allege for their opinion stand on a very unsubstantial character.
Mayerhoff insists upon the peculiarities of style, and especially the ἁρμαὶ νομημάτων, which, as he alleges, distinguish this epistle from the genuine ones of St.
Paul. Of peculiar expressions it contains, no doubt, an unusual number; but this is easily accounted for by the nature of the subjects on which the writer treats.

In general, it may be observed that the argument from ἁρμαὶ νομημάτων is of little weight, unless supported by internal and external evidence. Internal marks of spuriousness, Mayerhoff professes to find in the "povery of thought," and absence of logical arrangement, which in his opinion, the epistle exhibits; an opinion which the unbiased readers of it are not likely to share.

Baur, in rejecting the epistle on the same ground as he does the pastoral epistles: viz. the alleged occurrence of ideas and words derived from the later Gnostic and Montanist heresies, whose he draws the conclusion that it must have been written subsequently to the appaarance of those heresies. But why may not the reverse have been the case, and the heresars, by employing them in a new sense, have adapted the apostle's expressions to their own use? How little dependence is to be placed on such purely subjective arguments appears from the circumstance, that on the same grounds, and as decisively, as Mayerhoff pronounces the epistle to the Colossians spurious, does De Wette reject that to the Ephesians; so that these criticisms mutually cut the ground from under each other.

Of the external testimonies to the genuineness of the epistle the following are a few.—Irenæus, Adv. Her.
lib. iii, c. 14, "And again, in the epistle to the Colossians, he says, "Luke the beloved physician greets you,
"(Col. iv. 16)—Clement of Alexandria, Strom, lib. i, p. 277.
"And in the epistle to the Colossians he says, "Warning every man, and teaching in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ," (Col. ii. 28).- Tertullian, De Peccaty, Horæ, c. viii. "The apostle, writing to the Colossians, warns us against philosophy.
"Take heed," says he, "lest any one circumvent you through philosophy and vain deceit, according to the tradition of men;" (Col. ii. 8).—De Resurrection, Cynic, c. 23.
The apostle, in his epistle to the Colossians, teaches that we were once dead in sins, alienated from God, with feelings hostile to him; then that we were buried with Christ in baptism. &c. "And you, when you were dead in your sins, and the unremission of your flesh, hath quickened with him, having forgiven you all trespasses," (Col. ii. 13).—Later testimonies it is needless to adduce.

Place and Time of Writing.—The determination of the latter point depends upon that of the former, on which different opinions have been held. It must be promised that we cannot, as regards the time and place of writing, separate the three epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon; the two former are connected by similarity of contents, and their common bearer Tychicus; the two latter by the salutations of Epaphras, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, and Lucas, and the mission of Onesimus, mentioned in both, and is obvious from Acts i. 12, and vi. 22, and from Phil. ii. 19, that all three epistles were written by the apostle during a time of imprisonment; and since the inspired history mentions but two occasions on which, for any length of time, he was in bonds, viz., at Caesarea for about eighteen months, Acts 27, and at Rome for two years, Acts 28, between these two our choice must be made. General belief, from ancient times downwards, has been in favour of the Roman imprisonment; but recently the other side of the question has been adopted by some German critics of note, among others by Schulz, Schott, Böcking, Wiggers, and lately Meyer. Neander, however, Harless, and others, have declared themselves for the common opinion; and not without reason, for the objections against it seem to be insurmountable. The following are the principal: 1. It does not seem probable that the apostle would suffer nearly two years of imprisonment at Caesarea to escape without employing his pen. But to this it may be replied, in the first place, that other epistles may have been written during that period, and yet not the three in question; and secondly, that it is equally improbable that the two years of the Roman imprisonment passed without memorial, and what we assign to the one period we must, in the present case, take from the other. To this must be added that the imprisonment at Caesarea was much more strict than that at Rome, in the early part of the latter; and therefore less likely to furnish opportunity for writing epistles. It is urged, again, that it is more natural that Onesimus should have fled to Caesarea, which was comparatively nearer to Rome, than to Caesarea at a distance. But, on the other hand, a vast metropolitan like Rome would afford better shelter to a fugitive than a provincial town; and from the constant intercourse between the provinces and the capital Onesimus would experience no difficulty in escaping thither. Meyer, after Wiggers, insists upon the omission of the name of Onesimus in the passage of the epistle to the Ephesians, in which St. Paul recommends Tychicus to that church, Eph. vi. 21, which, he thinks, can only be accounted for by the supposition that the mission decided on from Caesarea, in which case they would necessarily arrive at Colosse first, where Onesimus would be dropped, and Tychicus proceed to Ephesus alone. But to found an argument on such a slender foundation as this is obviously unsafe. It was not necessary to commend Onesimus to the Ephesian church, inasmuch as not he but Tychicus was properly the bearer of tidings from St. Paul, and indeed he had no other reason for teaching at Ephesus but that he was preaching in company with Tychicus. But in Col. iv. 9, where Onesimus is named, the case is different; he had been an inhabitant of the town, was one of themselves, and was now returning under peculiar and interesting circumstances. Finally, it is remarked that St. Paul requests Philemon to prepare him a lodging at Colosse, in the expectation that he would be enabled to repair thither shortly, Phil. ii. 22, whereas in Phil. ii. 21 he expresses a resolution of proceeding, after the termination of his Roman imprisonment, to Macedonia, and thence, according to the plan laid down in Rev. xx. 21, 22, westwards rather than eastwards. It is impossible, however, to say what changes the apostle may have been induced by circumstances to make in his plans; probably the projected journey to Spain never took place, or was postponed; and if so, there is nothing extraordinary in the supposition that, on his liberation from Rome, he, instead of proceeding direct to Asia Minor, took Greece and Macedonia in his way, and visited Philippus before he arrived at Colosse. On the whole, this is a case in which external tradition may properly be allowed to determine the question; and this is unequivocally in favour of Rome as the place of authorship. [See Schott and Krümm. 1:297, p. 452. F. Wiggers, loc. cit. p. 560. Neander, Apostelgeschichte, i. p. 467; Harless, Ephes. p. 61; and Brandsen, Kometian.] This point being assumed as settled, the date of the epistle ranges within narrow limits. The latest period that has been assigned to the Roman captivity is A.D. 63, the earliest A.D. 60; the epistle then must have been written between 60-63, and probably in the year 62 (Harless), but the exact date cannot be determined. (For the order in which the epistles were written, see the article on the Epistle to the Ephesians.)

The Object of the Epistle. This is manifest on the surface. The letter was composed to deal with three distinct objections. The first was equally probable through Epaphras, of the appearance of various tendencies, both doctrinal and practical, in the Colossian church, against which he felt it incumbent on him to warn his readers. These three tendencies are specified.

1. A preternatural philosophy, which affected an esoteric knowledge, received through tradition, and which abandoning Christ the Head, unburied in unhallowed speculations on the number and nature of the spiritual beings with which the invisible world is peopled, Col. ii. 8.
2. The observance of the Jewish Law, of which the apostle does not approve, of Jewish ordinances, Col. ii. 15-17.
3. The practice of ascetic regulations, Col. ii. 23. A question here at once arises: Were these various errors found united in the same party or individual? At first sight they seem mutually to exclude each other. The pharisaic Judaisers exhibited no perverseness either to a speculative gnosticism or to asceticism; the Gnostic ascetics, on the other hand, were usually opposed to a rigid ceremonialism. It is so improbable however that, in a small community like that of Colossians, three distinct parties should have existed, that we are driven to the conclusion that the corrupt tendencies in question did really exist in combination in the same persons; and the difficulty will perhaps be alleviated if we bear in mind that in the apostolic age two classes of Judaizing teachers, equally opposed to the simplicity of the apostolic message, though in different ways, biased themselves in savouring tares among the wheat in the visible church. The former consisted of the rigid formalists, closely Pharisaic, who occupied so prominent a place in the history of the Acts and in several of St. Paul's epistles, and who contendted for the continued obligation of the law of Moses upon Gentile converts; the latter were speculative adherents of the Alexandrian school, whose principle it was to subordinate the letter to the spirit, or rather to treat the former as a mere shell, which the initiated were at liberty to cast away as worthless, or intended only for the vulgar. With this false spiritualism was usually combined an element of oriental theosophy, with its doctrine of the essential evil of matter, and the ascetic practices by which it was supposed that the soul is to be emancipated from the material thraldom under which it is at present labourers. To angelology, or the framing of angel genealogies, the Jews in general of that age were notoriously addicted; in the pastoral epistles (see Tit.1, 6) we again meet this idle form of speculation. That persons, induced with those various notions, should, on becoming Christians, attempt an amalgamation of them with their new faith is but natural; and the ill-assorted union seems to have given birth to the Gnostic-ism of a subsequent age, with its monstrous tenets, the product of an excited fancy. Teachers then, or perhaps a single teacher, \textit{Justin} of this cast of Judaism had effected an entrance into the Colossian church, and seems to have there experienced a favourable reception. In a Gentile community like this pharisaic Judaism could not have so easily gained a footing; but the mixture of mystical speculation and ascetic discipline, which distinguished the section of the Alexandrian school alluded to, was just adapted to attract the unstable; especially in Pergaea, from time immemorial the haunt of mystic rites, such as those connected with the worship of Phile and of myrrh super-vision. From this congenial soil, in a subsequent age, Montanism sprang; and, as Neander remarks ( Apocalypsegeschichte, p. 126), it is remarkable that, in the fourth century, the council of Laodicea was compelled to prohibit a species of angel-worship, which appears to have maintained its ground in those regions (ἐν τοῖς Xριστιανοῖς . . . ἐκ γῆς κυρίων καὶ κυρίων, καὶ κυρίων). We must not, however, suppose that these tendencies had worked themselves out into a distinct system, or had brought forth the bitter practical fruits which were their natural consequence, and which, at a later period, distinguished the heresies alluded to in the pastoral epistles, and the followers of Corinth. The corrupt teaching was as yet in its bud. The apostle therefore recommends no harsh measures, such as excommunication: he treats the case as one rather of ignorance and inexperience: as that of erring but sincere Christians, not of active opponents; and seeks by gentle persuasion to win them back to their allegiance to Christ.

\textit{Concurrence.}—Like the majority of St. Paul's epistles, that to the Colossians consists of two main divisions—one of which contains the doctrinal, the other the practical matter. Of these the former, again, contains two distinct portions; from the commencement of the epistle to ch. i. 27, and from that point to the end of ch. ii. In the former of these portions the apostle, after the usual salutation, returns thanks to God for their faith and love, of which he had received accounts from Ephesus, ch. ii. 1-7, and describes the earnestness of his prayers in their behalf that they might continually advance in spiritual wisdom, power, and fruitfulness, ch. ii. 9-17. The ultimate source of the blessings which they enjoyed was the love of the Father; by whose grace they had been transferred from a state of sin into a state of acceptance, in and through Christ, whose blood was sufficient to cleanse from all sin; who before his entrance into the world, as Creator, sustained equality with the Father, and is now constituted Head of the Church and Lord of all things, ch. i. 12-22.

The second paragraph commences with an expression of the apostle's solicitude for the spiritual welfare of these churches which had not enjoyed his personal ministry, the Colossians among the number; whence he passes to the immediate object of the epistle, and exhorts his readers, as they had received Christ, to walk in him, and not to permit themselves either to be seduced from the simplicity of the faith by a show of human wisdom, or to be entangled in a yoke of bondage to ceremonial observances from which Christ had set them free. In Christ they were complete; in him they possessed all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; risen with him to a new and heavenly life, they were dead, as well to the rudiments of a lower stage of religious knowledge, as to the sins of their former unconverted state, ch. ii. 4-6.

In the latter half of the epistle the apostle enforces the practical duties flowing from these truths. Having put on the new man they were to mortify the fleshly nature; cultivate the fruits of the Spirit, especially humility and love; and by mutual submission and instruction promote the spiritual well-being of the whole body, ch. iii. 12-14. This general exhortation to holiness of life then branches out into particulars, embracing the relative duties of husband and wife, children and parents, masters and servants, ch. iii. 18-4: 22-41. The writer directs their prayers that the Word of God might, in their hearts, have free course; and sets them to Paul himself, the bearer of the epistle, for further information respecting himself. The salutations of those who were with him at Rome, and an injunction to transmit the epistle to the church of Laodicea, and in turn to preserve one with which had been written to that church, conclude the epistle, to which the apostle, with his own hand, attaches his signature.

This epistle has not been so much commented on as some others of St. Paul. For the general sense and connection, however (Expos. Epil. of Col., Geneva, 1650) and Calvin may be consulted; for critical purposes, Olshausen, Ehrle (Bengel, 1839) Alford; also the recent comments of Elliot and Fairbairn.

\textit{St. Advocate.}

\textit{COMMANDMENT.}

\textit{St. Deaconess.}

\textit{COMMON} has not (unfortunately in Scripture) the sense of \textit{nucleus}, as in the word of St. Peter, "I have not eaten anything common or unclean." As x. 11, 12; Rom. xiv. 15. This is easily explained. The sanctified was what was set apart to God, taken out of the category of common things, and impressed in some respect with a sacred character; so that what is still retained common was in the eye of the law virtually unclean. (In respect to the ordinary use of the word, in the expression "having all things common," see \textit{Almsgiving}.)

\textit{CONCUPISCENCE (cutting away)}, a contemptuous term used by St. Paul in Phil. iii. 2, to denote the zeal for circumcision. He changes the term for the purpose of indicating more pointedly their real character; instead of saying "beare of the circumcision," παράδοξος, namely the party who pressed the necessity of still observing that ordinance, he says, "beare of the concurrence," καταρασμός: as much as to say, they no longer observe the old and venerable name; what they stickle for is a mere concurrence, a flesh-cutting. And then he goes on to state the reason, "for ye are the circumcision"—the reality has now passed over into us, who believe in Christ and are renewed in the spirit of our minds.

\textit{CONCOURSE} (Heb. ἡγεῖσθαι, Gr. παραμένει or παρακείμενοι). Lat. \textit{pelleter.—}all manifestly but different variations of the same word was the name given to a sort of second or inferior wife—one who shared the bed of the man, and had a recognized position in the household, though still occupying the place to some extent of a servant, and subject to the proper spouse, if there was one in the house. Among the Romans it was only at a con-
CONCUBINE

In the East concubinage had manifestly come centuries before into general practice. It meets us in Ge. xvii. 21, in a notice respecting the family of Bethuel, the father of Rebekah, who, in addition to eight children by his wife Milcah, had also a concubine, Reumah, who bore him four children besides. Indeed, it had substantially appeared before in the household of Abraham himself, for when he consented to take Hagar to his bed, although it was as Sarah's bondmaid that she was so received, yet the relation meant to be established was undoubtedly much of the same sort; the children to be born of Hagar were to be reckoned, in some sort, as Sarah's, and to take rank as proper members of the family. This intention was afterwards modified by the interference but the son of Hagar was still by no means reckoned illegitimate, and it was from incidental circumstances, rather than from the nature of the case, that Ishmael did not meet with an aftertoward corresponding treatment.

In the next generation of the chosen family we find no mention of a state of concubinage; Isaac seems to have had no partner of his bed but Rebekah, and no children but her twin sons Esau and Jacob. But in the next generation again the evil reappears in an augmented form; and not only does Esau multiply his wives at pleasure, but Ishmael allows himself to be led by comparatively trivial and unworthy considerations to take first two wives, and then two concubines. Nor was the practice ever wholly discontinued among the covenant people; it was brought to some extent under law, and placed substantially on the footing of a marriage relationship, Ex. xxii. 15; xxiv. 6, so that the man who entered into it was not allowed summarily, and without any reason assigned or reason sufficiently apparent, to put away even a beshamed or captive, whom he had thus received to his bed and board, but was bound to give her a legal writing. And this state of things existed till the coming of Christ, when a higher tone of teaching and a stricter practice were introduced. But the consideration of it more properly belongs to the subject of divorce, or to the more general subject of marriage.

(See Marriage.)

The chief difficulty connected with the matter of concubinage which equally applies, however, to the marriage of more wives than one who bears the apparent laxity of permitting it at any period among the covenant people, and the apparent inconsistency in the divine administration of permitting it at one period and prohibiting it at another. It seems as if either the principles of the divine government were not so unchangeable as they are commonly represented, or the persons commissioned to reveal them had not been equally inspired at one time as compared with another. This, however, were a hasty conclusion; for the question really resolves itself into the larger one, which concerns the progression of the divine plan, and the consequent toleration of defects and imperfections in the earlier, which must cease to appear in the later, stages. In the natural administration of God there is such a difference in the inevitable conditions of childhood and youth as compared with those of mature life, and in the entire condition of mankind on earth as compared with that of the angelic world or of the redeemed in glory.

And as the church of the old covenant stood greatly below that of the new in point of knowledge and grace, it was, in like manner, inevitable that there should have been in various respects a defective practice, marks of moral inferiority in private and social life, such as should have no existence now, since the relatively perfect has come. Such precisely was the case in respect to the point now under consideration. The original appointment of God in regard to the family constitution, that it should be based upon the union of one man and one woman, and that these two by reason of their union should be regarded as one flesh, made it clear to all what was the mind of God, and what, for those aiming at perfection, was the standard to which they ought to have conformed. But the corruptions consequent upon the fall, which grew and widened as the history of the world proceeded, so marred the original constitution in respect to the marriage relationship, that the required standard fell practically into abeyance, and the whole that seemed most to divine wisdom, at the setting up of the old Testament economy by Moses, was to impose certain checks and restraints of a legal kind in the way of its executive violation. It was ordained that no one who had taken a woman to wife, even though it was a wife of inferior standing, a sort of concubine, should put her away without a writing of divorce, which necessarily required time, and consideration, and the employment of the most part of a week, and witnesses in an imperfect check, no doubt, but till a check in the way of arbitrary procedure, and as a general or civil regulation which it really was, possibly carrying the restraint as far as could safely be done. The very enactment of such a regulation, as our Lord argued against the Pharisees, Matt. xv. 5, was a witness against the hardness of their hearts, and it was an utter abase of its design to regard it as a licence to be indulged in, instead of a restraint to be borne. It set limits within which the civil authorities might tolerate the existing imperfections, but it left unpruned the original appointment, and, properly viewed, should have but served to recall men's attention to it.

So difficult was it to turn the tide of degeneracy in this respect which had set in upon the world, and so hard even for the highest authority to prevail in purging the moral atmosphere of society, that the practice of concubinage yielded only in the lowest and most gradual manner even to our Lord's explicit declaration. Long after the establishment of Christianity the state recognized concubinage, as concubinage from marriage, though not in existence with it; and even so late as the year 400 the first ecclesiastical council of Toledo allowed concubinage to persons living in concubinage, while it excluded polygamists. For centuries concubinage was quite common both among clergy and laity. It was first formally abolished among the clergy, but only with general effect about the period of the Reformation; afterwards, also, it was denied to the laity; and the civil law gradually conformed itself to the ecclesiastical.
CONVOCATION, a calling together, or an assembling of a sacred character: and hence has the epithet holy usually attached to it. It denotes such meetings for sacred purposes as took place at the stated festivals, and on Sabbaths. Ex. vii. 19; Le. xxvi 2. Nu. x. 3; Cony

CONY. A small quadruped common in the rocky parts of Palestine and surrounding countries, having no affinity with the rabbit of Europe, but belonging to a different order. Strange to say, its nearest affinity is with the large rhinoceros: and though the assertion may startle some who behold a little creature, not unlike a guinea-pig in form and size, yet if they were to compare the skeleton of the so-called cony with that of the large pachyderm, they would find exceedingly little diversity between the two, except in dimensions. It is the Hyaena syriaca of zoologists.

Various local names have been applied to the cony. The LXX. translate the word by γαγρίον, a gnawing-hog.” According to Bruce it is called in Abyssinia ῥακόκα, in Syria the term is Guma lábal, which the French zoologists have metamorphosed into Duma; to the modern Arabs it is familiarly known as the ρέκα. It is said to inhabit in numbers the precipices which border that terrible fissure which affords an exit for the Kidron, as well as other inaccessible rocks. Its feet are not suited for bowing the toes being round and soft, protected by broad hoof-like nails; but it resorts to caverns or deep cliffs in the rocks. Here the little animal dwells in society, a score or more being frequently seen sitting at the mouth of their caves, backing in the sun, or coming out to enjoy the freshness of the evening air.

Larder thus notices this little animal:—“Two of our guides set out upon an excursion, their guns on their shoulders, saying they would go and hunt the omber, an animal commonly met with in this part of the mountain. In the course of a few hours they returned, bringing something wrapped up in their cloaks. We saw by the merriment displayed on their countenances, that they had not been unlucky. They immediately produced four little animals, which they had found in their hair, being the whole of the family—the father and mother, and two young ones a fortnight old. These creatures, which are very lively in their movements, endeavoured to bite when they were caught. Their hair is a brown-yellow, which becomes pale and long as the animals grow old. In appearance, on account of the great vivacity of the eyes, the head being close to the shoulders, and the buttocks being drawn in, and without a tail, they resemble the guinea-pig. Their legs are all of the same height, but the form of their feet is peculiar: instead of nails or claws they have three toes in front and four behind, and they walk like rabbits on the whole length of the foot. The Arabs call it ṣomeh, and know no other name for it. It is common in this part of the country, and lives upon the scanty herbage with which the rain in the neighbourhood of springs supplies it.” (Larder, p. 111. T.R.H.)

COOS, or CO2, a small but fertile island in the Egyptian Sea, off the south-west point of Asia Minor, which was once touched by the apostle Paul on his way from Greece to Damascus. As ex. It does not appear that he rested at it, or perhaps did more than pass by it; so that nothing depends on its state for the illustration of apostolic history. It is about twenty-five miles long by ten broad.

COPPER occurs only once in our translation of the Scriptures, though if it were the proper rendering there, one can scarcely avoid the conclusion that it should have appeared also in other passages. It is at Ex. viii. 27, where, among the vessels reported to have been brought back from Babylon, we find mention made of “two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold.” The word is that usually rendered brass, θυρσος; and undoubtedly indicates a metal hard, well tempered, and capable of taking a very fine polish, so as, on that account, to possess a high value. This could not be said simply of copper, especially at Babylon, where it is known to have existed in considerable abundance, and to have been in comparatively common use. Either brass, therefore, which is a compound of copper and tin, or some other alloy, in which copper formed a principal part, must have been meant. If in this passage brass should rather have been used than copper, there are others in which the reverse holds: it should have been copper and not brass. Thus, in De. viii. 2, it is said respecting Canaan, “Out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass,” and again in Job xviii. 2, “Brass is molten out of the stone” certainly not brass in either case, which, being an alloy, is never found in a native state; but probably enough copper, as this was one of the mineral products of the Holy Land. And the allusion in the last of the two passages to the process by which it was obtained, clearly implies that the smelting of copper from the ore was known at the period when the book of Job was composed. It should be understood, then, that when reference is made to the ore, or to the metal in its original state, not brass, but copper is the word that should be employed. “In most other instances,” as stated by Mr. Napper (Ancient Works and Artificers in Metal, p. 38, “the word brass should be translated bronze, an alloy well known in the earliest times; and as copper is the principal metal in this alloy, it follows that a reference to bronze necessitates a previous metallurgical operation for copper.” The same writer also states, that “many of the ancient copper alloyers had to stand working by the hammer; and their working was such, either for toughness or hardness, that we cannot at the present day make anything like it; which is surely strong presumptive evidence that the copper was as well as the tin they used for these alloys must have been pure, and that they had means for effecting this effectual purification.

It confirms the view now given of the early knowledge of copper, and of the process necessary to bring it to practical use, that at the discovery of America the natives were found in plentiful possession of articles made of this mineral. "Columbus, when at Cape Honduras, was visited by a trading canoes of Indians. Amongst the various articles of merchandise were small hatchets made of copper, to Hew wood, small bells, and plates, and crutches for making copper. When the Spanish first entered the province of Typan, they found the Indians in possession of abundance of copper axes. The ancient Peruvians used copper for precisely the same purpose with the Mexicans; their copper axes differ very little in shape from ours. The knowledge of alloying copper was possessed by both the Mexicans and Peruvians, whereby they were enabled to make instruments of copper of sufficient hardness to answer the purposes for which steel is now deemed essential. The metal used as an alloy for copper was tin; and the various Peruvian articles subjected to analysis are found to contain from three to six per cent of that metal" (Clayton's Journal, ii. p. 55).

It is ascertained that the Egyptians at an early period were well acquainted with working in bronze; and it is most likely that what are called brazen vessels in the books of Moses were really of bronze; this rather than simple copper, because bronze is less subject to tarnish, and takes on a finer polish; and rather bronze than brass, because zinc, which forms a component element in brass, does not, as far as yet discovered, appear to have been known to the ancients.

CORAL (κοράλλω), (corall). In Job xxviii. 18, this word occurs as the name of some proverbially precious thing, being enumerated with pearls, gems of various kinds, and gold, as not worthy to be compared with wisdom. The only other example of the word is Ezek. xxviii. 16, where Syria is represented as occupying in the markets of Tyre with corall, among other things.

The etymology of the word is obscure. The LXX. seem to have been quite ignorant of what it meant; for in the latter passage they transliterate it as the name of a place, while in the former they strangely render it by "meteors" or "the heavenly bodies." The local dialects give us little light on the matter.

The various peoples enumerated by Ezekiel as trading in the markets of Tyre, may have been either the buyers or the sellers of the articles enumerated. In the instance in question, "purple" is one of the articles in which Syria is described as trading. But purple was one of the staple productions of Tyre, and Syria would scarcely have brought purple to sell at Tyre, but would doubtless be there as a purchaser. Moreover, her trade is expressly said to have been in "the veins of Tyre's making." Hence probably corall was an article manufactured by the Tyrians, and sold by them to the Syrians. The Greek writers, Homer especially, frequently allude to the Sidonians, and their near neighbours and companions of the Tyrians, as the manufacturers of all kinds of bijouterie and jewellery.

The received and traditional rendering of corall by coral is probably correct. From time immemorial there has been a great demand for this article in the East, wrought as at this day into various ornaments and jewels; and from the same remote antiquity has the supply of the raw material been drawn from the coast of North Africa, the chief seat of the fishery being to the present time the immediate vicinity and bay of Tunis, where once sat Cartage, the openly daughter of royal Tyre. The red coral would therefore certainly be one of the articles which Tyre would receive in the rough state from her colony Cartage, and which her skilled artists would work up for the adornment of the Syrian ladies. It is doubtless the coral of the Hebrews.

The red coral is the stony skeleton of a compound zoophyte; allied to the serpulae of our coasts. It forms a much-branched shrub, of which the beautiful scarlet-stone forms the solid axis, which is covert during life by a thin bark, out of which protrude here and there upon the surface minute polyps with eight tentacles. It grows only in the Meditarranean, and principally, as already observed, on the African coast, from Tunis to Oran. It is found attached to the rocks at considerable depths, as from 20 to 120 fathoms.

The demand for it has given rise to a fishery of some importance, about 200 boats being employed in it on the coast of Algiers, of which 150 fish in the neighbourhood of Bona and Cala, obtaining 36,000 kilogrammes (about 720 cwt.) of coral, which, selling at the rate of 60 francs per kilogramme, produces a return of 220,000 sterling.

The mode by which it is obtained is the same which has always prevailed, and is rude and wasteful. A great cross of wood laden with stones, and carrying at the end of each arm a sort of net formed of cords partly untwisted, is hoisted from a boat, and dragged over the bottom. The branches of the corals are entangled in this apparatus, and as the boat moves on any turn off; at intervals it is pulled up and the produce secured. Of course a great deal must be broken off which is not deemed, but yet it is a profitable employment. A boat manned by nine or ten hands has been known to bring in 50 or 100 kilogrammes in a day, yielding 120 or 250 sterling; but such success is rare. The fishery is prosecuted from the 1st of April to the end of September, during which time there is on the average about 100 days in which the fisherman can work.

CORBAN, the Hebrew term for a gift or offering, in the general sense to God. The corresponding term in Greek is δοξα; but in a discourse of our Lord, in which he reproved the false teaching of the Scribes, the original word corban is preserved by the evangelist Greece, Among the Eetians, and afterwards, in the Peloponnesus, the name of Corinto was especially used, which has been so strongly insisted upon by the writers of the present age. The Eetians, and in particular the Peloponnesians, were celebrated for the size of their corn, of white pepper, of a greyish-yellow colour, and finely ribbed. We need not suppose that the maize was coloured like a coriander, but its partitation. Moses had commanded children to honour their parents, and had said that if any one cursed father or mother he should die the death, "but ye say," adds our Lord, "if a man shall say to his father or mother, Coriander, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever

There may be omitted, however, and what follows taken as the concluding portion of the deliverance of the scriptures —this: "if a man shall say to his father or mother, Coriander, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever

Plainly, our Lord meant to say, that the honour which a child owed to his parents bound him to give of his substance to those parents whatever they might actually need, and that when such needful portion was withdrawn from so befitting a purpose by being destined as a gift to God, this was only, under the pretext of honouring God, doing disservice to his most explicit injunctions —hence blessing God by dishonouring his earthly representatives. Such would be the case if the proceeding referred to were adopted in respect to a single article which the parents of a youth might actually require, and which by an unseasonable consecration to the altar be withheld from them. But, of course, the iniquity complained of would be much greater if a youth were allowed to pronounce that word of devotion to religious uses upon all he had, and after doing so were allowed to retain the whole for his own use, though prohibited from giving it to others, even to his own parents —if such were the practice in question, as Lightfoot has endeavoured to show from rabbinical authorities, the case as against the Jewish teachers becomes greatly aggravated. But it may be doubted how far this extreme is involved in the charge of our Lord.

History. —From the names which certain places in the city retained, and especially from the oriental character of the worship of Aphares and Venus, to whom the whole of the Aeroeortians, or citizens of Corinth, was dedicated, it has been argued, and with great probability, that the district was first colonized by Phoenicians, who, we know, possessed other settlements in Greece. The oriental settlers appear to have been succeeded by a mixed population of Eetians and Ionians, the former, however, being the dominant race, as is proved by the traditions which represent the earliest rulers of Corinth as belonging to it. Among these the mythological heroes Sisyphus—whose reputed cunning no doubt typified the mercurial spirit of the community over which he reigned, and Bellerophon—whose exploits rivalled those of Hercules, occupy a conspicuous place. The latter was worshipped with divine honours at Corinth. A still earlier legend connects the name of the city with Corinthus, a descendant of Eetes, the father of Medea, who is said to have abandoned the sovereignty of Corinth for that of Colchis. On the death of Corinthus, the last male representative of Aetes, the inhabitants of the city invited Medea to assume the sceptre; the renowned sorceress accordingly arrived with her husband Jason, but after a short sojourn returned to Colchis, bearing the throne to Sisyphus. In the historical age the Dorians, under the conduct of Aetes, appear as the first conquerors of the isthmus. Occupying a hill called Solygeia, near the Saronic Gulf, they waged war upon the Eolian population, and finally reduced it to subjection. It was impossible, however, in a maritime state like Corinth, to maintain in their strictness the Doric institutions, which were founded upon landed tenure; and accordingly, while the sovereigns were of Doric descent, the citizens, both of the competing and the conquered race, participated in equal rights of citizenship. The dynasty of Aetes lasted for twelve generations (from B.C. 1074 to 577); it was succeeded by an oligarchy of the Bœotian family, so named from Beechis, one of the royal line; and this, in its turn, gave place to the tyranny of Cypselus and his son Periander, who together reigned from B.C. 557 to 533. It was during this period, especially the latter part of it, that Corinth attained that commercial influence which made her one of the first cities of Greece. Admirably situated for the operations either of trade or of naval warfare, she succeeded in contested the dominion of the Euxine Sea with the Eginetans, and exercised an undisputed supremacy over the western waters of the Gulf of Corinth. She was the first of Greek states that constructed a fleet of triremes, or ships of war. It was westwards, however, that the tide of Corinthian colonization tended; and such powerful colonies as Corcyra, Syracusia, Locri, Cumæa, &c., attacked the vigour of the parent country. After the death of Periander, the son of Periander, who reigned only for three years, Corinth, coming under the influence of Sparta, reverted to an oligarchical form of government, and became one of the most influential members of the Peloponnesian confederacy. Friendly at first to Athens, the Corinthians became jealous of the rapid strides of this power after the Persian war; a sentiment which passed into open hostility on the accession of Megara to the Athenian alliance, and the assistance furnished by Athens to the Corinthians in their quarrel with the mother city. This latter event was the immediate cause of the Peloponnesian war. Throughout this war the Corinthians were the bitterest opponents of the Athenians; and as the close of it, when the battle of Leuctra annulled the naval power of Athens, their animosity was shown by a proposal that the city should be razed to the ground. Jealous in turn of the supremacy which Sparta had now attained, they turned their arms against their former allies; and in conjunction with the Athenians, Boeotians and Arcavians, waged a war with Lacedæmon, called the Corinthian war, which, after various turns of fortune, ended with the peace of Antalcidas, B.C. 357. In the subsequent war between Sparta and Thebes, Corinth again appears as an ally of the former; but exhausted by the struggle, she concluded a separate peace with Thebes. From this period to the battle of Chaeronea, Corinth remained inactive; she then, like the other states of Greece, became subject to the Macedonians, who maintained a garrison in the fortress of the Aeroparthenon. Rome succeeded Macedonia in the government of Greece; and by her new conquerors Corinth was attached to the Achaean league. She readily joined in the Achaean revolt; and after the defeat of the allied forces by the Romans under Mammianus, this general inflicted all the miseries of conquest upon the devoted city. The temples and buildings were levelled to the ground; the males were put to the sword, and the women sold as slaves; and the paintings, and other works of art, in which from its wealth Corinth abounded, were carried off to Rome. After this terrible blow, Corinth remained for a century in ruins. At length, under the auspices of Julius Cæsar, who sent thither a colony of his veterans and freedmen, a new city sprang up on the site of the old; and from the advantages of its position, speedily became a prosperous place. At St. Paul's visit, about 100 years afterwards, it was the residence of a proconsul, and the political capital of Greece. An unbroken series of disasters marks its subsequent history. In common with the rest of the Roman empire, it suffered from the ravages of the Goths; fell under the power of the Venetians, who retained it till the overthrow of the western empire; and from thence pressed into the hands of the Turks, with whom it remained until Greece became a separate kingdom. The modern town Gothe, which occupies the site of Corinth, is an insignificant place, with a population of about 2000, it is supported chiefly by a small export trade in dried fruit and honey.

and Megara, to the Ocean river on the south, its length may have been about 13 miles; its breadth varied considerably with the formation of the coast; from the river Nemos, which divided Corinthia from Sicyon, to the confines of Epiaurus, it was about 22 miles, while the isthmus measured only 3½ miles across. The soil was generally deficient in fertility. Neither the mountain spurs, which covered a great part of the district, nor the sandy plain of the isthmus, were fitted for agriculture. One portion only, the plain lying on the coast between Corinth and Sicyon, repaid the labours of the husbandman; and this was so valuable, that "what lies between Sicyon and Corinth" became a proverbial expression for great wealth. The most conspicuous object in the vicinity of Corinth was the Aereocorinthus, a lofty mountain rising 2000 feet above the level of the sea, compared with which the Acropolis of Athens sinks into insignificance. This gigantic fortress was justly considered the key of Greece, and its possession marked the supremacy, for the time being, of the successive conquerors of that country. On the north side of it, on a table-land of rock, about 200 feet above the level of the sea, stood the city, 1½ miles distant from the port-town of Lechaion, on the Corinthian Gulf, with which it was connected by long walls resembling those which joined Athens to the Piraeus. The corresponding part on the Saronic Gulf, now Bay of Kechryae, was called Chenchare, Χεντηρα, i.e., Χεντηρα; it was distant from Corinth about 8 miles, and was the terminus of the trade with the East; the modern name Kechryae still marks the spot. The city was in size inferior only to Athens: the whole circuit of the walls, including those of the city and Aereocorinthus, the two long walls to Lechaion, and the fortifications of the latter place, was about 120 stadia, or 13 miles. Of the population we have no trustworthy accounts: it is supposed to have amounted to 100,000, of whom about 80,000 inhabited the city, the remainder being scattered over the country. In the time of Pausanias, who has left a description of Corinth as of Athens, the city contained many splendid edifices and works of art, part being relics of the ancient city, and part the work of the Roman colonists. Of Greek Corinth, all that remains is a cluster of seven Doric columns, on the western side of the modern town, which belonged to a temple, and which, in diameter, are the largest of that order of architecture now existing in Greece. A mass of brickwork, probably one of the baths erected by Hadrian, and an amphitheatre excavated from the rock on the eastern side of the town, mark the subsequent occupation of the Romans. Compared with Athens, Corinth offers but a scanty field to antiquarian research.

Religious, Manufactures, &c. The religion of Corinth was, like that of the rest of Greece, polytheistic, or rather it consisted in the worship of defiled heroes, and of the powers of nature personified. But besides what was common to it with the national mythology, it possessed peculiar features of its own, which evidently were derived from an eastern source. The patron goddess of the city was Aphaidite or Venus, to whom was erected a magnificent temple on the Aereocorinthus, where 10,000 female slaves were maintained for the service of strangers. In no other Greek city did the worship of this kind, which recalls us of the worship of Myliss at Babylon, as described by Herodotus (v. 70, 102), known to have existed. The illegitimate public of the Phallic worship, the disgusting symbol of the fertility of nature, is another proof of the licentious character of the national religion. As might have been expected, this licentious element produced a corresponding effect upon the manners of the people, who were notorious, even in Greece, for dissipation and profanity. The wealth which poured into the city, and the crowds of merchants who flocked thither, made it the favourite abode of courtesans, among whom two of the name of Lais, remarkable for their beauty and their avarice, have been handed down to posterity. From St. Paul's epistles it may be gathered that these luxurious and sensual tendencies survived the conquest by the Romans, and perpetuated themselves in the new city founded by Caesar. A large portion, however, of the national treasure was diverted into worthless channels. It contributed to adorn the city with numerous splendid temples; and it was from Corinth that the most ornate of all the orders of Greek architecture took its origin and its name. The art of painting is said to have been here invented; and at the period of the Roman conquest, it abounded with masterpieces in this branch of art. For one picture of Bacchus, by Aristides of Thebes, afterwards transported to Rome, Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered in vain a sum equivalent to 60,000 of our money.

In statuary, especially of bronze, the expression "Corinthian brass," which was applied to the finest specimens of that art, attests the excellence of the Corinthian workmanship. Vases of terra-cotta, famous throughout Greece, and eagerly purchased at enormous prices by the Romans, formed an important branch of trade. In literature the Corinthians were less successful. At one period indeed, during the reign of Periander, poetry was cultivated; and the name of Arion especially, the friend of Periander, though not a native of Corinth, is associated with the invention of the dithyramb. But the masses found no congenial home in this empire of trade. Among the illustrious writers of Greece no Corinthian name is found; nor does that of any great statesman or orator grace the annals of the national history. Corinth was content to be the eye of Greece.
in a commercial point of view; resigning that tribe, as regards literature and philosophy, to her political rival and invader for Athens. In the neighbourhood of the city were celebrated every third year the Isthmian games, so called from the scene of their celebration, one of the most important contests, the foot-race, furnished St. Paul with striking illustrations of the Christian life, of which, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, he takes care to avail himself, 1 Cor.xx.21-22.

Introduction of the Gospel to Corinth. - Significant, however, as the place which Corinth as compared with Athens holds in the estimation of the classical student, it occupies a far more important position than the latter city in the early history of the Church. A flourishing Christian community was there founded by the great apostle of the Gentiles, to which two of his most important epistles were addressed. The following is a brief account of this event. It was on his second missionary journey, Acts xvii., that Paul, leaving Athens, where the gospel had had but scanty success, turned his steps towards Corinth. The reasons which determined his course thither are not difficult to conceive. Corinth was then the metropolis of the province of Achaea, and the principal seat of government and trade. Its ports were crowded with vessels, its streets swarmed with a mixed population of Jews, Greeks, and Roman attendants upon the proconsul. The constant communication which went on between it and the most flourishing regions both of the East and the West, including Rome itself, would insure the extensive propagation of the gospel. Moreover, as was their custom in mercantile cities, Jews had been congregated in great numbers; and in every place which St. Paul visited, it was to its Jewry after the flesh that he first addressed himself. At this particular period too, the decree of the emperor Claudius banishing Jews from Rome, had increased the number of Hebrew residents in Corinth. Impelled no doubt by these considerations, the apostle here took up his abode. He found in the city two Jews, Aquila and his wife Priscilla, natives of Pontus, on the shores of the Euxine Sea, who, in consequence of the decree of Claudius, had repaired thither; and discovering that they were of the same trade which he himself had been taught in his vocation, the manufacture of woolen tents, he associated himself with them. Their conversion appears to have speedily followed; and they became valuable fellow-labourers with the apostle in his arduous labours. These labours commenced immediately: every Sabbath in the synagogue, in which as a doctor of the law he had a right to teach, Paul reasoned out of the Scriptures, persuading both native Jews and proselyte that Jesus was the Christ. A fresh impulse was communicated to his zeal, by the arrival of his beloved friends Tineobus and Sila with joyful tidings of the prosperous condition of the church of Themistokles. So energetic an assault upon the stronghold of Jewish bigotry and unbelief could not be made without exciting the hostility of that perverse people; they organized a formidable resistance; they blasphemed the holy name which Paul preached; and at length the apostle, with a symbolical action expressive of final rejection (\"he shook his mantle, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads,\") Acts xvii.5, turned from them to the Gentiles. The house of Justus, a converted proselyte, contiguous to the synagogue, furnished a convenient place of resort for those who were desirous of instruction. Encouraged by a vision, in which the Lord declared that he had much people in the city, Paul continued his labours, which resulted in the conversion of many of the Corinthians; among whom Stephanus with his household, Acts xix.21; and the hospitable Gaius, Acts xx.1, deserve particular mention; and what was of still greater importance, of Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue. These persons the apostle, desisting from his former practice, baptized himself, Acts xix.2b. A year and a half had thus been spent, when, a new proscriber, Gallio, the brother of Annia Scaena, the philosopher, arrived at Corinth, to assume the reign of government. The unbelieving Jews, exasperated by the progress of the gospel, and especially by the deception of Crispus, lost no time in accusing Paul before Gallio of violating the law of Moses. Fortunately for the infant church, the new governor was a man of sense and humanity. Refusing to hear the apostle's defence, he drove the Jews from before the judgment seat; alleging that, if their complaint had any bearing to the criminal law of Rome, he would have listened to it, but that he would not intermeddle in their private religious disputes. To add to their discouragement, the Greeks, encouraged by the imperial favor and apostacy of the proconsul, proceeded to personal violence, and beat Stephaneus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, before the very judgment-seat, Gallio looking on with indifference. A decisive triumph was thus gained by the Christians; and Paul continued his labours unabated, until circumstances called him to leave this missionary field and proceed to Aia Minor. During the apostle's absence from Corinth, Aquila, an Alexandrian Jew and former disciple of John the Baptist, who had been led by means of Aquila and Priscilla to the knowledge of Christ, repaired thither; and being both eloquent and learned, successfully took up the work which Paul had left it, and watered the seed of divine grace which the apostle had planted, Acts xviii.11. The subsequent condition of the Corinthian church, and the number of St. Paul's visits to it, will be best considered under the article on the Epistles to the Corinthians. This church afterwards fell into obscurity, though one of its bishops, Dionysius, who lived towards the close of the second century, is said to have exercised some influence over the surrounding Christian communities.

[On the history and topography of Corinth, Smith's Dict. s.v., Aquila, Justinian Gough, iii. s.v. 13; and Luke's House, iii. c. 26, may be consulted with advantage. On the founding of the Corinthian church, the inspired narrative in Acts xviii.3, illustrated by St. Paul's two epistles, is our sole and our sufficient authority.]

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE. Two of the principal epistles of the great apostle of the Gentiles: as expositions of doctrine, second in importance only to the epistle to the Romans, and the most instructive of all the inspired compositions of their class, from the insight which they furnish into the personal character of St. Paul himself, and the constitution, parties, and heresies, of the apostolic church.

Jurisdiction and Intimacy. On the former of these points no doubt, in ancient or modern times, has ever been entertained. These epistles are so strongly impressed with the spirit and peculiarities of St. Paul, both in their matter and in their style, and the historical notices which they contain so faithfully correspond with the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles, that to question their genuineness would be to question the existence of the apostle himself. Every German criticism, which has left few of the books of the canon unassailed, here acknowledges the irresistible force of the evidence, and acquiesces in the general belief of Christendom. The external testimony is as satisfactory as the internal. Our limits will only permit us to cite a few of the earliest writers who allude to the authorship of our epistles. Clement of Rome, towards the close of the first century, writing to the Corinthians, urges them to ‘take the epistle of Paul for authority’. (1 Cor. xi. 1) ‘...in the commencement of the gospel, did he write to you?’ Truly under the influence of the Spirit he gave you injunctions respecting himself, and Cephas, and Apollos, on account of your having been, even then, addicted to party spirit.”

Corinthians

Assuming the fact of this unrecorded visit, we can have the less hesitation in taking in the natural sense the words on which the question of the number of the Corinthian epistles mainly turns. "I wrote unto you," says St. Paul in I Cor. x. 8, "in the" or "my""epistle not to company with fornicators." As far as the form of the expression is concerned, the words may be well understood of the epistle which the apostle was then writing; we have a similar usage in Ro. xvi. 22. Col. iv. 16, 1 Th. v. 27, and 2 Th. iii. 11. But the great, the almost insuperable, difficulty remains, that in our present first epistle we have no such letter as is warranted by the usual reference of commentators to the excommunication of the iniquitous person, as by implication involving such a command, is hardly satisfactory. The excommunication in question was a solemn act of St. Paul himself, and of a peculiar nature, sect. c. i. 5, apparently occasioned by the neglect of the church to comply with a previous admonition to the same effect, and which appears to have been interpreted too strictly; to have been supposed, that is, to include forlorners as well as delinquent brethren. St. Paul, alluding to this present epistle, and the fact of it having been written, in a lost epistle, corrects the misunderstanding, and explains that it was intended to apply only to the latter class of persons, sect. c. v. 11. There seems then reason to suppose that at least on epistle to this church has not been preserved; nor is there any difficulty in admitting this, if we remember that not every composition of an inspired man must necessarily have been composed under the influence of inspiration, and therefore intended to be a part of the canon. The prophets, for example, must have written many writings which were never admitted into the canon of the Old Testament; of Solomon's varied compositions, I Ki. vi. 26, only a few were by the ancient church deemed worthy of that honour. In like manner the apostles may have initiated many letters which, like their oral teaching, have not been handed down. Is it credible, that during his active and protracted ministry, St. Paul wrote no more than his fourteen canonical epistles? Certain letters may have perished, because not written under the influence of inspiration; the inspired compositions of both of the Old and New Testament forming but a small portion, a divinely superintended selection of the productions of their several authors; a circumstance which has not been always borne in mind by critics, e.g. Bishop Middleton, who, discussing the question before us, writes:—"Besides the extreme improbability that a canonical book should have been lost, . . . . no instance has been produced in which an ancient writer has cist of the pretended first epistle, or even alluded to its existence." (On the Greek Acts, sect. c. x. 41.) But an apostolic epistle is not necessarily a canonical book; and the absence of reference, on the part of early authors, to the lost epistle, is sufficiently accounted for by the fact of its not having formed part of the canon. The order of events, then, may be arranged as follows: During his sojourn at Ephesus, St. Paul, receiving unfavourable tidings of the state of the Corinthian church, especially of its laxity of discipline, addressed an epistle to it on this subject, to which the Corinthians replied, sect. c. x. 1. His written admonitions proving of little avail, he paid them a short visit, as it should seem with no better result. On his return to Ephesus, and not long before his departure from that city, he wrote a second epistle, our present first, in which he enters at length upon the points, both in practice and in doctrine, which needed correction. Soon afterwards he left Ephesus and proceeded to Macedonia, having first sent Timothy, Ac. xx. 2, and then Titus, Ac. xviii. 23, to Corinth, to report upon the state of things there, and especially upon the effect which the epistle had produced. On Titus's rejoicing him in Macedonia with more favourable accounts, our second epistle was written, and was followed, shortly afterwards, by the apostle himself. This much may be regarded as borne out by our existing sources of information; whether much more detailed is not the opinion of commentators. Evidently, composed by Bick, that Titus carried with him an epistle which has also been lost, so that in all four epistles were addressed to the Corinthians. Bick's conjecture was founded on certain expressions in our second epistle, which seemed to him applicable to anything contained in the present first, particularly such passages as 2 Co. ii. 3, 4, and vii. 12; whence he concluded that an intermediate epistle must have been sent from Macedonia, coupled in terms of strong censure. His hypothesis, however, seems to rest on insufficient grounds; and by recent writers, Neander among the rest, it has been rejected.

Place and Time of Writing. On these points little need be added to the observations already made. "I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost," writes, points out both the place and the time of writing; the subscription in our English Bibles "from Philip" being manifestly erroneous. Since St. Paul left Ephesus about Pentecost A.D. 57, this epistle must have been written in the early part of that year. The bearers of it were probably St. John and Timothy, Ac. xvi. 10, 17, delegates from the Corinthian church to Ephesus. The notices contained in the second epistle are not so definite. Paul had recently left Asia, sect. c. vi. 1, for Macedonia, taking Titus in his way, where he had expected to meet Titus, on the return of the latter from Corinth, sect. c. ii. 13. Disappointed in this, he passed over into Macedonia, where Titus joined him, and where this epistle was written, sect. c. xii. 2, at what particular place is uncertain. Since after the sending of it he visited Greece and abode there three months, Am. xvi. 5, then it is hand to Easter A.D. 57. If Philip, on his return to Jerusalem, it must have been written towards the latter end of A.D. 57. The bearers of it were Titus and two brethren, whose names are not mentioned, but one of whom was probably Luke, sect. c. vii. 15.

State of the Corinthian Church at the time. The rich and luxurious metropolis of Athens was not in itself a favourable field for the progress of Christianity in its native simplicity. The visible success indeed of the apostle's labours was, as compared with that achieved in other places, very great; but many of the converts were but imperfectly established in the faith and practice of the gospel. On the one hand, the habit of philosophical speculation, so congenial to the Halicarnese mind, arrayed itself against that submission of the intellect which revolution presupposes and demands, or still more perniciously attempted to spiritualize the facts of the gospel so as to deprive them of objective reality; on the other, the laxity of Corinthian morals could with difficulty be taught to abandon practices which were wholly inconsistent with the elevated standard of the new religion. As long as Paul was present in person, his apostolic authority sufficed to check these corrupt tendencies; but his departure was the signal for their overt manifestation. To these dangers, naturally arising from the character and associations of the converts, must be added the influence of rival teachers, whose doctrines were more or less antagonistic to those which Paul had delivered. That judaizing section of the apostolic church which followed in the wake of the great apostle wherever he went, marking him out for its especial enemy, appears to have despatched to Corinth, as it did to Galatia, some of its emissaries, carrying with them false reports fabricated from the sayings of other teachers. The result was, for the purpose of forming an adverse party. As elsewhere, so in Corinth, it was part of their plan to contract the influence and disarray the authority of Paul, by throwing doubts upon the validity of his apostolic mission, and drawing injurious comparisons between him and those of the twelve who had seen the Lord in the flesh. As one extreme usually produces its opposite, it is not to be wondered at that they who had outwardly embraced the teaching of the apostle should have been led to identify his doctrine with his person; and forgetting that he was but the instrument of a higher power, to which, and not to man, the spiritual increase was to be referred, to inscribe his name on their banners as the leader of a party. Moreover, the chief fellow-worker with Paul in this church had been, unconsciously no doubt, the occasion of a division of sentiment. It had been the apostle's care to deliver his message with the utmost simplicity of speech, but he should foster the notion, so likely to prevail in a Greek city, that Christianity was but a new philosophical system, to be recommended by the graces of oratory, or a show of superior intellectual subtlety: he "came not with excellence of speech or of wisdom," that their "faith" might "not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God." His successor, however, the eloquent Apollos, proceeded to erect upon the foundation thus laid a structure more in unison with the intellectual habits of the Alexandrian school, in which he had been nurtured. These could, indeed, have been no essential difference between his doctrine and that of Paul, for he is everywhere spoken of as a faithful minister of Christ; but to the Corinthian taste his mode of expounding the Old Testament, and his greater facility in the use of the Greek language, may have proved more attractive than the simple energy of the apostle, and gathered to him a body of peculiar admirers.

In this manner, no doubt, it is that the origin of three of the parties mentioned in 1 Cor. i, 12 is to be accounted for. Some declared themselves to be for Paul, others for Apollos, while the judaizing party chose the name of Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, as their watchword; a circumstance which proves that they had by no means the same influence at Corinth as at Galatia, for otherwise they would probably have named themselves after James, whom the strictest section of the Jewish Christians regarded as their head. It does not, in fact, appear that at Corinth they ventured to assert the continued obligation of the law of Moses, even to the extent of submitting to circumcision, as they did in other places: the temper of those with whom they had to deal rendered caution in their proceedings necessary.

What is meant by the fourth party alluded to by St. Paul, that which professed to be of Christ, is more difficult of determination. At first sight we might be led to suppose that it consisted of those who, influenced by feelings of enmity towards Paul, insisted upon the fact that he had not, like the other apostles, seen our Lord in the flesh, and attempted on this ground to assign to him a position of inferiority: they had received the gospel from eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses of the Word of life; the adherents of Paul from one who, as he himself confesses, was born out of due time. And this hypothesis might seem to be confirmed by the only two passages in which any explanation appears of the ambiguous expression in question, viz. 2 Cor. v, 16 and 7, in the former of which Paul declares that to the known Christ after the flesh centers, under the gospel, no propugnativa; and in the latter claims a closeness of connection with Christ not inferior to that of which this party boasted. It favours, however, under the objection, a great if not a fatal one, that thus there would be no real distinction between the party of Peter and the party of Christ; since the former took precisely the same ground in their opposition to Paul, viz. that of instituting injurious comparisons between him and the rest of the apostle. Paul not only shows that the language of the epistle seems naturally to imply that "they of Christ" constituted a distinct party. If it be urged, as it is with great neatness by Baur, that just as the followers of Apollos are spoken of as distinct from those of Paul, and yet we cannot suppose that any essential difference existed between them; so the party of Christ may be classed under that of Peter, as a subdivision, possessing the common quality of Judaistic tendencies, but distinguished by a peculiar animosity against Paul as an individual; and thus there were but two really distinct parties, that of Paul and that of Peter, either with its subordinate modification—it may be replied that in this case we should expect to find the name of some apostle, or human leader, corresponding to that of Apollos, and not the name of Christ, as the symbol of this peculiar section. If this objection be thought an insuperable one, the only remaining theory which possesses any show of reason is that of Noldeke and Obdam: that, not Judaistic but rationalistic tendencies formed the characteristic of this portion of the Corinthian church; that, in opposition to the legal and scrupulous spirit of the former, it was distinguished by the opposite extreme of laxity and philosophical indifferency. In point of fact, the polemical portion of the first epistle (the second contains no dogmatical or ethical discussion) is directed almost entirely against, not legal tendencies such as those which form the subject of the epistles to the Galatians and Colossians, but such an abuse of Christian liberty as might be expected to exhibit itself in the heathen centre of Greek civilization. In the first four chapters the apostle argues against an undue estimation of human wisdom, with a manifest reference to the Greek philosophy; the case of the incestuous person which follows, indicates a laxity of morals which is not likely to have been of Jewish origin: under the aspect of the possible inexactitude of things in themselves abstractedly lawful, the questions respecting pleading before heathen tribunals, marriage, and the partaking of flesh offered to idols, are treated: in the tenth chapter the examples from the history of the Israelites seem intended as warnings against a licentious perversion of the grace of God. If, now, we suppose that, among the manifold varieties of opinion that prevailed in this church, there were some who renounced all connection with the apostles, who, though but human instruments, were nevertheless the appointed instruments of establishing Christianity in the world; and on the ground of some traditional sayings of our Lord, or even without such a basis, professed to frame for themselves a philosophic Christianity, which both in doctrine and practice should affect a higher manner of freedom—arrogating to themselves, as distinguished from their brethren in the faith, the exclusive title of Christians; we have, perhaps, as near an approximation to the truth as the confused difficulties which surround the subject will permit. The evils arising from the prevalence of party spirit did not terminate with the division thereby introduced into the church. Each section receding as far as possible from the antagonist one, serious extremes of error were the necessary result. Ecclesiastical discipline became so relaxed, from the difficulty no doubt of enforcing it under present circumstances, that delinquents of the worst description were tolerated in the communion of the church, 1co. 11. The precepts of Christian charity were on all sides forgotten. Among spiritual gifts, which at Corinth manifested themselves in unusual abundance, these were chiefly valued, not which ministered to the general edification, but which most tended to exalt the individual, 1co. 12. Differences among Christians, instead of being, as was the usual practice, a joint lament, were brought before the courts of judicature, to the scandal of the Christian name, 1co. 8. On the subject of marriage, extreme opinions were held. Christianity, in opposition to a false asceticism, promulgates marriage honourable in all, and sees in it an emblem of the union between Christ and his church, 1co. 7, 14, 21. Yet, equally opposed to the Jewish sentiment which attached disgrace to an unmarried life, it contemplates cases in which the latter may be chosen, not only without danger, but as a special means of advancing the kingdom of God, 1co. 7, 25, 31. At Corinth there seems to have been, on the one hand, a disposition, probably on the part of the followers of Paul, who was himself unmarried, to exalt celibacy, as in itself a meritorious state; and, on the other, an attempt, proceeding no doubt from the party of Peter, to make marriage obligatory on all, and so to abridge the legitimate liberty of Christians in this respect, 1co. 7, 15, 16. Here too, as at Rome, 1co. 7, 24, disputes had arisen respecting the lawfulness of eating meat which had been sacrificed to idols. To the Jewish Christians, by whom, under the law, the feasts of the peace-offerings had been regarded as symbolic of communion with Jehovah, this practice appeared little less than idolatry; while even Gentile converts, of scrupulous conscience, might entertain doubts on the subject. However groundsless in themselves such scruples might be for true it was that idols were “nothing in the world,” and meat offered to them could contract no real pollution; it was the duty of those who possessed clearer light to respect them, and to abstain from what might suggest the conscience of the weaker brethren. This, however, they were far from doing. They boasted of their knowledge; they insisted upon their abstract right to act as they pleased in things indifferent. Some proceeded so far as to partake of the banquets celebrated in the most temples of the heathen deities. The consequence was, not only that scrupulous condescension were offended, but that some were tempted, against their convictions, to follow the example set them, and to commit what they confessed to be sin, 1co. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31. In the celebration of divine worship places had crept in. Contrary to the Greek custom, the women appeared in the assembly unveiled, 1co. 11, 15, and even ventured to speak in public, ch. 14. But especially in the most familiar and distinctive ordinance of Christianity did the leading defect of this church exhibit itself; and the sacrament of the Lord’s supper, intended to be both a means and a symbol of the fellowship of believers with each other and with their Lord, became an occasion of discussion and injudicious separation. At the supper or love-feast in which, in the apostolic age, the ordinance was used to conclude, the worshippers usually partook, without distinction, of the viands provided; but at Corinth a custom prevailed of each contributor to the banquet consuming his own portion apart; which necessarily brought out into strong relief the distinction between rich and poor, destroyed the notion of equality in the presence of Christ the common Lord, and even gave rise to disgraceful excess, 1co. 11, 18, 21.

Serious doctrinal errors complete the melancholy picture which this apostolic community presented. If there is any text which peculiarly belongs to the gospel, it is that of the resurrection of the body, which Christ was the first authoritatively to announce, Jn. 2, 25, and of which he himself was the meritorious exponent he has given a visible pledge. This fundamental doctrine was called in question by certain of the Corinthian church; and if the party of Christ has been rightly described as consisting of speculative religionists, who moulded the truths of revelation to suit their taste, we can hardly be mistaken in supposing that from them this heretical tendency proceeded. After the fashion of the false-spiritualism which pervaded the Gnostic heresies of the next age, and the seeds of which were sown with the gospel itself, they probably interpreted the apostolic teaching on the point in question to signify a more spiritual resurrection of the soul, to take place in this life: thus not only robbing the doctrine of its true value and significance, but, by implication, denying the fact of Christ’s resurrection, and with it undermining the whole structure of redemption; for, as the apostle remarks, “If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins,” 1co. 15, 18.

Such was the state of affairs in the Corinthian church; a very short time after the apostle’s presence had been withdrawn from it. So soon, and with such diligence, did the enemy sow tares among the wheat. The picture, though painful, is instructive; not only as furnishing the natural history of kindled errors in our own time, but as teaching us how fond the notion is, sometimes entertained, of the immaculate purity of the early church, and how from the first, according to St. Paul’s own predictions, Act. 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and which found an entrance into each visible Christian community. Contents of the Epistle. The first epistle may, as Olshausen remarks, be divided into four parts. In the first, extending from the commencement to the end of ch. ix., Paul discourse generally on the divided state of the church. He traces their party spirit to its true source, an undue estimation of the wisdom of this world, whereas Christ alone is the wisdom as well as the power of God, ch. i. For himself, he had determined to know and to preach nothing save Christ and him crucified; and this with all plainness of speech. Such topics, however, and such a mode of delivering them, only the spiritual man could appreciate; it was from their deficiency of spiritual apprehension that the

The apostle Paul addresses the Corinthians in this epistle, where he answers various questions and deals with the issues of their church. He speaks about the proper use of spiritual gifts, the nature of Christ's second coming, and the importance of living a pure and holy life. Paul also addresses some personal matters, such as the status of widows and the dietary practices of the believers.

The epistle is divided into several parts, each focusing on different aspects of Christian life and doctrine. Paul emphasizes the importance of unity and harmony among the believers and the need for them to live according to the principles of their faith. He also provides guidance on how to deal with divisions and conflicts within the church.

The following excerpt from the epistle highlights some of the key themes:

"And none of them rush flying upon their prey," though he allows that the gannets do. But he has mistaken the habit of the true coromants, for these, like the gannets and other pelagic birds, frequently drop from a height upon their fishy prey, as may readily be observed in both of our native species.

The greater coromant (Phalaenornis crococephalus) frequents rocky coasts, where it delights to sit on lofty projecting points watching the fish below: these it occasionally plunges upon, catching its slippery prey and holding it with great ease by means of the sharp hooked beak. More frequently, however, it shoots along in a line nearly close to the surface of the water, or sitting on the waves, dives after the prey. It is trained to fish for man's use in China.
CORN. The Hebrews, like ourselves, had a generic word for all kinds of grain, including the cereals and their allies. *alepint is nearly equivalent to our English "corn," and would comprehend millet, rice, barley, &c., as well as wheat, all of which will be found noticed in their proper places. Besides these, it is by no means improbable that the Hebrews were acquainted with what we call Indian corn, or as it is sometimes called, Turkish corn, the Zorn may of Limnians.

In 1817, Parmentier (Savoir Dénommant Mais, Naturel, tome v, xix, founding on the silence of Varro, Columella, Pliny, and the other agricultural and botanical writers of classical antiquity, concluded that maize was unknown till the discoveries of America; and in 1831, Meyer asserted that "nothing in botanical geography is more certain than the New World derivation of maize" (opposed by Batsiray in Origin's best affin. Sat.). But since then, in his magnificent monograph "Mais, nat. enMov. in May, 1832, M. Fontanes, the director of the Royal Garden of Agriculture at Turin, has shown that it is figured in a Chinese botanical work as old as the middle of the sixteenth century—a time when the discoveries of Columbus could scarcely have penetrated to the celestial empire; and what is more conclusive, in 1819, M. Riffard discovered under the head of a mummy at Thebes, not only grains but leaves of Indian corn. Nor is it at all impossible that the ear of Homer and Theophrastus may include the plant in question. The wide diffusion of this corn through the Indian archipelago, and on the Indian continent itself, is in favour of the hypothesis which claims it as a native of the Old World, and if it was known to the Egyptians, nothing could be more natural than its early introduction into Palestine.

In his amusing and characteristic treatise on "Colbeck's Corn," remarking on the offering of "green ears of corn," i.e., "hearty, the author says, "What a curious meat-offering, to perch green grains of wheat by the fire! Oh, no: this meat-offering was to consist of ears of green corn [maize]; that is, to say, corn in the milky state, and no wonder that it was chosen for an offering, for the most delicious thing it is that ever delighted the palate of human being. The general way of cooking these green ears, as the Americans call them, is to boil them, and to eat them as bread along with meat, or sometimes with butter. The context would add additional conviction, if any were wanted; for the 55th verse says, 'then shall put oil upon it, and lay frankincense thereon.' Now we, when we have roasted our ears of corn before the fire, put butter and salt therein. If we were absolutely secure in assuming that the custom of the Bible may occasionally denote this plant, it would give additional expressiveness to the numerous passages which speak of "eating green ears," i.e., "cutting off the top of the ears of corn," and such presents as "full ears of corn in the house thereof," i.e., xxvii. 11; Job xiv. 21; Ma. xii. 1; Zek. iv. 2. There is also force in what Colbeck says regarding the "seven ears of corn coming up on one stalk" in Pharaoh's dream, xxviii. 32. "The wheat root will send up sometimes, if it have room, from twenty to fifty stalks, but never more than one ear upon one stalk. Seven ears is a great number for one corn plant to have; but (and the fact is truly curious) the New York Evening Post, of the 26th of August last, records as a wonder a corn stalk on the farm of a Mr. Heckerson, in Bedford county, having seven full ears upon it. And it happens singularly enough, that one single corn plant in my field has on one stalk seven ears of corn." [n. n.]

CORNELIUS, a Roman centurion, or commander of a hundred, in what was called the Italic land, Alex. i. The band (orig., manipulis) consisted of two centuries, and formed the third part of a cohort, or this again the tenth part of a legion. This particular band bearing the epithet of Italic probably arose from its consisting chiefly of soldiers levied in Italy, although such names as "the Coldstream Guards," "the Sutherland Highlanders," &c., familiarly applied to regiments in our own country, and continued when they no longer indicate the quarter whence the individual men have been derived, shows that the term Italic cannot of itself be regarded as a certain proof that the band at that particular time was composed of men who strictly belonged to Italy. Still this circum-stance, coupled with his own undoubtedly Roman name, Cornelius, may justly be held conclusive as to himself. The Cornelius was one of the most distinguished families of Rome; and it is by no means improbable that the person before us may have been of the noble patrician stock, especially as the emperor Julian classes him among the few persons of distinction that in early times embraced Christianity. He may have been, however, of inferior rank; as in later times many plebeians are mentioned bearing the name of Corneli, and Syria alone, who belonged to that gens, liberated no fewer than 10,000 slaves, and gave them his family name. Hence the Cornelius, who has acquired so honourable a place in New Testament history was evidently a person of free, open, ingenuous mind, and, even before his formal admission into the Christian church, well advanced in the knowledge and fear of the true God. At the first mention of his name he is described as a devout person, and one who feared, not the delities, but the God, the one God, and that too with all his household, Acts 10. Unquestioned as we are with the earlier history of Cornelius, we can say nothing, except by conjecture, in regard to the means or opportunities by which he may have been led so far into the reception of the truth. It is probable enough that his position at Caesarea, and his occasional residence in other parts of Syria, perhaps of Palestine itself, may have brought him into contact with some of the more intelligent Jews, who, though adhering with blind prejudice to what they should now have abandoned, still stood immeasurably above the best instructed heathen as to the clearness of their views and the strength of their convictions in divine things. It may be perfectly conceivable that he may also have formed some acquaintance with one or more persons, if not actually converts to the Christian faith, yet favourably inclined toward it, and not unwilling to turn his mind in that direction. This even seems to be not doubtfully implied in the commencement of St. Peter's address to him; since it is there said, "The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ, that word ye know, which was published amongst all Judæa, beginning from Galilee after the baptism which John preached," Acts 10:38. A certain acquaintance with the facts of gospel history, on the part of Cornelius and his household, is here assumed by the apostle; he sets out on the supposition that what now was needed was merely such an authoritative declaration of the truth as might warrant the implicit faith of those who heard, and qualify them for entering into the membership of the church. The same thing appears further to be implied in Cornelius being so expressly designated a man of prayer and charity, and in both respects of such a character and disposition, that they had been going up for a memorial before God. When all these things are put together, it seems impossible to doubt that this man and his family had even before the visit of the apostle Peter attained to the knowledge of God, were honestly acting according to their light and privileges, and in the sincerity of their heart were desirous of obtaining more information, or arriving at more assured convictions than they yet possessed of the truths respecting Christ's person and work among men. They were already in God's sight accepted, and it was only necessary that their recognized position among men should be in accordance with their state before him, and should have added to it the spiritual endowments connected with a place in the Christian church.

Such plainly appears to have been the case of Cornelius at the time immediately preceding Peter's visit; and it is needless to embarrass one's self with the question, whether he belonged to what were subsequently called proselytes of the gate, or to that called proselytes of righteousness. It is quite uncertain when such epistles began to be applied, and, however settled, it can throw no light upon the case of Cornelius. He was still undoubtedly a Gentile so far as circumcision was concerned, and was hence represented by the apostle as a man of another race or nation, and in Jewish estimation unclean. The whole point and moral of Peter's mission to him turned upon that, as the first element in the case, and upon God's accepting him to salvation notwithstanding as the second. It was precisely here that the apostles and the infant church needed a clear light and an explicit warrant. They knew perfectly that the salvation of Christ was for Gentiles as well as Jews, and that the gospel they had to preach had every creature of mankind for its object. The commission they received from Christ before his departure left them in no doubt respecting this, Matt. xvi. 19; Acts xiii. 17; and they themselves at the outset gave expression to the universality of the call and the world-wide comprehensiveness of its aim, Acts xii. 25. But the question that still waited for practical solution was, Were those who might embrace the call from other nations to be received without circumcision? Could they find an entrance into the church of Christ without passing through the gate of Judaism? The disciples as a whole—whatever may have been the convictions of individual members—were still of opinion that the old gate must stand, as at least they had no authority for dispensing with it. Therefore, that the barrier might be removed, and the door of faith freely opened to the Gentiles, the case of Cornelius, with the special revelation given to Peter beforehand and the transactions that shortly after ensued, arose at the fitting time, and led all who were willing to be instructed to the proper result. By the vision granted to Peter, he was indiscriminately in the great fundamental principle, that what God had cleansed he should not call common or unclean; and then by the messengers from Cornelius, sent in obedience to another vision from above, he was guided with unerring certainty to its application. He presently learned that this pious, though uncircumcised, soldier was already a man accepted of God, virtually in a sanctified condition; and on proclaiming to him and his household the gospel of Christ's salvation, he saw the Spirit descending on them, and giving manifestation of his presence by the same miraculous signs which had at first appeared in the apostles themselves. Clearly, enough, therefore, God had sanctified those believing heathen, and could Peter, could any man in the Christian church, venture to call them unclean? The question was conclusively solved, and to reject from the membership of the Christian church an uncircumcised believer in Christ was henceforth in effect, as Peter put it before the gainsayers, to withstand God, Acts xiv. 15.

CORNER STONE. is an epithet prospectively applied by the prophet Isaiah to the Messiah in ch. xlviii. 18. "Isaiah I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation." The reference is obviously to the foundation of the building, and when the corner-stone is particularly specified, it can only be because this occupied the most important place in the foundation of the building—that which held together the outer walls, and on which the whole structure might be said more especially to rest. In Ps. cxlviii. 22, which in all probability is a later composition, it is called the head or chief stone of the corner; and in Eph. ii. 20; 1 Cor. iii. 8, 16, the epithet is applied specifically to Christ; he is called the chief corner-stone. The ideas suggested by it in respect to Christ are his fundamental importence, as prophet, priest, and king to the church, the massive strength of this foundation. and its admirable fitness for at once sustaining and binding together in blessed fellowship the whole brotherhood of faith.

COVENANT. Heb. עַבְדִּי, is applied to various transactions between God and man. Divine commonly make two main covenants, and under these range all others of a more specific or partial kind that occur in Scripture; viz. the covenant of works, and the covenant of grace. The first made with Adam, settling the terms of the original constitution of things, and fixing the alternative that should ensue on its violation; the other entered into between the Father and the Son, for the redemption of as many out of the fallen race as should attain to life eternal. (see Witness in the Covenant, Religion's Body of Truth, A.D. 1851, page 539, on the Movies of Modern society.) It is proper to note, however, that such a division is better fitted for bringing out doctrinally the great features of the plan of God, and the specific bearing of individual parts of the divine administration in regard to it, than throwing light on the distinctive uses of the term covenant in Scripture. The constitution under which Adam was placed, however it may have possessed the essential characteristics of a covenant, is never designated by that name in the Word of God, not even in He. vi. 7; for if we should there read with some commentators, both in former and present times, "They, like Adam, have transgressed the covenant," it still comes short of an explicit application of the term covenant to the Abrahamic constitution. The covenant which the prophet refers to as having been transgressed, was undoubtedly that which had been made with Israel at Sinai; and the allusion to Adam (supposing it to exist) could not, in strictness, be carried further than to indicate, that as he had transgressed against one divine ordination, so had they against another. But it seems a more natural view of the passage to take it as given in our English Bible, "They, like men, have transgressed the covenant:" they have acted the common part of humanity; notwithstanding all that has been done for them, in spite of the special grace and privileges conferred upon them, they have acted no better than men generally, like them failing in steadfastness, and turning aside into the path of transgression.

The Hebrew term for covenant, ברית, is commonly derived from the root יִבְּרָה (brah), to cut, to break, then to ratify; and it is supposed that the name was so derived from the practice of ratifying such agreements by a religious act, the contracting parties uniting together in the presentation of an animal sacrifice, and passing between the parts of the victim. This explanation seems to have the contenance of Je. xxxiv. 18, where the Lord charges the people with having failed to perform "the words of the covenant which they made before him, when they cut the calf in twelve, and passed between the parts thereof." Hebrews same contenance also from Ge. xvii. 1, 2, where the "smoking furnace and burning lamp," symbols of the Lord's presence, are represented as passing between the pieces of the sacrifice, as Abraham himself had evidently done before, and, "in that same day," it is added, "the Lord made a covenant with Abram." It may be doubted, however, whether this solemn act of passing between parts of the sacrifice was not confined to strictly divine covenants, while in covenants generally sacrifying and cutting together may have been all that was customary. Such apparently was the case when Jacob and Laban entered into covenant, Ge. xxix. 13. But whatever the particular form, there is reason to believe that the solemn killing and cutting usual at the ratification of important contracts was what originated the peculiar expression of the covenant; and this, once established appears to have defined itself generally, as among the Greeks appears in the θιναι ἠμεταλλαξαν, ἱπποτηρίων, and the Latin, frater frater, frater in frater. The first transaction we meet with in Scripture which is expressly designated a covenant is that entered into with Noah after the flood. The Lord then established his covenant with Noah, and for the obvious and permanent sign of it he set his bow in the cloud. (Gen. vii. 11.) And the next is the one already referred to in Ge. xxv. when he first entered into covenant with Abraham. On these occasions, however, there was not strictly a mutual compact, but an ordination on the part of God, according to which special arrangements in providence were to be made for those interested in the covenant, and might be looked for with the same confidence that men look to each other for the fulfilling of a contract. In the Noahic covenant there was simply the ratification of God's purpose to preserve the world against any future deluge, and to continue the race of men and the other races of the animal creation throughout all succeeding ages. In like manner in the first draught, as we may call it, of the Abrahamic covenant, the whole that was announced was God's settled purpose to convey to Abraham and his seed the inheritance of the land of Canaan, Ge. xv. 1-5. We can thus easily understand how the Septuagint should have rendered the Heb. term ברית, on these occasions and generally wherever it afterwards occurs, by the word διαθήκη, disposition or will, rather than by τραπεζη, compact or mutual agreement. This last term would naturally appear to carry too much the aspect of an engagement in which the contracting persons stood somewhat on a footing, and naturally bound them selves by obligations, to convey a suitable impression of those transactions in which nothing directly or prominently appeared but the bountifulness of God in purposing, and his faithfulness in accomplishing what he purposed. It was thought better to take the other term, which, while it failed to express the contracting element in a covenant, brought more forcibly out than any other could have done, what really was most prominent in the earlier covenants of God with men—his own gracious disposal of his affairs for their good. As the divine plan proceeded, the contracting element was brought more distinctly forward in respect to man. Even in the covenant with Abraham, when it was established in its more mature form, Ge. xvii., while a still fuller exhibition than formerly was made of the rich grace that was to be the heritage of Abraham and his seed, there was at the same time an express stipulation that the members of the covenant should be all circumcised—which again implied that they should be holy—otherwise, they had no reason to look for the blessings promised in the covenant. The covenant of law ratified at Mount Sinai, and granted on that earlier covenant of promise, reversed, in the respect now under consideration, the relation of things: it gave special prominence to the obligations laid upon the people, and threw more into the background the purposes of mercy and loving-kindness entertained toward them on the part of God. It ran throughout in this strain; since God has proved himself to be such a benefactor toward you, you must in return act in a corresponding manner toward him, and if you fail to do so, every privilege is forfeited, every promise in the earlier covenant is ready to be withdrawn. These are the two covenants to which attention is specially drawn in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. But there was also the covenant made with the house of David, ii. 6, vii., which formed the basis and occasion of many representations contained in the later prophetic Scriptures. It was in reality, however, but another and more specific form of the covenant with Abraham, and held for its main object to mark with greater exactness through which the grand purpose of blessing promised in the Abrahamic covenant was to find its accomplishment. The seed royal thereof was to be in the house of David, and in connection with it, especially in connection with one who was to be pre-eminent the child of promise in that house—all good, first, to Israel, and then to the other families of the earth, was to have its destined realization. Ps. ii. xxii.; v. ix. 6, 7, 8e. This later covenant, therefore, if viewed in respect to its higher interests, coincides with the Abrahamic covenant: it points to the same ultimate issue, requires also the same medium for bringing them to pass, and differs only in more specifically indicating the particular channel and mode through which the result was to be attained.

It is evident from what has been said, that the whole of these covenants found their accomplishment in Christ—though in different respects, and according to their distinctive ends and objects. The covenant of Noah was confirmed in him, because he placed on a sure and permanent foundation that kingdom of righteousness which was the only effectual safeguard against future condemnation and wrath; so also the covenant with Abraham, because he has made good the perfect righteousness, by virtue of which a well-spring of life and blessing was opened for every race and generation of men; and so again, the covenant with David, because he is that horn of salvation raised up in David's house, who is to reign for ever over God's heritage, and who will reign till all his and their enemies are made his footstool. Finally, even the covenant of law may be said to have found its confirmation in Christ; for its high demands of righteousness were satisfied to the full by his obedience unto death, and the principles enshrined in its symbolical ritual were once for all established, though the external forms enshrining them, as being by their very nature of a provisional kind, were made to vanish away.

In New Testament scripture we read only of two covenants—the new and the old, the former brought in and established by the work of Christ, and the latter in consequence ceasing to exist. The relation between these covenants, and the necessity of the one giving way when the other was formally introduced, is the point that is argued at length in the epistle to the Hebrews, especially in ch. vii.—x. By the old in this case is meant the covenant of law, with all its outward institutions and corporeal services, ratified at Sinai as old, simply because in the order of time its full and formal ratification had taken place before the other was properly brought into formal operation. In general this old had existed from the first; and partial exhibitions had been given of it all along the world's history. It was involved in the promise of recovery given at the fall; for this contained in its bosom the whole work and issues of redemption. It was still, therefore, more distinctly indicated in the covenants made, first with Abraham and then with David; as is formally proved in several places by the inspired writers of the New Testament, Acts v. 29; vi. 28, 29. So that if one looks to the heart and substance of the matter, the covenant sealed by the blood of Christ, and with its glorious inheritance of blessings made sure in him to all the seed of believers, might justly be called the old covenant, in comparison of which the covenant of Sinai was of recent origin as well as of temporary duration. But in popular and common use of language this is employed to the more obvious respect of things; and as the covenant of law had run its course, and for many generations had held a prominent place in the minds of the people before the covenant of promise attained to its completeness, and received its proper establishment in Christ, so it naturally became known as the new, while that which it anticipated, and at the same time fulfilled, was designated the old.

This covenant of grace, whether in its more provisional forms, or now who brought to its complete and perfected state in Christ, mainly exhibits what God would do, or has done, for men, and as such may admit of being contrasted with the transaction at Sinai as a covenant in the stricter sense. There is such a contrast in Isa. iii. 15—18, where the revelation of law is called emphatically the covenant, while the exhibition of God's purpose of grace to Abraham, and confirmed in Christ, is represented as the word of promise, or simply the promise. And in a passage, Heb. ix. 15—17, which has given rise to a great deal of controversy, this new covenant, or covenant of promise, is presented in the light of a testament, or disposition of goods on the part of Christ the testator. This undoubtedly is the natural import of the language, and we are persuaded, is also its real meaning. The explanation is to be sought in the particular aspect under which in that part of the epistle the sacred writer contemplates the covenant. It is that which, as already noticed, led the ancient Greek interpreters to explain the term

Covenant of creation, disposition or testament, rather than service, compact, as the synonym for the Heb. beitah; viz. the prominent exhibition given in it to the grace and loving-kindness of God. It appeared more as God's revealed mode of disposing of his affairs for the good of his people, than a mutual engagement between him and them. The contracting element consequently retires into the background, and the beneficent alone becomes prominent. Hence, there is a real point of contact between the divine covenant and a human testament—an aspect common to them both, which is seized upon in affording an incidental illustration to the line of argument pursued in the epistle. A testator, who dispenses his goods by a regular will, must himself lose possession of them by death before the disposition takes effect; and Christ, as mediator of the new covenant, in reality its proper author, was substantially in the same position as regarded the bestowal of its blessings. These blessings were all his; so far as he was personally concerned he had them from the first in inexhaustible fulness; but only by faith in a screw-quillng possession of them, could he bestow on others a title to the inheritance of them; by death he must lose all, that they who lay under the ban of death might come in to inherit all. And thus the ideas of covenant and testament coalesce in the work of Christ; he is at once mediator and testator—by the same act establishing for ever what God pledged himself in covenant to provide, and transmitting to the members of his elect family the everlasting inheritance of life and blessing.

The passage just referred to in Hebrews is the only one in which the idea of testament is connected with מָשָׁה (mashah), and the only one where it should have been so translated. In all other passages where testament now stands, the term עָתָן (atah) should be substituted; and what we now call the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments had been more fully designated the Scriptures of the Old and New Covenants. The Vulgate by its use of testament in this place gave an unhapp)^ direction to the versions of modern Europe. In particular the words used by our Lord at the institution of the supper, should have been rendered, “This cup is the new covenant in my blood,” as this would far more readily, and without any danger of confusing the idea in people’s minds, have made manifest the reference intended to the better covenant, founded on better promises, which was to be confirmed by the blood of Christ. The employment of the term would also serve to keep in view what, doubtless, is designed not to be forgotten, the mutual engagement which still subsists, even in this higher covenant, between the Lord and his people. Comparatively speaking the contracting element may be said to have fallen into abeyance, but not absolutely; it is still there; and while the Lord engages to sustain a certain part toward his people, they, in return, stand engaged to sustain a corresponding part toward him. This does not warrant us to say that the fulfilling of their part in the covenant forms the end of it, in which they are not to expect the fulfilment of his. The proper representation rather is, that the performance of God’s part in bestowing the benefits of the covenant on those who really enter into it, carries along with it, as a necessary consequence, their reception of the gifts conferred, and their use of them into all righteous and beneficent ends. Where this latter is not done, it is a clear sign that the other has never actually been experienced; so that for any to imagine they are partakers of the covenant, while they are still leaving unfulfilled the holy ends at which it aims, is but to deceive themselves with a notion of blessing, without the corresponding reality.

COVENANT or OATH is a proverbial expression occasionally used in Scripture for a fixed and settled arrangement. Such being the great preservative in natural things, the antidote to corruption and decay, it is coupled with covenant to denote the perpetuity of what is promised. Thus the heave-offerings were said to be given to the family of Aaron by a covenant of salt, so will it be and the kingdom over Israel is, in like manner, said by Abijah to have been given to David and his sons forever, by a covenant of salt, 2Ch. 15:15—i.e. in other words, by a perpetual dedication.

CRACKNELS, a kind of cakes, baked hard, and somewhat resembling the harder sorts of biscuit among us, Acts 11:13.

CRANE (בִּרְנָא, B. xxviii. 11; y. s. Je viii. 7). A migratory bird with a sibilant voice, is indicated by these words; our crane answers well enough to the former requisite, but not to the latter, for its voice is a loud sibilant clangour. The LXX., however, render the word in each case by γαλαγω, swallow, which is more obviously migratory than the former, because much more familiarly known, and because its migrations are performed in large hosts, which assemble in the sight of man before they take their departure. Its voice, too, is a soft sibilant chattering, well expressed by the sound of the word νήσι,

All the species of swallow and swift, five in number, that are known in England, are common in Egypt and Palestine. As another word seems to designate the swift (or swallow), we may probably understand either the chimney-swallow (Hirundo rustica), or the house-martin (H. alchata) or possibly both may be included in an inclusive appellation. The former is probably partially migratory and partially permanent in Palestine. It is wholly migratory in A-in Minor, being seen only from April to October. In Abyssinia Bruce found it in winter. In Egypt it has been seen going south in autumn, while Napior, in his Reminiscences of Syria, records finding it near Esdrælon in December and January. Jehovah contrasts the instinctive knowledge and punctuality of these and other migrating birds with the stupidity and carelessness of his covenant people.

CREATION. A profound interest has ever attached to the subject expressed by this term, the human mind wherever raised to a true consciousness of itself being led by a kind of necessity to inquire into the nature and origin of the things around it. No ancient religion was complete without its cosmogony—a strong attestation to the fundamental character of the principle, however perverted in heathenism, which refers all things to God, and no philosophy could avoid speculating on the same grand and mysterious theme, rarely leaving however to satisfactory conclusions. The sacred books of the Hebrews, the most ancient literature extant, have also a cosmogony; but while all the other speculations of antiquity on this subject are now unheeded or forgotten, except as matters of curiosity, this possesses a vitality which has survived the greatest revolutions in human thoughts and feelings, and a power which no amount of resistance has succeeded in overcoming. In former times it was attempted, but unsuccessfully, to correlate this cosmogony to the level of those of heathenism, with which it has little in common; but more recently it has been subjected to another and severer ordeal by being confronted with the accumulated facts of modern science, basid with investigating the origin and history of the earth. The result to the Bible is, as might be expected, variously viewed, according to the qualifications and opportunities for judging, and even the prejudices of individuals; some without much scruple abandon the Hebrew narrative as an obsolete relic of the past, bearing, as they allege, the marks of immature knowledge or limited research, a product of the Egyptian learning of Moses or some equally questionable source. Others on the contrary have their faith in it as a divine testimony greatly confirmed; while a third and perhaps larger party have, from a supposed conflict of statements, various doubts awakened within them, and they are beset with difficulties which they are unable to solve. They cannot close their eyes to the irresistible evidence of science, which seems to conflict with some of the commonly understood statements of Scripture as to the age of the earth and its primeval condition, or stop their ears to the testimony of credible witnesses, who may be more conversant with scientific matters than themselves; and yet they are unwilling to discredit that time-honored record on which, as regards all other and far higher interests, they can implicitly rely.

It is this aspect of matters which has at present given an unprecedented interest to all that bears on the relation of reason and revelation in those points in particular where they come more immediately into contact, and renders more than ever necessary a calm review of the chief questions in dispute. But as it is to the doubting and perplexed, who still, however, retain a firm belief in the authority and inspiration of Genesis, that the following remarks are principally submitted, all questions as to the source whence Moses derived his cosmogony, or the mode in which it was communicated to him, may be dismissed as irrelevant; and so also the attempts, either prompted by hostility to the Bible or proceeding from ignorance of its character, to resolve its opening statements into myths or poetry, as incompatible with what is requisite to be, and as they are understood, in the subsequent inspired writings— a historical narration of the acts of the Almighty Creator, when he called the universe and the earth into being.

Having thus greatly narrowed the very extended field of inquiry, we proceed to examine some of the more important particulars in which the narrative of the creation in Genesis comes into contact, or as many allege into collision, with the authenticated facts of geology, physiology, and the kindred sciences. For greater distinctness an arrangement is adopted, which if not the most logical, yet admits of the greatest comprehension, beginning with some preliminary observations serviceable to the main discussion.

1. Source of Information—Reason and Revelation.—Any knowledge man may possess of the nature of creation, and the manner in which the universe or the earth was brought into its present condition and made the abode of life, must be derived solely from the communications of the Creator himself; for no human eye witnessed the operations, and no man's theory or speculation could ever attain to any certainty on the subject. The Creator has been pleased to make such communications: He has written the earth's history in indelible characters on its own rocky bosom; and although the writing had been long unsealed, it has at length attracted the notice of learned and inquiring minds, but this is not the only record of creation; there is another book in which it has also a place assigned to it by God. No inquirer after truth will do right if he neglect either the testimony of Scripture or the teaching of science; but it is of no less importance that he bear in mind the diversity of their ends, if he would arrive at the whole truth and avoid what must otherwise appear contradictions. The object of the Bible is not to teach science: its aim is moral and religious; but while it must of necessity impart such information as fully apprises man of the character of the Creator, and his own relation to him and to the creatures, it is obvious that it will be conveyed in a language immediately intelligible, and not in a form fitted only to bewildered minds unversed in the language of science. But though different in their ends, science and revelation cannot be hostile in their relation, seeing that if the one is a discovery of God through his works, the other is the discovery of God in his word. There may be, and no doubt are, misinterpretations of the language of the one as well as of the other, giving rise to apparent contradictions, not chargeable entirely, however, to the side of the biblical expositor; for there have been as many false theories in science as there have been faulty expositions of Scripture. But even as it is, the harmony is greater than the discord; and scripture exposition has certainly been benefited by the Bible being brought for a time into a supposed antagonism with science. A reference need only be made to the great Copernican controversy which agitated men's minds in the seventeenth century, which though now only provoking a smile at the obtuseness and obstinacy of theologians, was at the time no special indication of mental weakness or bigotry, but only afforded a proof that an adjustment cannot be immediately effected between a newly-discovered truth and all previous conceptions, yet in time such an adjustment was effected without any violence to the language of Scripture, may, rather with some advantage, in such a case, as part of its language was henceforth better understood.

It is also to be noted, that it is as little prejudicial to the character of Scripture as an inspired production, that its interpretation varies or advances with the amount of knowledge which, no doubt with other and higher requisites, the expositor at any time brings to bear upon it, as it is to the great phenomena of nature that they were long the subject of wild hypotheses, and are now only coming to be better understood—the only legitimate conclusion being that in neither case do there exist infallible interpreters. In these circumstances there need be no hesitation in admitting that there are contradictions on the subject of creation, not between the two records themselves, which cannot be, as having God for their common author, but between man's interpretations of them; but, at the same time, a most emphatic protest ought to be raised against the application of the epithet "irreconcilable" to such contradictions, as being a term unwarranted by experience, and but little consonant with the modesty of true philosophy. A man must have fully mastered all sciences, and be at the same time an infallible interpreter of God's Word, before he can venture on the use of such terms—qualifications somewhat surpassing even the attainments of those "completely informed persons of the present day," in whose minds, according to the testimony of Baden Powell, "the literal interpretation of the judicial cosmogony has died a natural death." (Unit of Words, p. 154.)

11. The Nature of Creation as deducible from Revelation and Science.—Taking "creation" in its highest sense of the origination of the material universe, it is admitted by the highest authorities (see Herzl, Poln. Lex., see Na., and, p. 291, to be a subject beyond the range of science; and even in its secondary meaning of the orderly arrangement of matter into the forms which it now presents, it comes only partially within its range. Geology can trace back the earth's history to a certain point, but beyond that it cannot penetrate; the first pages if ever written have been obliterated; and so the story record maintains a complete silence as to the world's birth. Nor is the evidence afforded by astronomy in any degree more explicit. No doubt there are not wanting theories, which as matters of probability may be entitled to more or less consideration; but it ought to be distinctly remembered that these are simply theories, and not authenticated facts.

Creation in the strictest sense can be known only from revelation. It is the Bible alone that can tell of the origin of the universe and of its great efficient Cause. "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God," etc.; and the testimony wherein faith relies is the declaration, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," etc. But although science can furnish no reliable information regarding that beginning, there are other beginnings of which it clearly testifies. It does teach that all the orders of life now in existence, and many older but now extinct, had a beginning; and the same also as regards the still more ancient sidereal motions which have gone on so long and so regularly. That the universe is not eternal is a truth fully established. So numerous and indubitable are the indications of beginnings of order and life, that this is now a demonstrated fact, no longer dependent on the subtleties of metaphysics, but on evidence patent to common sense and understanding. The "infinite series" of the atheists of former times can have no place in modern science; all organic existence, recent or extinct, vegetable or animal, have had their beginning; there was a time when they were not. The geologist can indicate that time, if not by years, at least by periods, and show what its relations were to the periods that went before and that came after; and as it is equally a recognized truth on both sides of the controversy, that as something now exists, something must have existed forever, and as it must now be not less surely recognized that something was not the race of man, nor yet any other of the many races of man's professors or contemporaries, the question, What then was that something? comes with a point and directness which it did not possess at any former time" (Mилъ, Testament of the Beings, p. 122, 194).

But while evolution must be the primary and in part the only source of information as to creation and the origin of things, it is important to keep in view what Scripture really does say upon the subject, and what it passes over in silence. Its several statements on the first of these points will come under consideration in a subsequent section; but in the meantime it will be necessary to determine how the act ascribed to the divine Being in the opening sentence of the Bible, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," granted that in itself the term does not absolutely deny or affirm the presence of pre-existing matter, and that this can be inferred only from the context or the subject treated of, the question comes to be, What can be the meaning of the term here? The expression, "In the beginning," evidently refers to the beginning of created existence, in contradistinction to the eternal being of the Creator, and is thus an absolute beginning. This then is a passage by itself and distinct from all others, and must be interpreted in accordance with the pure, absolute monotheism of the Hebrews, inculcated in no passage of Scripture more plainly than in the first sentence of Genesis. This is the distinguishing characteristic of the biblical creation, as opposed to all heathen cosmogonies and philosophical speculations, that it represents the pure and simple idea of a creation from nothing, without material matter and without demiurgic co-operation.

But with the exception of a-creating creation from the first act to the closing operation absolutely to God, and giving intimation of the order of the divine operations, particularly as regards the creation of man, Scripture maintains a remarkable reserve, not anticipating science or cramming human inquiry. As to the mode of the Creator's working in particular, there is an absolute silence; the record showing only that the several productions were pure efforts of the divine will, to which no resistance was offered. With this we must be satis-
CREATION

III. The Place of Creation in the Bible.—Those who would resolve the Mosaic narrative of creation into poetry and fables, or would otherwise set aside its statements, because a part merely of "a record of older and imperfect dispensations," adapted to the ideas and capacities of a peculiar people and a grossly ignorant age," cannot have deeply, if at all, reflected on the fundamental place which the doctrines here taught hold in the Bible, or on the character for truth and consistency which must belong to the imperfect equally with the perfect dispensation, if the God of truth be the author of both. This narrative, however, occupies no such isolated and unimportant place as many would assign to it; and its very position in the front of the Bible precisely indicates the relation of the doctrine therein taught to all revealed truth; for in every sense of the term, creation is the first revelation of God.

Here, however, it is of more importance to notice the relation of the first two chapters of Genesis to one another, because they are not unfrequently represented as containing two distinct and partly contradictory narratives of creation.

The first chapter, with the first three verses of the second, forms the narrative of creation properly so called—a continuous and entire scheme of creation in all its extent, and from the period when God summenced the universe down to the time when, having introduced man upon the earth, he ceased from the work of creation, pronouncing it to be all very good, and solemnized and sanctified the sabbath day, the rest of the Creator when his great work was done. The first narrative of the creation which has ever been admired for the sublimity of its style, and the felicity of its arrangement, is in one point of view complete in itself; but in respect to the purpose which seemed to be placed in the sacred Scriptures, it is defective. Its, indeed, intimates distinctly the high place occupied by man in the creation, but more explicit information was needed in order fully to explain his character and condition, and the particular constitution under which it pleased the Author of his being to place him; and hence the supplementary narrative which follows. The first then is a narrative of creation in all its parts; the second is a filling up or expansion of one of those parts, but so closely related to the first, that the reader, from the intimations therein contained, is led to anticipate such particulars, while on the other hand they are obviously required by the history which follows.

Any apparent contradictions between the first and the supplementary narrative are due entirely to the diversity of their aims, and consequently of their arrangement. In the first the order of time is strictly adhered to; but in the second this is subordinated to a grouping together of facts and statements, all of which are more or less related to man's creation and the provision, physical, moral, and social, made in his behalf.

It is necessary then to advert to the relation of the first two chapters of Genesis, inasmuch as the supplementary statements of the second are frequently too much overlooked in discussions of this kind, a circumstance which operates unfavourably on any judgment that may be formed of the character of the biblical creation, because it is thereby presented more in a physical or scientific relation, giving rise perhaps to the assumption that such information was unnecessary, than in the deep moral and religious aspect which the special account of man's location on the earth confers upon it. The second narrative will also be found serviceable in the exposition of various terms and statements of the first, particularly in showing that Scripture itself requires that the days of creation be taken in a wider sense than that usually assumed.

IV. The Time of Creation.—Not more clearly are the summers and winters which have passed over the head of man indicated by the altered features and the narrowed countenance, than is the hoar antiquity of the earth by the traces which time has imprinted upon it, but here the measure is not by seasons or even centuries, but by unknown and incalculable periods. Little more is needed in this place than simply to state the proposition—its evidences are so numerous, as well in the department of astronomy as of geology, and so familiar to all who have given any attention to the subject, and at the same time so irresistible, that it may be regarded as a first principle of science. The astronomer calculates from the known velocity of light that some of the stars reflected in his space-piercing spectacles, must have occupied their places in the heavens untold ages ere the light by which they are now revealed could have reached the earth. The geologist again, carrying his researches down to the bowels of the earth, sees creations superimposed upon creations in their now rocky squallers in a slow succeeding series; and each of which must, in their origin, progress, and decay, have occupied periods of which he will not attempt the calculation, but which nevertheless he does not hesitate to denote by millions and similar expressions indicative of a duration well fitted to overwhelm the mind, but for the refuge afforded by the consideration that there was still an eternity beyond the first creating act of the everlasting God.

The time when creation began and during which it continued being thus seen on indisputable evidence to be so inconceivably remote and immense, the conclusion is immediately felt to clash rudely with what we have been accustomed to regard as the teaching of Scripture on the subject of creation, when the earth was conceived of as not six days older than its first human inhabitant. No wonder then that men's minds were agitated on this subject, and that the well-stated position to the claims of our philosophy which called upon them summarily to abandon their cherished traditional belief, happily a better understanding at length prevails, and even this question of time has not the formidable aspect it once possessed. With regard indeed to the date of creation, the controversy may be said to be almost settled by the admission that Scripture gives no intimation whatever upon the subject. Neither in Genesis nor in any other passage is any determined period specified as that of the first creating act; the expression, "in the beginning," with which the volume of inspiration opens, leaving it altogether indefinite. It intimates only that the Creator, at some point in the slow of past duration, called into being things which previously had no existence. It expressly teaches, however, that the world is not eternal, that it had a commencement, but lives no limit to its age. So far is Scripture from limiting the past duration of the earth, that on the contrary there are many intimations of its high antiquity. "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth," Ps. cxlv. The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old," Rev. xiv. 11. And in particular Ps. cxlvii, entitled "A prayer of Moses the man of God," seems to assign an antiquity to creation exceeded only by the eternity of the Creator. "Before the mountains were brought forth, ever since thou hast formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, art thou God," ver. 6, where there seems also a distinction between the age of the mountains, or of the earth generally, and that of the world. It is the time occupied, however, in the process of creation, as indicated by science, that presents the greatest apparent contradiction to the biblical testimony. But it is of importance to premise the fact to be afterwards more fully considered that while geology demonstrates that creation must have been protracted through immense and immeasurable eras, it yet as unequivocally shows that its closing act, the introduction of man upon the earth, was at a comparatively recent period. This of itself goes far to harmonize the two testinies. There are other points of accordance to be afterwards stated, but this is perhaps the most valuable. The difficulty nevertheless remains, that the narrative of Genesis assigns six days to the work, while a passage in the deodog is even more express—"In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is," Ex. xx. 11.

To obviate this difficulty, various schemes of reconciliation have been proposed. The theory which for a time obtained most currency was that which limited the Mosaic narrative. In this account, the introduction of the present orders of plants and animals, with man at their head, a process which occupied six natural days; thus taking no account of the ancient creations or the vast periods which they disclose, and for which room was found prior to that cataclysmic state described in ver. 2, and after the period marked as the beginning. The idea was thus the total, or according to another modification of the theory, the partial wreck of the previous creation disclosed by geology, but of which Scripture takes no cognizance.

But of this scheme of reconciliation it is enough to remark that while in all its modifications, more particularly the latest, it offers considerable violence to the tenor of the original narrative, breaking up its continuity, and in various other respects putting a forced construction on some of its expressions, and still more to the language of the deodog; it is also open at variance with the testimony of the rocks. Geology shows unequivocally that between the system of organized beings to which man belongs, and the ages immediately preceding, there is no such break as that supposed. "It is a great fact, now fully established in the course of geological discovery, that between the plants which in the present time cover the earth, and the animals which inhabit it, and the animals and plants of the later extinct creations, there occurred no break or blank, but that, on the contrary, many of the existing organisms were contemporary during the morning of their being with many of the extinct ones during the evening of theirs. We know further that not a few of the shells which now live on our coast, and several of even the wild animals which continue to survive amid our tracts of hill and forest, were in existence many ages ere the human age began" (Miller, Theory of the Rocks, p. 121). Indeed, the whole evidence of geology is against this scheme (see the article Geology). In these circumstances it is unadvisedly abandoned by all who have given careful attention to the subject, for some other more adequate to the necessities of the case; and that we take to be the assumption that the days of creation are not simple, natural days, but that they symbolically represent indeterminate periods.

It is not a little favourable to this view to find that it was in some degree entertained long before the difficulties of geology were felt, and its exigencies and demands on time could possibly bias the judgment of the biblical expositor. As early as the time of the fathers this view extensively prevailed; as may be seen in the writings of Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, Augustine, Ambrose, and others. Augustine's words are: "Qui dies exquisi-endi sit, ant pertullifit-nis ant etiam impossibile est cogitare, quanto magis dievo," (De civi, vii., 5, while Ambrose considers the way in which the first, or rather the one day, as he remarks, is spoken of, as "propter et praeconatus sermonis Nicolet, 1. 39. These matters, whether well or ill founded, must certainly have originated in considerations connected with the narrative itself, and they are at least not open to the objections which, with some show of reason, may be brought against the modern expositor, of having his excesses influenced by extraneous forces objections however invalid in themselves yet exciting prejudices, and which it is well to have removed in this satisfactory way.

The scriptural evidences for warranting the extension of the days of creation are not confined to any number of ordinary or natural days, and for taking them in a figurative or symbolical sense, may be stated thus:

1. The term "day" is frequently used figuratively, perhaps in all languages, and symbolically in the Bible, to denote a much longer measure of time. Examples of its figurative use in the Mosaic writings are: "The Lord shall cover him all the day long, be with him, and, "As thy days so shall the strength be," ver. 25. Other instances of this usage are the expressions, "the day of Jehovah," 1 Kings xix. 21, the appointed time for the manifestation of his power; and, "the day of salvation," 2 Cor. ii. 10. Of course the mention of evening and morning falls in quite naturally with this interpretation, and is nowhere opposed to it, as sometimes erroneously deemed. For an example of this figurative application of the terms see Ge. xix. 27. Examples of the symbolical use of the word "day," by which it is made the representative of a higher period, are also frequent in the prophetic writings, particularly those of Daniel: on the principle no doubt that for the time being, divine Wisdom saw it meet not to determine more distinctly the periods thus indicated—a principle applicable it might be shown to the revelation of past time no less than future, especially in such a case as the present.

But without determining whether the days are to be understood in a figurative or symbolic sense, for either supposition sufficiently answers the requirements of the case, it may be remarked that in the narrative of the creation itself, and within the compass of a single verse, the word \textit{day} is used in two senses: the period during which light prevails, and the periods of creation whatever the case may be; while it is further to be observed that not until the adjustment of the celestial luminaries on the fourth, did they exist measures of time, and accordingly there was nothing to indicate the duration of the first three days in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Of the duration of those earlier days at least nothing is or could be determined; the only thing noticed is the order of succession, as each day followed the other, but separately by an interval, denoting probably an intention of creating creatures and during which it may be supposed they occurred the gradual extinctions of the first created forms. Indeed it is enough to remark that these were God's days, measured only by him with whom "a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night," \textit{Is.} xx. 3.

2. But not only does it appear from the general usage of Scripture, and from considerations connected with this narrative itself, that the days of creation need not necessarily be limited to days of twenty-four hours, there are other considerations proving that they must be taken in an extended sense. The first that deserves notice is the work assigned to the third day, consisting of two distinct acts: gathering together the waters, so as to lay bare a portion of the earth's surface; and then clothing this dry land with vegetation. Excluding entirely for the present all ideas of second causes, through which it may be conceived were produced the inequalities on the earth's surface to which the relative distribution of land and water is due, and supposing it the result altogether of a miraculous agency, there must, on the supposition that it was a sudden act, or one limited to twelve or even many times twenty-four hours, be such an accumulation of miracles involving such a suspension of all the previous laws of nature as is utterly perplexing to the mind. There must have been the application of forces not only sufficient to elevate the great mountain masses, and then suddenly to restore the equilibrium of the immense body of water so violently put in motion, there must also have been a supernatural process to dry the sea for the reception of vegetable life. These results may be conceivable as the effects of Omnipotence, but the processes are not easily reconciled with the analogy of the divine working as indicated in Scripture, nor even with the spirit of this very narrative, which although it does not specify, yet certainly does not exclude the application of second causes, as appears from the inspired commentary of the writer of Psalm cxxi., where distinct reference is made to the convulsions and much havoc through which a separation was effected between the land and water.

The difficulty now stated is not of recent origin, nor owing to any conflict between geology and the biblical creation: it was felt by the older expositors; and even by the rabbinical writers, who in order to enlarge the time of those stupendous operations, referred, by some forced philological rule, their commencement to the second day (see Gesenius, 	extit{Crit. Sacrit}, but without any advantage really resulting from such an infinitesimal addition of time.

Another circumstance of the same character as to its demands on time, is the exercise assigned to Adam of bestowing names upon the animal creation, and which must have been begun and finished on the sixth day, or more strictly in the interval which elapsed between his own creation, which had been preceded on the same day by that of the animals, and the creation of Eve, which was also comprised in the work of the sixth day. This is even a stronger case than the preceding, inasmuch as it cannot be disposed of by a reference to the miraculous. God can effect his works instantaneously, but man requires time for his exercises and operations; so that whatever may be assumed as to the capacities and intellectual apprehensions of fallen man, of the exercise to which he was here called, however limited may have been its extent as regard the number of species to be reviewed and named, or whatever may have been its intended purpose, it is difficult to conceive how it could be completed within the space of a few hours, which is all that can be assumed if the sixth day on which all those events occurred was simply a natural day.

If there are thus in the narrative circumstances demanding an extension of the days beyond the usual acceptation, there is nothing to indicate them in any way peculiar, and the full force of which could be seen only when in due time their meaning came to be thus apprehended: besides the peculiarity already adverted to, of days before the existence of that arrangement by which days are now alone constituted, there are special characteristics attached to the first and seventh days, the initial and concluding terms of the series. The day which witnessed the beginning of creation is designated by the cardinal \textit{one}, and not by the ordinal \textit{first}. "It was evening, it was morning, one day." This peculiarity, so unusual in the language of number, arrested the attention of Josephus (\textit{Ant.} i. 13), Philo (the \textit{Opit. Mundi}, sect. 9), and several of the Christian fathers, and has been variously explained. It will be found however, from a careful examination of the use of this Hebrew numeral, that the only admissible conclusion is, that it must be here taken in its usual sense of designating by way of pre-eminence something \textit{more or remarkable}, see \textit{Ex.} xi. 6; \textit{Cir.} ii. 3; \textit{Is.} viii. 3, and intended to indicate that the evening and the morning spoken of belonged not to an ordinary, but to a peculiar day; in fact, to a period of indefinite duration. This conclusion is not a little strengthened by the recurrence of the same remarkable expression "one day" in one other passage of Scripture, and in a connection which leaves no doubt that it is the designation of a period—the millennium, as some suppose, \textit{Zec.} xiv. 7. "There shall be one day it is known to Jehovah when it shall not be day and night; for at the evening time there shall be light." The day has announced is altogether peculiar: the only one of its kind which shall dawn upon humanity: its peculiarity will consist in the absence of the usual alternations of day and night, of course in a moral sense. Now if prophecy which scans the far distant future has a day peculiarly its own, is there anything incredible in the supposition that creation may have also its peculiar day, seeing that its days nearly all terminated long ere man existed or his history began, and must accordingly in this instance, no less than in the other, be a day "known to Jehovah," and by implication to him alone. History unpretendingly is not to be interpreted as prophecy, for the language and symbolism in the two cases are distinct, but God's own record of his creating processes differs from all other history, and in its character it may differ so also in its chronology. This distinction efficaciously disperses an inconsistency sometimes charged upon the Scripture interpreter of dropping this peculiar use of the word day at the close of the narrative of creation, and not carrying it forward into his exposition of the subsequent history, which it ought to be seen was written upon different principles, as the events it records occurred under widely different conditions. But still more noticeable is the manner in which the seventh day is described in the history of the creation. If anywhere in Scripture there is intimation that the days of creation exceeded in duration man's brief days, there is certainly such in the passage which describes the sabbling rest of the Creator when his great work was finished, v. 2. From the references elsewhere in Scripture to this rest as the great end of the creation and the consummation of the creature's happiness in and with God—"Reposis Dei requiesci signum erat"—(as Augustine (De civ. vi. 7) remarks) long age, sufficient light is thrown upon its nature and consequent duration to prevent us conceiving it as congeant with man's present short and troubled Sabbath. The letter is but a faint and inadequate type of the rest that remaneth for the people of God, if. 10. vi. and into which the Creator himself entered when he ceased from adding to the material creation, in order to carry on the moral and spiritual government of the world, a proper subject being found in man, created in God's own image, and the restoration of whom from the ruins of the fall, is in reality "a new creation," 2 Cor. v. 17, raising man to a higher platform of life than that on which the first or material creation placed him.

It fully records with this view to find that with respect to the seventh day the法律法规fully in the other cases: "It was evening, it was morning," is here wanting. It could not be employed, because God's sabbath extends over the whole present order of things, and has not yet come to a close. God rested from the work of creation: and neither reason nor revelation gives any hint that that work has ever been resumed.

Now, if such be God's sabbathday, the seventh, or close of the creating week, analogy, and every principle of sound interpretation, require that the week itself, and the days of which it was composed, be thus indefinitely extended, and regarded as God's week and working days, and in no sense commensurate with those of man. Man's days are only a derivation and symbol of those of Christ's, working upon the earth, of which he himself said, "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work." There is no weight whatever in the objection that this view makes void the law of the sabbath, for "it is not the absolute length of the days of creation, but their number and order that constitutes the essential character of the narrative in its relation to the institution of the sabbath." In the two cases the proportion is alike, but in the one it is, as was suitable to the subject of the law, upon a very minute scale. While it was chiefly man, as is plain from the sabbatical institution, irrespective of other considerations, that these consecutive but long prospective operations regarded, it is not less an evidence of wisdom and goodness, that when they were revealed so as to constitute a foundation for the sabbath, God chose for denoting them that division of time which most readily presents itself to the human apprehension, instead of perplexing the mind with the actual notation of ages upon ages which a more advanced state of knowledge would discover and also more fully comprehend. (Second ed., Miller's Footnotes of the Creators, &c. 1815, p. 350.)

V. The God of Creation. The elevation of science touching the order in which the course of creation proceeded are in remarkable harmony with the statements of Scripture.

1. The first point worthy of notice is that the Mosaic narrative intimates that "the heavens and the earth," which is the common Hebrew designation of the material universe, was contemporaneous or, they are not merely the object of a common cause, but are in fact of one and the same act. Other passages of Scripture observe the same connection, and the same relation of time, sects. cts. Indeed, it is one of the great objects of Scripture to teach the close relationship between all the parts of creation as the productions of the same divine Mind. All the orbs of space, whether seen by the eye or disclosed only by the telescope, were created simultaneously, with our own planet. The work assigned to the fourth day in no way conflicts with this statement, as will be shown below. The relation thus declared by revelation is fully corroborated by the testimony of science, which distinctly shows that such is the connection of the parts, that if not created at the same time they must at least have had contemporaneously impressed upon them their present form and motions.

2. The next stage in which the work of creation is presented exhibits the "earth" for it is with it only that the narrative has chiefly to do as "without form and void," entirely desolate and waste of inhabited, shrouded in the primal darkness, and wrapped up in a universal ocean. There was no life, vegetable or animal; even the first conditions of life were wanting. Light was the next product of creative Omnipotence; and to this succeeded the atmospheric arrangement, the formation of the "firmament," or rather, according to the Hebrew—the former term involving a fiction of the Greek philosophy—the σύρωμα, the canopy of sky overhead and which supports the clouds or "the waters above the heavens." (See PERMMENT.) Here, however, must be noticed the distinction made in Hebrew between light in itself, and the bodies into which it is collected or from which it is emitted; the terms being distinct; thus intimating, when viewed in connection with the notice of the creation of light on the first day, and its concentration into the heavenly orbs not until the fourth, the fact, only recently recognized by science, that there is no necessary connection between light and those luminaries. This is, if known to the scientists, should certainly silence that shallow criticism and philosophy which finds a notable instance of ignorance of the laws of nature displayed by this narrative when it makes vegetation to precede the sun. The planetary bodies created and ended with motion round their own centres, and in an orbital path, were no doubt, like the earth itself, undergoing preparation for their appointed services, although of this the narrative takes no notice, save only that on the fourth day the light, perhaps previously diffused through space, was collected into those central orbs, around which their dependent systems led from the first revolved, although now in a new relation.

In all these particulars, the testimony of science is exceedingly distinct, and in complete harmony with the statements of Scripture. It tells that light is not merely the first condition of life, but also of inorganic form. In the process of crystallization its power is particularly marked, and in all the molecular arrangements of the mineral masses which so largely constitute the framework of the earth its rocks and mountains. Indeed, it may be said, the absence of this universal agent would restore again the old chaotic state of things. How strikingly harmonious with the deductions of science, to find that in the Bible the first place is assigned to its creation! The same may be said also with respect to the atmospheric arrangements which succeeded the creation of light. Without the existence of the atmosphere, so wisely tempered for the support of life, and so adapted for its other important offices in the economy of nature, there could be no life even in the lowest form, and no enjoyment: no sound even could issue from the wide wastes of earth, and no light could be diffused over its surface. Therefore was it created next in order to light: and therefore its place so precise and appropriate in the Mosaic narrative of the creation.

3. But the course of creation proceeds. The arrangement of the earth's surface was the next thing effected. The universal ocean was on the third day brought within limits, and the dry land made to emerge from its previous watery covering. How this was effected Scripture does not say; but here it is that the domain of science first properly begins. At this stage of the creating processes commenced the action of those mighty and long-continued forces, the evidences of which are seen everywhere in the dissected crust of the earth, and which caused the dry land to appear: first probably in the form of rocky islets gradually raising their heads above the surrounding water, growing in extent, and becoming more and more connected, until what was at first groups of rocky points attained the character of continents. There may not be sufficient evidence to connect the primary formation of the geologist with the first dry land, for at these great depths of creation the light is still very obscure; but according to the Scripture narrative, no sooner is the dry land snatched from the deep than it is clothed with vegetation—the first and lowest form of life. The work of the fourth day was that arrangement of the heavenly bodies which constituted them luminaries—not their creation or motions—for that was the work of the beginning, or at least of the first day.

This was followed by the creative mandate of the fifth day, which replenished the waters with its various forms of animal life, and the air also with its winged tenants; but as the priority of vegetable life and its separation from the animal creation by the intervention of a whole day or period are points on which geology, it may be thought, pronounces a contrary judgment, some further remarks must be made upon the subject.

Till very recently geologists were unable to find traces of a primary vegetable formation of so old a date as the animal remains of a low type of life certainly, which occurred extensively in the lower strata. Now, however, the further progress of the science furnishes evidence of vegetable life as early as any animal existence. "So far as yet known plants and animals appear together" (Miller, Testimony of the Rocks, p. 173). Without attaching any weight to the position thus hatterly assigned to the plant, or to the probability to which it gives rise, that further discovery may detect a vegetable creation long prior to animal life, it will be enough if the absence of vegetable remains from the lower strata can be shown not to be inconsistent with the existence of a flora on the earth; and if, on the other hand, it can from independent testimony be shown that the place of the plant in the creation must have been such as is announced in Genesis. As to the first of these points, let it be observed that as the stratified rocks were formed at the bottom of the ocean, and often at great depths, terrestrial plants can be expected to occur only rarely; while the rarity of marine plants is accounted for by the fact that they are mostlyنت, or confined to rocky shores; while further, the cellular structure of the earlier plants was very unfavorable to their preservation, the contrary being the case with the early forms of animal life. As to the other point, this general consideration need only be urged, that vegetation is the ultimate support of animal life, and therefore must have preceded it. (See Professor Dana, Science and the Bible, Biblioth. Soc. Jan. 1840, p. 16.)

4. But if, on the question now considered, science refuses to pronounce a judgment, her utterances are full and explicit regarding the succession of the subsequent creating acts. Animal life began in the waters. The work of the fifth day perfected that of the second, which consisted in the partial adjustment of the waters by the superimposed atmosphere; and as these two elements were, through the intervening arrangements, prepared for the reception of life, they are duly peopled with their respective tenants—the waters with "the moving creature that hath life"—"the rapidly multiplying or swarming creatures, as they are characteristically termed in the Hebrew, and the air with the "winged creatures," or birds.

It was not until the next day of creation, however, that the dry land was peopled with animals properly its own—the mammiferous quadrupeds: a far higher form of life than anything that preceded. This day too witnessed the introduction of man—a being differing entirely from all the preceding creations, and divinely constituted their sovereign.

As regards the particulars now stated, the order of Genesis is strictly the order of geology; here there is no uncertain or discordant note. There is not only a harmony in the general testimony that the successive changes through which the earth has passed have been improvements in its condition and capabilities as a habitable world, but also in the specific evidence as to the order in which its various inhabitants have been introduced. According to the testimony of science, no less than of Scripture, the fish preceded the reptile and the bird, and these again preceded the mammiferous quadruped, while it again preceded man (Miller, Footprints of the Creator, p. 270). The two records in fact here run parallel; there is no conflict, not even an apparent contradiction. Excluding the question of time there is no appearance of contradiction from the first announcement of the Creator's work down to the close, when everything was found to be very good; and if this question can be settled in a way which shall accord with the facts of science, and without violence to the language of revelation, the accordance will be such as must satisfy every mind that the information communicated in the first chapter of Genesis is not the result of man's reasonings or imaginings, but must have come directly from God. Still more marked is the harmony of the two records with respect to man's creation. His place in the course as well as in the economy of nature, the only point which remains to be considered.

VI. Man's Place in Creation. The manner in which the account of man's creation is introduced, and the space which it occupies in the record, bespeak for him at once a place peculiar and apart from all preceding creatures. The distinguishing dignity bestowed on man by his creation in the image of God, with his consequent relation to the Creator and Ruler of the world, ranks him in a high position, but as these more properly belong to another department, it is only in its physical aspect that the subject falls to be considered here.

1. Man the End of Creation. As reason and revelation unite in testifying that creative energy upon the earth proceeded on the principle of progress, so also they unite in the affirmation that it was consummated in man. This progression is seen to have been divinely predetermined, and man's place in it is the termination of a process which had been going on since the dawn of creation. (Whitby, op. cit., p. 221.) The very first organization being as it were a prophecy of the last. In remarkable accordance with this analogy presented in nature is the language of the poet: "I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works: and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect: and in thy book all are written, which in continuance were wrought, when as yet there was none of them." Man is the perfection and summary of all preceding organization. Beyond this, according to the divine predetermination, creation cannot reach; no succeeding dynasty on the earth can supersede the human race.

2. Man's Creation Limited to a Single Pair. Where, or in what numbers the various species preceding the creation of man, whether vegetable or animal, were introduced, Scripture affirms nothing. If in these cases science can show that there were various centres of creation, the fact may be readily accepted as one to which revelation offers not the slightest opposition. It is quite different, however, with the theories which would deny a common origin to the human race, for upon this point the language of Scripture is explicit. The account of man's creation in Genesis, with the derivation of the whole human race, however widely diversified, from one ancestral pair, is a truth repeatedly reaffirmed in the Old and New Testaments, and indeed constitutes one of the highest principles of Christianity, being, if not the very foundation, yet an essential element of the doctrine of the atonement, (see Matt. xvi. 18; Acts xvi. 31; Rom. i. 15, 16.) No doubt numerous appearances in natural history are strongly opposed to the doctrine of the origin of the human species, and several distinguished writers have boldly challenged its correctness. But with every disposition on the part of some of the opponents to strain to the utmost every fact and phenomenon in natural and civil history which in any way favour their own conclusions, the falsity of the doctrine has never been established. The common origin of mankind has been questioned, but not disproved. And until such is the case, no valid objection can lie against the biblical statement on the subject. Indeed, it may be added that the probabilities against such a conclusion are increasing with the advance of science, and that the difficulties which at one time threatened to be insuperable are being gradually lessened, and the problem is thus so far simplified that the unity of mankind can now scarcely be maintained to involve an improbability. In this, as in other respects, the conclusion is evidently tending to the establishment of the principle, that "common ideas underlie the whole system of the universe, declaring a unity of nature parallel with the unity of the Infinite Author." (See Paley, thoughts on "species," which were ed. 1850, p. 25.) It may indeed be difficult to show how the many and marked differences which characterize different families of mankind could have arisen, and how they have become so intensely fixed as they prove to be; yet it will be more difficult to explain the close affinities, physical, intellectual, and moral, which link together all the tribes of mankind, if a common origin be denied to them. "In the case of man," asks R. F. Powell, "they have occurred as transitional varieties, how comes it that they have become so unutterably permanent? And if these changes have all occurred within the lapse of a few thousand years of the received chronology, it cannot with any reason be denied that similar changes might occur among inferior animals, and become as permanent: And if so, changes to an infinitely greater extent might occur in indefinite lapses of time. If these changes take place by the gradual operation of natural causes, it would be preposterous to deny the possibility of equal or greater changes by equally natural causes, in other species in small or greater periods of time. The advocates of the fixity of species would argue that the single spot on a butterfly's wing, which constitutes a species, never has changed, and never can change without a miracle; and yet the vast differences between a European and a Negro or Australian are mere modifications of one parent stock by natural causes in the lapse of a few thousand years!"

This reasoning is not so triumphant as its author seems obviously to entertain. It reduces the controversy entirely to a question of natural history; takes no account whatever of moral considerations, or the disparity between man and all the lower animals, giving rise in the one case to causes different, not only in degree but in kind, from those which could possibly operate in the other. It is admitted by naturalists (Cuvier, rails of Man, and of p. 299, that the diversity of races has greatly contributed to the dispersion of man over the earth, and designed, as Scripture testifies he was, for this universal diffusion, Gen. x. 2, he was also, no doubt, fitted for inhabiting all climates and countries, a wide and diversified range of existence. So that thus, even physically viewed, man differs from all other creatures; the nearest approach to him in this respect being his constant and faithful attendant, the dog, which is as noted for its varieties as man himself. The question is, however, of too wide a compass to be adequately discussed here.

But admitting that natural causes, however long they may have operated, cannot adequately explain the present appearances, there is no alternative, if we exclude the development theory that men grew up in more or less favoured circumstances from the next lower animals, but in such a way that the one animal becomes the seed of another, direct divine interpositions. The opponents of specific unity refer the diversities to distinct acts of creation. But is this necessary? or is it philosophical to call in the aid of a greater cause, when it cannot be proved that a less may not suffice? If recourse must be had to supernatural causes, which we are far indeed from denying, it is more reasonable to conclude that the Creator originally implanted certain predispositions to be manifested in the progress of the race, or that he introduced at a subsequent period changes to facilitate the dispersion of the nations, than that by distinct acts of creation he constituted the varieties. A very strong presumption in favour of this supposition is the gradual transition through which the several varieties of the human race are shaded off from one another, preventing the naturalist from arriving at any definite conclusions regarding their number. Looking at the extreme types only, it may occasion considerable doubt whether any of these could originate from one another. Further observation, however, shows that between these extremes, whether of line or anatomical structure, there are motes where the transitions proceed by insensible gradations. This leads to the conclusion either that the races of man must be indefinitely multiplied or that they were originally one. "There is, I conceive," says Dr. Pickering, "no middle ground between the admission of eleven distinct species in the human family and the reduction to one" (Races of Man, p. 329).

3. Man Introduced Into a World Already the Scene of Death. No intimation of geology is supported by better evidence than that which declares that death had been in active operation on the earth long before the creation of man; that whole creations had lived and died; that then as now, birth, growth, and dissolution succeeded one another in a continued round; and that, as at present, one part of creation warred with and preyed upon another. In the whole past record of life on the earth there is no indication of a time when death’s ravages were unknown, whether operating by natural decay, or by violent convulsions and catastrophes of nature. Physiology, moreover, pronounces this to be a universal and necessary law of organized life, and a wise and benevolent provision in such a world as ours.

These conclusions have greatly disturbed the minds of many who fancy they find in them a discrepancy with the sacred record, which connects death with the apostasy of man. Such, however, have really no ground for alarm, for there is no discrepancy whatever between science and Scripture on this subject. The Bible certainly and most distinctly teaches that the death which man experiences came upon him because of his transgression, Gen. 3:12, 1 Cor. 15:21; but nowhere does it give the least intimation that the death of the inferior animals is connected with that event, its language being, in every instance where it refers to death, limited entirely to man. As regards its power over the inferior creatures Scripture gives no express testimony, yet its existence may be considered as tacitly assumed in the history of creation.

But although, as already remarked, death is in the present state of being a necessary law of all organized life, whether it be viewed in connection with the law of assimilation, the process by which plants and animals separate their appropriate food from all other particles of matter on which depends their growth and also their decay, or with the law of the propagation of the race, this furnishes no argument against the immortality which, on the testimony of Scripture, would have been bestowed on man had he obeyed the law of his Creator. How this could have been, it would be presumptions to denominate; and yet, to the believer, it need not occasion any serious difficulty. There might have been some provision in man’s original constitution fitted to counteract all tendency to decay; while doubtless there would have been some divine interposition by which from time to time the successive generations would have been renewed without tasting death to other scenes of existence. Something confirmatory of or analogous to this has been already presented in the history of mankind in the translations of Eloch and Elighah, and examples on a far larger scale are predicted for the future at the conclusion of the present dispensation. (Gen. ix. 26.)

4. Man’s Creation a recent Event. — Geology shows that man’s creation is not only the last term of the creative series, but also that it is a very recent event, as compared with the great periods which preceded and the creations to which they gave birth. Among all the facts of geology there appears to be none better established than this. To adduce only the testimony of Lyell—"I need not dwell on the proofs of the low antiquity of our species, for it is not controverted by any experienced geologist; indeed, the real difficulty consists in tracing back the signs of man’s existence on the earth to that comparatively modern period when species, now his contemporaries, began greatly to predominate. If there be a difference of opinion respecting the occurrence in certain deposits of the remains of man and his works, it is always in reference to strata confessedly of the most modern order; and it is never pretended that our race co-existed with assemblages of animals and plants, of which all, or even a large proportion of the species, are extinct" (Principles of Geology, 5th ed., p. 177, 178).

This might have sufficed regarding the point, but for the attempt to get rid of this testimony because of its negative character. Thus Baden Powell—"The prevalent belief in the very recent origin of man, geologically speaking, depends wholly on negative evidence. And there seems no reason, from any good analogy, why human remains might not be found in deposits corresponding to periods immensely more remote than commonly supposed, when the earth was in all respects equally well suited for human habitation. And if such remains were to occur, it is equally accordant with all analogy to expect that they might be those of an extinct and lower species. The only real distinction in the history of creation which marks a supposed ‘human epoch,’ is not the first introduction of the animal into in however high a state of organization, but the endowment of that animal with the gift of a moral and spiritual nature. It is a perfectly conceivable idea that a lower species of the human race might have existed destitute of this endowment." (Unity of Worlds, p. 351, 352.) CRETE, now Candia, a large island in the Egean section of the Mediterranean, off the Peloponnesus. The length of the island is given by Pliny at 270 Roman miles, but this is much too large; it is only about 158 miles English. It is comparatively narrow in breadth, varying from 8 to 28 English miles. It is broadest in the middle. The island is very mountains, having a continuous mass of high land stretching along the entire length, intersected by many steep and fertile valleys. Near the middle the mountain peaks rise to the height of 764 feet, several of which belong to the famous Mount Ida. The greater part of these mountains are clothed with forests of olive, chestnut, walnut, and pine trees, oaks and cypress. They contain a number of remarkable caverns and grottoes, including the famous Labyrinth of antiquity, an extensive and intricate natural cavern, entered at the foot of Mount Ida. It was in Crete that the scene was laid of many fabrications in Grecian mythology; in particular, it was looked to be the birthplace, as well as to possess the tomb, of the "father of gods and men," and in connection with King Minos gave rise to whole series of legends respecting the upper and nether worlds. In civil matters Crete was like a world by itself: it stood aloof from the states of Greece in their great wars and conflicts; but being itself divided into several independent states, each with their little capital and senate, these often carried on war with one another. When assailed from without, however, the common patriotism pulled the people together, and all united in defence of their mother country. This expression itself ἔθνος, mother-country, was a Cretan word. In the course of time it fell with all the other states and islands in that part of the world under the sway of Rome, and together with Greece formed a Roman province. This took place upwards of half a century before the Christian era; and from the time of Augustus, it was a senatorial province, governed by a procurator. The Cretans had a name in ancient times for being good sailors, for which their insular situation furnished them with peculiar advantages; also for their skill in archery, and expertise in ambushing. Hence they were frequently engaged as light-armed troops in the employ of other states. Their moral character, however, does not appear to have ever stood high, and the testimony of a native Cretean, as quoted by the apostle Paul, places them very low in the scale of intelligence and probity: "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, idle brutes, slow bellies." That is, lying, gawdelling, lazy ceremonizers. This was written in the sixth century before Christ by Epimenides, a native of Gnosus near Knossus in Crete; but the first part of the quotation, ἐὰν ἔρειν ἐξ ὀρείου, being also found in Calimachus the Cyrenian, the entire passage was sometimes attributed by mistake to him. The first part of the description, indeed, was so frequently applied to the Cretans, that Kôpýrē, to speak the Cretean, was regarded as a sort of synonym by ἐξ ὀρείου, to speak the liar. The classics abound with allusions to this characteristic; as Ovid, when wishing to gain credit for what he asserts, says that even Crete, though noted for its lying pyanacis sit mundacis, could not deny it (Ex. An. 1. 28), or again, when referring to Crete witnesses, he throws in the sarcastic remark, that Cretans do not always lie (ἐν ὁμιλίας), and Lucan deems it enough to stamp the untrustworthiness of Egypt, to say that she is as mendacious as Crete (1.581-593). Plato distinguishes be-between Laobocianus and Cretan, by describing the one as cultivating brevity of speech, προσοχή λαμά, and the other, not so much multiplicity of words, as multiplicity of thoughts, παντοφαίνει μελώς ἵππολευος (Eur. in p. 250), a facility in stating the thought to the occasion. Heathen authors have dwelt less upon the other tendencies of the Cretans referred to by the apostle, and we may hence naturally infer that they did not form quite so marked and general a characteristic. That they prevailed to a very considerable extent, there can be no doubt; as the apostle himself had good opportunities for judging. It is clear that he personally laboured for a time on the island, as he speaks of having left Titus there, not to commence a new work, but to carry forward what the apostle had begun, and complete the organization of the Christian churches, 2 Tim. 1:3. He did not despair of the gospel even on so corrupt a soil; but charged it the more earnestly on believers, that the very prevalence of corruption should have the effect of making them the more watchful of their behaviour and exemplary in their conduct.

Mention is made of Crete in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck. Contrary winds preventing the voyagers from continuing their direct course on the north side of the island, they sailed southward, rounding Cape Salmana, the eastern promontory of Crete, and took shelter in the Fair Havens, near Cape Matala. Afterwards, in endeavouring to make for Phoenice (now Port Latros), a more secure and commodious harbour farther west, they were driven off the coast by a violent storm, and passing under the small island of Chania were carried to Malta. (See Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul.)

CRISPUS, a ruler in the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, and one of those who were converted to the faith of Christ by the ministry of Paul, Acts viii. 13-17. As he and his household had been baptized by the apostle, we may suppose they were among the earlier converts.

CROSS. CRUCIFY. The Greek word for cross, ἁρπαξ, properly signified a stake, an upright pole, or piece of paling, on which anything might be hung, or which might be used in impaling a piece of ground. But a modification was introduced as the dominion and usage of Rome extended themselves through Greek-speaking countries. Even amongst the Romans the crex (from which our cross is derived) appears to have been originally an upright pole, and this always remained the more prominent part. But from the time that it began to be used as an instrument of punishment, a transverse piece of wood was commonly added; not, however, always even then. For it would seem that there were more kinds of death than one by the cross; this being sometimes accomplished by transfixing the criminal with a pole, which was run through his back and spine, and came out at his mouth about per medium hominem, qui per os emergat, stipiteum, Seneca, Ep. xvi. In another place (Consol. ad Marcianum, xvi), Seneca mentions three different forms: "I see," says he, "three crosses, not indeed of one sort, but fashioned in different ways; one sort suspending by the head perpendicular toward the earth, others transfixing them through their secret parts, others extending their arms on a paltabulum." There can be no doubt, however, that the latter sort was the more common, and that about the period of the gospel age crucifixion was usually accomplished by suspending the criminal on a cross piece of wood.

But this does not of itself determine the precise form of the cross; for crosses of three different shapes were known to have been in use. One, and that probably the most ancient, was in the form of the letter T, which as commonly written consisted simply of a perpendicular line with another laid across the top, making two right angles, T. In the earlier Christian writers this letter is often referred to as a symbol of the cross, and, on account of such a resemblance, Lucian, in his usual style, prefers a charge against the letter (Dial. soc. xii). The letter X represents another sort, which has received the name of St. Andrew, from a tradition that on a cross of this description the apostle of that name suffered martyrdom. But the commonest form, it is understood, was that in which the upright piece of wood was crossed by another, so that the top, but not precisely of it, the upright pole running above the other, thus + — and so making four, not merely two right angles. It was on a cross of this form, according to the general voice of tradition, that our Lord suffered; but there is nothing in the narratives of the evangelists which determines this to have been the form employed, rather than either of the other two. It is, however, the one most commonly met with in the paintings and sculptures that have survived from the earlier ages.

Punishment by the cross was confined to slaves or to malefactors on the worst class of crimes, and even then only rarely, when those on whom it was imposed were criminals of the most heinous character. Before being actually condemned our Lord had been scourged, but was not stripped and scourged thereon, and on this account, probably, it was omitted afterwards. The criminal was appointed to carry his cross to the place of execution over the last road; which was also exacted, as a matter of course, at the hands of Christ, though another was safe scourged to show the banditry with him, to see us. When the place of doom was reached, the criminal was stripped nearly naked and bound or nailed to the cross, which was then hoisted and set up, so as to cause the feet of the victim to be three or four feet from the earth. If the nailing was the most painful mode in the first instance, the other was more so in the second; for the sufferer was left to die of sheer exhaustion, and when simply bound with thongs it might take days to accomplish the process; for usually a strong pin projected out of the central stem, on which the body of the sufferer rested. Incorrections are on record of persons surviving on crosses for nine days. But in our Lord's case there were circumstances altogether peculiar, which must have greatly tended to shorten the period of suffering. Ignoring of these, Pilate indicated his surprise that the death of Jesus should have occurred so soon, Mar. xix. 16. And as there were peculiar circumstances tending to produce an unusually speedy death, so there were reasons for effecting the removal of the body with the least possible delay. Had the Romans been left to themselves they might have allowed the body to lie hanging on the cross for days; but the Jewish law required before sunset was imaginary, 1. xvi. 22, and the near approach of the Jewish Sabbath—a Sabbath also of peculiar solemnity rendered it especially needful, in our Lord's case, that no time should be lost in having the body committed to its proper resting-place. It may be added, that crucifixion as a capital punishment was abolished by Constantine, in consequence of the sacred associations which the cross had now gathered around it.

The singular importance attaching to the death of Christ, according to the doctrine of salvation imputed to the gospel, could not but communicate somewhat of its own character to the instrument on which it was undergone. From being in itself the most vile and repulsive of objects, the cross has become in the minds of believers the symbol of all that is holy and precious. As Christ crucified is the wisdom of God and the power of God unto salvation, it was but natural that those who experienced the power of this salvation should glory in this, as the instrumental occasion by which such unspeakable good had been procured. But this is a feeling that obviously needs to be kept within definite bounds, and jealously guarded, lest it should grow into a species of idolatry, and supplant the very object it was intended to honour. Apart from Christ himself, the cross remains what it naturally was, a base and contemptible thing, and utterly incapable, if viewed otherwise than as the symbol of what he accomplished on it, of imparting either life or blessing. The early Christians contemplated it merely as such a symbol; and hence it was usually associated in their minds with hopeful and joyous, not with gloomy and ascetic feelings. So, it is justly remarked by Maitland, in his interesting work on the catacombs, "When the cross was employed as an emblem, as it very often was, it wore a cheerful aspect. Pilate may set a seal upon the sepulchre, and the soldiers may repeat their idle tale; but the church knows better; and, thinking rather of Christ's resurrection than of his death, she crowns the cross with flowers." On the early tombstones of the Christians, therefore, the cross was the emblem of victory and hope, and they often had the word "victoric" written underneath or alongside of it. It was only after the meridian and ascetic spirit of monasticism had made way in the church that the cross became associated with a gloomy, self-tormenting palsy; and only when superstition took the place of true, spiritual devotion, that the figure of the cross came to be used and borne about as a sacred charm. This last abuse began much earlier than the other, for it appears to have prevailed extensively in the fourth, and to have been but uncommon in the latter part of the third century. Even then people signed the cross in token of safety, and laid stress on figure of it as a preservative against both spiritual and natural evil. This superstitious feeling was at once expressed and stimulated by the discovery of what was held to be the true sepulchre of Christ, and of the real cross on which he suffered. The emperor Helena, mother of Constantine, about the year A.D. 326, and when she was on the verge of eighty years old, made a pilgrimage to the holy places, and was rewarded, among other things, by this notable discovery. A Jew, who doubtless understood from the taste and tendencies of the noble visitor what was likely to bring the most grateful response, furnished the information which led to the desired result; only, as three crosses were found at the spot, it was for a time difficult to ascertain with certainty which might be the Saviour's. But on the suggestion of Macarius, Bishop of Jerusalem, they were tested by their power of working miracles; and as one only was reported to possess this quality, it was accordingly declared to be the genuine cross of Christ. This, however, was but the beginning of wonders; for, as is well known, bits of this real cross soon began to be distributed throughout Christendom, and the traffic grew till it was calculated that the whole might have sufficed to build a ship of war, while the original remained unaltered. It is one of the most striking evidences on record of the melancholy proneness of the human mind to idolatry and superstition, and shows how close and vigilant a watch should be set on the workings of pious sentiment, from the moment it begins to decline into a wrong direction. The subject, however, in this aspect of it, belongs to church history rather than to that of biblical literature.

Figuratively, cross is used in Scripture, in a general way, for what is painful and mortifying to the flesh.
Our Lord himself speaks it when he says, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me," Mat. xvi. 24. And the cross, by way of eminence, that namely of Christ, is taken as an emblem of the doctrine or religion with which it is so closely connected, Rom. vi. The enemies of the cross of Christ, are such as in their heart and behaviour are opposed to the spirit and design for which he suffered on the accursed tree.

CROWN. The common Hebrew word for this is utbh (אֵתֹבֵו); it is derived from the root which signifies to surround, then to encircle in a distinguishing or honorary manner, especially with chaplets, diadems, or such like things upon the head; so that the utbh in the enigmatic sense of crown was just the capital encirclement and ornament of the person—in kings, the peculiar badge of royalty; in priests, of sacred-dotal dignity (though in Scripture another term is commonly used for this—ZEB, מֵרְכַּבֶת): in combatants, of victory.

In ancient times such crowns, though called by a common name, would naturally differ according to the manner of the time and the condition of the personage who wore them. Even for kings, we have no reason to think they bore anything like a commonly recognized or stereotyped form. Indeed, a comparison of the distinctive head-dresses of the Egyptian and Assyrian kings with the more simple, though probably more costly diadems of the Roman emperors, is sufficient proof that there was great variety of form. Some of them, it will be observed, especially those of the Assyrian monarchs, approach very nearly in shape to the priestly tiara, and were in fact nothing else than an elevated, elaborately wrought, and perhaps gaudy turban. That they were usually made of costly materials, and were for dignity and ornament rather than for use, appears from the allusions to them found in ancient writers. Even the comparatively petty king of the Ammonites had a crown which contained a talent of gold and precious stones, which David took with the city Rabbah, and placed upon his own head, 2 Sam. xii. 30. Reference is made in Ps. xcvii. 3 to a crown of pure gold as the proper badge of a king, whose state corresponded to his position; so that in David's time gold must be understood to have formed the chief material for the manufacture of royal crowns: but nothing is indicated respecting the form.

It was a Grecian custom to crown with a wreath of leaves, or a chaplet of flowers, those who came off victoriously in the public games. We read of nothing corresponding to this in the Old Testament; but reference is made to the custom by St. Paul as one perfectly familiar to his Corinthian readers (near whose city some of these games were celebrated), and he draws the distinction between such and the Christian prize, by designating the one corruptible, and the other incorruptible, 1 Cor. x. 25. In reference also, partly to this worldly custom, and partly to the usage of kings, the final inheritance of the saints is represented as a crown, to which they are at once born as heirs of glory, and to which they must fight their way as spiritual combatants—a crown of righteousness, 2 Cor. x. 3, because it is attained to only as the final issue of a life of righteousness; a crown of life, Rev. ii. 10, or a crown of glory, Rev. iv. 4, because a perennial life of blessedness and glory shall be the portion of those who receive it. But another and less creditable custom of the ancient heathen in respect to the use of temporary crowns is referred to, at least once, in Old Testament scripture—the custom, namely, of encircling with a coronal of leaves and flowers the heads of those who were engaged in the ninth and revolting of public festivals. Thus the prophet Isaiah satirizes the drunksards of Ephraim, as having on them a crown of pride, a glorious beauty of a fading flower, ch. xxviii. 1. And in the apocryphal book of Wisdom the reference is still more distinct—"Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ornaments, and let no flowers of the spring pass by us; let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they are uttered," ch. vi. 7. Occasionally allusions are made to crowns in a quite general way, as to what is peculiarly honourable and glorious; as when a virtuous wife is called "a crown to her husband," Pr. iii. 17, when the wise are said to get riches, and old men grandchildren, for a crown, Pr. xvi. 24; xvi. 9, or when faithful ministers of the gospel have their converts reckoned to them for a crown of joy, 1 Th. ii. 19. In such cases the crown is simply regarded as the sign or emblem of the state.

CRYSTAL. There is no further peculiarity in the reference made to crystal in Scripture, than that in the original Hebrew two terms are so rendered, "gubish" (බ්‍යෙ), and "beveh" (බ්‍යෙළ්). These both properly signify ice, the one from the conglomeration that comes it, the other from the smoothness that appears on its surface. It was an ancient opinion, that crystal was simply ice in a harder state of conglomeration than usual: and hence, not merely the Hebrew gubish, but the Greek σπαράγλας, from which our crystal comes, signified equally clear ice and rock-crystal, the two being regarded as but one CUBIT. See Weights and Measures.

CUCKOO (skeek, skookook). The name of some bird, mentioned only in the lists of unclean fowl in Lev. xi. and Deut. xiv. It is impossible to say with certainty what species or even genus is intended. The LXX. translate the word by μηπρός, the gull, and various conjectural identifications have been proposed. When nothing certain can be advanced, the rendering of the English version is not at all improbable, and is quite as good as any other. The cuckoo (Cuculus canorus) is a bird of considerable size, unfit for food, because habitually feeding on reptiles and large insects, common in Palestine, and sure to attract popular notice from its peculiar and well-known call.

The very word skookook, especially if it was pronounced skookook, was a good imitation of the disyllabic voice of this bird; and not improbably was so intended, just as our word cuckoo, variously repeated in all European languages, and golkoob, which the bird is supposed by the Arabs to utter. The latter indeed call it terd golkoob, or Jacob's bird, on this account.

The cuckoo is spread over the whole of Asia and Africa as well as Europe, migrating northward in spring, and southward in autumn. It is said to pass the winter in Palestine. Mr. Strickland saw it at Suryam, and Messrs. Nelson & Ross sent specimens to the Zoological Society from Europe. Buckingham, travelling across the mountains between Damascus and Sidon in April, heard the familiar call, loud, distinct, and clear, though the ground was covered with deep snow. It is probable that the cuckoo does not breed in Palestine.

CUCUMBER. The Talmudists derive the Hebrew plural נְכָרִים, from the obsolete root נָכַר, "to be feared, hard, heavy, difficult," owing to the hardness and indigestibility of this tempting but dangerous fruit (Gen. 43:11). This was one of the Egyptian dainties which the Israelites missed in the wilderness, Num. xii. 15; and according to Hasselquist, no country can vie with Egypt for cucumbers. Not only does it yield in abundance the common species, Cucumis sativus, but a variety to which it gives the epithet "Egyptian melon, or queen of the cucumbers" — the Cucumis Chartus of Linnæus. "This grows in the fertile earth round Cairo, after the inundation of the Nile, and not in any other place in Egypt, nor does it grow in any other soil. This fruit is a little watery, the flesh is almost of the same substance as the melon; it tastes somewhat sweet and cool. The Greeks and Egyptians cut it as the most pleasant fruit they find, and that from which they have least to apprehend. It is the most excellent fruit of this tribe of any yet known. The princes in Egypt may wish they could get it into their gardens, for it is certainly worth a place on their tables" (Travel, 201). It is likely, however, that it was the more common sort with which the Hebrew boshen was chiefly acquainted; and this is so plentiful, that at the present day the cucumber-leaf is a proverbial expression for anything of frequent occurrence, as in the saying "It is written upon the cucumber-leaf, 'He who watches at night, sleeps during the day,'" i.e. it is written where the meanest people may read it (Barnes's Arabic Proverbs, No. 861).

But plentiful as cucumbers were — often growing by the roadside, or where the neighbourhood of a fountain supplied the means of irrigation — they were still private property, and were not intended for the use of every promiscuous passenger. Accordingly, it was not unusual to set some one to watch them, and, is i.e., the bawdy daughter of Zion is compared to a "lodge in a garden of cucumbers" — alluding either to the slight shelter which screened the watchman from the sun, or the little stage or platform where he maintained his post of observation, at once commanding an extended view and secure from breezes of pray. [p. 346.]

CUMIN (Cuminum, Cuminum cuminum), is the Cuminum cyminum of Linneus. Like the anise, the coriander, the dill, and the caraway (Coriandrum), it is an umbelliferous plant, with seeds aromatic, pungent, and carminative. A native of Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, it is still extensively cultivated in Sicily and Malta. It would appear to have been a favourite herb among the Hebrews, and as late as last century it retained a place of some importance in pharmacy. (See J. C. Fairman Dissertatio Medica de Cuminum, Argentorati, 1725.) Its flavour is less agreeable than the seeds of the caraway, to which it has almost entirely given place in this country; but it is still used by veterinary surgeons, and according to a letter of Mr. Field in the Times, when the oil of cumin is rubbed on the hand, and held to the nostrils of a vicious horse, it exerts such an influence over the animal that the performer is enabled to proceed with his other manipulations till he gains entire mastery over him. When the cumin is ripe, its seeds are easily detached from the stalk, as is the case with the coriander, the fennel, the caraway, and plants of the same order. A threshing-dodge, or wooden rollers, might be needed to separate from the ear the grains of wheat or barley; but for dill and cumin a rod was thrashing instrument sufficient. To this Isaiah alludes, ch. xxxiv. 27, in that parable where, from the processes of the ha-shelman, he so beautifully illustrates the variety and congruity of the divine dispensations. The Pharisees are upbraided for that morbid scrupulosity which, whilst living in the neglect of the weightiest duties, paid "title of mint, and anise, and cumin," Mat. xxiii. 23; and it is a curious coincidence, that amongst the Greeks, a hard and pettifogging punctiliousness should have been nick-named "cumin-splitting." In his Wipra, Aristophanes calls a miserable haggler and herder by one of those epithets which he so delights in, square puroippo epameino-cherop, a cross-eyed-paring cumin-carrying skin-flint. [p. 347.]

CUP. The earliest mention of cups on record is in the dream of Pharaoh's butler, Gen. xi. 11. Subsequently the word is of frequent recurrence in the Bible, both in its proper sense as a material cup used for drinking at meals or in religious festivals and ceremonies, and in its figurative sense, in which its applications are most varied and significant. In Ge. xvi. 5, its use in divination is likewise intimated, showing the great antiquity of this practice among oriental peoples.

Among the Egyptians the forms of cups and vessels were very varied, the paintings upon the tombs representing many of most elegant design, though others are equally deficient in the properties of form and proportion. The forms used during the fourth and other early dynasties (1700 B.C.) continued to be common to a late date. (Egyptians of Time of Pharaohs, loc. cit. p. 48.) There are not any representations of cups like the head of an animal (Nechoes, and its Pharaohs, 3d edit, pp. 235, 236). Many of the Egyptian vases, cups, and bowls were of gold (Herod. ii. 53) and silver. (Gen. xvi. 11; comp. 1 Sam. vii. 26.) Some being richly studded with precious stones, inlaid with vitriolic substances in brilliant colours, and even enamelled. Pliny states, that "the Egyptians paint their silver cups, representing Amnisus upon them, the metal being painted not engraved," apparently referring to enamel in contrast to the ordinary inlaid work (Wilkinson). The cup of Thothmes III. (in the Harriet) is of gold highly ornamented; it measures about 7 inches in diameter, and has fish and other devices chased upon the bottom, and round the sides a border of hieroglyphics in relief punched upon it from within. Bronze vessels have been frequently found in the tombs, and a bronze table was discovered at Thebes, on which were about twenty of different forms. Both, bowls and cups were likewise made of hard stone, such as granite, perphyry, basalt, and alabaster, so called from Alabaster, a town in Upper Egypt, near quarries which produced this material. Those vases, in which costly scented ointments were exported from Egypt, were all made at this town, whereas the vase was called an alabaster, a word erroneously translated in the authorized version of the New Testament, Matt. xxii. 7, an "alabaster box," instead of an "alabaster vase." The characteristic form of these vases, which differently in being more or less elongated, is that they are broad at the base, gradually tapering to the neck, and usually with little projections at the sides. Example A (No. 189) is the most common form: it is in the collection of the Duke of Northumberland, and is still half filled with ointment.
The small pieces shown over the tops of the vases are their stoppers, made also of alabaster. Vases of this material and of the same shapes are common in the tombs of Greece and Etruria: one was discovered at Halicarnassus inscribed with the name of Naxos in hieroglyphics and in cuneiform characters (see Biot, in Mit. All the specimens extant were unquestionably made in Egypt, no other sources of alabaster having been known until recent times, when the material was discovered in Arragon, in Spain, and hence called arragonite. The cups used for offerings to the gods were of very simple shape, as were many of the drinking-cups, some of which, however, were adorned with flowers and other devices. Numerous cups and bowls were of earthenware, and of vitrified pottery, the latter being often ornamented with various patterns, some having fish and lotus blossoms on the converse bottom, and some in the form of the lotus itself (Swissmen).

Besides vases and cups of the previous metals, hard stones, and pottery, the Egyptians had other varieties in glass and porcellan. Glass was one of the earliest manufactures known in Egypt. A glass bead has been found bearing the name of a Pharaoh of the eighteenth dynasty, proving it to be more than 3,200 years old, and glass bottles are represented on paintings of far more ancient date (Swissmen). Some cups, small bowls, and bottles were formed of a colored composition which has been called glass porcellan, but it was esteemed a recommendation that the colour should pass directly through the fused substance, and this peculiarity was sometimes imitated, either to deceive the purchaser or to supply a cheaper commodity.

Among the Assyrians the cups and vases were even more varied in form and elegant in design than among the Egyptians, and is evinced by the numerous examples in the British Museum, and by the representations on the sculptures. The materials employed were the same as the previous metals, copper, bronze, glass, and pottery, both glazed and unglazed. In one sculpture at Khorsabad (note, p. xxviii) is a representation of a large vase, that evidently from its dimensions contained "royal wine in abundance," Ex. iv. 17, into which the attendant emperors are dipping drinking-cups. These cups terminate in the head of a lion, and it is to be inferred, from the construction of the handle with a hinde-like articulation to the bowl (No. 110, fig. 2), that they are of metal, and probably gold. Other 6-stal cups are more like bowls in form and filled (No. 114, fig. 2) kiss and green fastening in (Gard), R.M.I. In other scenes from Nineveh, the king is drinking on his return from the chase (B Mac), and is pouring out a libation (116). One series represents him drinking in the presence of the gods of Assyria, reminding us of the metaphor in Ps. xvi, and xxii, and one chamber was apparently specially devoted to representations in regular alternation of the king with a cup and the king with two arrows, and attended by divinities (see Divination). Many cups of the form of those seen in the hand of the king were found by Layard in the ruins of Nineveh, and are now exhibited in glass cases in the middle of the Assyrian gallery in the British Museum. They are made of bronze, are of exquisite workmanship, and are embossed in separate compartments with numerous figures, representing men and animals. One of the most frequently repeated figures is that of a common in Egyptian sculptures, bearing reference to time, or cycles, or periods. Other cups are embossed with the Assyrian winged animals; some have nodules of silver, and others again have small garnets set into the bronze at certain interlacing of the ornament. They are all of beaten work, No. vii, No. xv. ii, No. xiii, No. v, in which the ancients had attained great skill and perfection, and appear to be of the nature of these "vessels of fine copper" spoken of by Ezra, eeh. vii. 22, as "precious as gold." There can hardly be a doubt from the character of the decoration, that these are cups for dividing a practice common to Syria and Egypt as early as the time of the patriarch Joseph. The question, "Is not this in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he drinketh," Ex. xi. 5, would lose half its force if the custom had been unknown to the sons of Jacob. Mr. Layard has also deposited in the British Museum several drinking-cups of like form covered with Hebrew characters. They are of much more recent date, having belonged to Jews who lived in the cities of Mesopotamia, where the same superstitions exist even to the present day. Drinking-cups, both of brass and silver, and of precisely the same shape, are still in common use all over the East. They are generally decorated with some Arabic sentence bearing a mystic sense. In Persia there is a tradition that there is a cup called "Jami Jawsh-kh," the cup of Jawsh-kh, an ancient king of that country, in which could be seen the whole world and all the things which were doing in it. The same tradition asserts that this cup, filled with the elixir of immortality, was discovered in digging the foundations of Persopolis. The Persian poets ascribe to this cup the prosperity of their ancient monarchs (Nauch and Isi, in Pal., 24 ed., p. 388, 389). [The Assyrian drinking cups referred to above are called Bowls in the British Museum, and figures of some of them are given under the article Bowl.] —Ed.

CURSE.

CUSH. 1. The eldest son of Ham. He was father of six sons, the most noted of whom was Nimrod (Gen. 10:6-10).

2. A Benjamite at the court of Saul, whose enumeration of David gave occasion to the inducing of Ps. xvi., wherein the psalmist protests his innocence of these charges. As no such individual, however, is mentioned in the historical notices of that period, many expositors conclude that the name Cush, which in its heathen form Cushri, Sa xiii. 27, signifies modest or black man, is a symbolical designation of the dark nations of the enemy, whom the Jewish writers, with the exception of Aben- Ezra, take to be Saul himself. So also several modern expositors, as Vatutti, Turroux, Glass (Heb. Sac. iii. 9), Burk (Introduction to the Pentateuch, i. p. 30), and Hengstenberg. It is thought, moreover, that there is a play on the name Kish, the father of Saul. These suppositions have, however, little to support them. What chiefly opposes the application to Saul is the fact, as Rosenmuller remarks, that Cush appears in the character of a conqueror more than of a persecutor. Pfeiffer (Deut. Vocab. op. cit. p. 250) takes it to be Shem. 2 sa xii. 4. Aben Ezra and Drusius, with more probability, suppose that it must have been the proper name of a person otherwise unknown.

CUSH, a country frequently mentioned in the Old Testament, but apparently with such latitude of meaning as makes its determination a question of considerable difficulty in biblical geography. It derived its name most probably from Cush, the son of Ham. Most versions, ancient and modern, including the English, which retains the Hebrew name only in Ps. xi. 11, render it Ethiopia; itself a term of varied significations in ancient writers, who, following its Greek etymology αἰθιοπία, applied it to all sun-burned, dark-complexioned races, especially those above Egypt, Hecatotrim (iii. 94; vi. 59) extending it to Asiatic nations. So much, however, is settled, that Cush in various passages can be no other than the country in Africa south of Egypt, Ethiopia, corresponding to the modern regions of Nubia and Northern Abyssinia; for the view of Bochart, who held that in every instance it was some country in Arabia that was meant is now universally abandoned. That Cush adjoined Egypt appears from Ezek. xxxix. 10, where Egypt's desolation is announced as extending "from the tower of Syene unto the border of Cush" (E. V.), or rather "from Migdol to Syene and (or even) to the border of Cush" (Hansen, Hacket; Migdol being the most northern point of Egypt, and Syene the most southern point of importance (Wilkinson, Anc Egyptians, i. p. 471). This is further confirmed by the various passages where Cush and Egypt occur together, as Is. xx. 25-6, &c. viii. 22-31, and these where mention is made of the connection and confederacy subsisting between their inhabitants, Eccl. xx. 25, &c. iv. 7, &c. xxix. 19; &c. 10. Cushites came out of Egypt with Shishak against Jerusalem, 24, xxii. 21, and Cush also occurs in connection with Egypt and the Sabaeans, 23:22 (translation, xxx. xii. 1), different from the inhabitants of 2529 (albaima), a people of Arabia, so frequently mentioned in Scripture. The Sela here referred to was quite a distinct country, probably Meros in Upper Egypt; it was inhabited by a descendant of Cush, xil. 7. In Is. xii. 28 the black colour of the Cushites is so noticed that it must have evidently differed greatly from that of the Jews, a remark not at all applicable to an Arabian people, while very suitable to negroes.

But if it was unquestionably an extreme view of Bochart, who found Cush only in Arabia, the view advanced by Shultess, Gesenius, Hansen, and others, who admit only an African Cush, is less so, and it is only by offering violence to various passages of Scripture that it can be maintained. That several [p. 560]bedes should be called by the same name is explicable from the frequent migrations of the early nations, who would give their own names successively to the various regions into which they removed. That Mesopotamia was the original seat of a portion at least of the Cushites is plain from the statement relative to Nimrod, whose empire embraced portions both of Babylonia and Assyria, Is. xiv. 1; and that either there or in Arabia there was another Cush appears from several passages, which can be explained only by such an assumption. The arguments in favour of an Arabian Cush are briefly these—1. It is mentioned in connection with Melchizedek, a country on the coast of the Red Sea; "I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction; the garments of the land of Midian did tremble." Gen. iii. 7. It is almost universally allowed that Cushan is but another form of Cush; for there is no foundation whatever for connecting it is sometimes done (it is so eccentric in its connexion) with Cushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, xiv. 11. 2. Delitzsch (Der Prophet Habakkuk, Leip. 1851, p. 130), who admits only the African Cush, holds that its mention along with Melchizedek is intended to show how places so far removed from each other were equally affected by the theophany; but this is exceedingly strained, and at variance with the parallelism of the passage. 2. The wife of Moses is called a "Cushitess" in Nu. xi. 1. If this be Zipporah, the daughter of the priest of Midian, there is thus inordinate evidence of the connection between Cush and Midian. This can be set aside only by supposing that the reference is to a second marriage of Moses, and this again is maintained on the ground that the objections of Aaron and Miriam against their brother were utterly incongruous if applied to a marriage which had subsisted for more than forty years. But admitting that it is a second marriage which is thus referred to, the case is not materially altered, for still Cush must be sought near the place of Israel's encampment, as it cannot be supposed that Moses would go to Ethiopia to fetch a wife. 3. But perhaps a stranger argument is the mention of Aramaans as contiguous to the Cushites. Thus: "Moreover the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians who are near the Red Sea, at Jeddah, at the head or side of the Cushites;” (2 Ch. xxiv, which can hardly apply, as Delitzsch maintains, to countries separated by the Arabian Gulf.

Other arguments adduced by Michaelis (see Persian Gam. Geogr. Bibl. p. 170) in favour of the Arabian Cush are not decisive, and the passages on which he relies apply with greater probability to the African Cush. Thus, in Numbers xxi. as the Egyptians are found at Cush; that is, in the eastern coast of the latter, washed by the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea, is much intended, and contained some good harbours, but then neither of the countries was noted for its rivers, unless we suppose the reference is to the Nile and its branches. Some authors, however, not satisfied with this, suppose another Cush in the region of Susiana, bounded on the south by the Persian Gulf and on the west and south-west by the Tigris. It is still called Cush, and is indeed a country abounding in rivers. The same place is thought to be mentioned in 2 Ki. xvi. 21 as Cuthah, and this again is supposed to be the Cushite form of Cush, by the substitution of the Hebrew letter "ch" for skin, as in the name Ahmar for Ahadeh. In support of this view it is further maintained that otherwise the notice of Cush, in the geography of Eden, is utterly inexplicable. Still the evidence is too weak to warrant the supposition, for the geographical notices of Eden are themselves so intricate as to forbid their application to any hypothesis regarding other disputed localities.

[0x1] CUTHAH, a province in the Assyrian empire, from which Shalmaneser transported colonists to occupy the land in Samaria left vacant by the exiled Israelites, (2 Ki. xxiii. 20). The precise region so designated is altogether unknown. But from the admixture of this people among the new Samaritan population, the term Cushite was applied by the rabbinical Jews, in the Chabbe and Talmud, to the Samaritans generally, and words peculiar to the Samaritans are called Cushite.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. Among the charges brought against the Samaritans was one, and so important that it is recorded three times, forbidding them to make cuttings in their flesh for the dead. “Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any mark upon you: I am the Lord.” (Lev. xix. 28.) Again, in respect particularly of the priests: “They shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave the corner of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh.” (Lev. xxi. 15.) And more fully: “Ye are the children of the Lord your God: ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead.” (Lev. xvi. 30.)

Then is added a reason of the prohibition. “For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee from all the nations that are upon the earth.”

Among ancient nations it was customary to give expression to grief, especially for the dead, in the most passionate form: rending the garments, plucking out the hair of the head and beard, and even lacerating the person with ordinary accompaniments. This was the case not only with the passionate and eventful orientals; but also among the nations of the north and the west, as the Scythians (Thucyd. ii. 70), and also the Greeks and Romans (Pontus and Rome). This custom prevails in the East to the present day; Mrs. Postans, in her Recollections of the East (London, 1837, p. 327), remarks: “In all mourning ceremonies in the East, that are conducted with any pomp, it is customary to hire persons to disfigure themselves and make loud lamentation. At the Mahometan ceremonies of the Moharram not only do bands of women in green dresses follow the head of Hossein and Hassan, beating their breasts and tearing their hair, but fakirs and mad enthusiasts dance around it, cutting themselves with knives, and running skewers through their tongues. Some Moslem servants in our employment at Mandalay, to whom we had given leave to attend Moharram, returned so much wounded as to be incapable of service for some time, so fiercely had they made cuttings in their flesh for the dead.”

Indeed, notwithstanding the express charge to the contrary, this practice prevailed extensively among the Jews themselves during the decline of the monarchy, as appears from the prophecies of Jeremiah. In announcing the impending calamities, the prophet, chap. vii. describes their extent and severity by declaring that in the universal sorrow, the usual tokens of individual grief should be forgotten: “Both the great and the small shall die in the hand: they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves livid for them." This lamentation of the person was also a sign of great sorrow in general. In De. xii. 5 mention is made of eighty pilgrims going up to Jerusalem after the sack of the city by the Chaldeans; and in such a plight as indicated deep mourning for the destruction of the place whether they had been wont to go up to worship, "having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut their mouths." In ch. xivii. 5 Philistia is represented as a female who has torn her hair and cut her flesh in token of grief for some awful catastrophe: "so also ch. xlvii. 27, with regard to the lamentation which would result from the desolation of Moseh—the cutting of the flesh being accompanied, as appears from Is. xvi. 2, by baldness of the head and cutting off the beard.

Tracing these practices to the idea of thereby propitiating the names of the deceased, and connecting them with similar rites in the worship of Moloch and Baal, 16: see ch. 21, some writers upon this subject regard the prohibition of the Hebrew law to be the removal of all occasion and appearance of idolatrous worship. This connection is however exceedingly doubtful, as the"as Clerc well remarks, "alia unum ratio est funeris, alia sacrifici (comm in Is. xvi. 2). The practice so far as regards religion undoubtedly originated in false apprehensions of the character of the deity, and was an attempt to propitiate his favour; while as an indication of sorrow for the dead, it may have sprung only from the obscurity which attended a future state, while the prohibition may have been intended as an admonition to the bond of his relation to God, as one not limited to the present life, or one which could be interrupted by death, and of the superior knowledge which he enjoyed in respect to a future state over the heathen, and so calling for the avoidance of a practice which ill agreed with such convictions (see Whitl, Hexapla on Leviticus, Locat. 163, p. 479). Even Spencer admits as much (see his paper Ed. ii. 22, 23). He lends some confirmation to this view that the Roman laws of the Twelve Tables contained injunctions as to moderating grief at funerals, and in particular forbade laceration of the flesh for the dead (Cass.Orig. i. 265). The prohibition supposed to be connected with the strong hopes which the Romans cherished of a future though natural life. The Hebrew law may thus correspond to the apostolic admonition: "I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have not hope." 1 Th. iv. 13: and if so, it has an important bearing on the question how far the doctrine of a future state and a resurrection is revealed in the Pentateuch. (See further, MacDonald's intro. to the Pentateuch, p. 115, 114 Edin. 1840.)

CYPRIALS. So MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

CYPRESS (Σωρός, Λευκόδε, a well-known tree. One of the most beautiful passages in the Apocrypha is the description of Simon the high-priest, Eccles. i. 24-31; see also xxv. 15—

"He was as the morning-star in the midst of a cloud, and as the moon at the full, as the flower of roses in the spring of the year; as lilies by the rivers of waters; as the branches of the fig-tree in the time of summer: As a fair olive tree budding forth fruit; And as a cypress-tree which growth up to the clouds.

When he put on the robe of honour, And was clothed with the perfection of glory; When he went up to the holy altar, He made the garments of holiness honourable."

The conceptions of the above passage is not improbably the 4222 of Ex. v. 8; 18: Jer. xix. 17; 37; Exe. xxi. 5; xxv. 18, and other passages, translated "cypress." It is abundantly native on Lebanon, and was prized by the ancients next to the cedar.

The Cypresas simoniiri, well described by Le Clerc as "a flame-shaped, tapering, cone-like tree, with upright branches growing close to the trunk, and resembling in general appearance the Lombardy poplar," is one of the most striking and imposing members of the great coniferous order. With its dark evergreen foliage, and with its strict spiry growth, all pointing towards heaven, it seems as if designed on purpose for the cloisters, and at once a moamer and a monument. Accordingly, throughout Syria and Turkey, where it attains a height of 60 feet, its tall form may be constantly recognized standing sentinel over the tombs: "that tree still taller when other grief is told. The only constant monument of the dead." For similar purposes it is now familiar amongst ourselves: although its sad supremacy is likely soon to be divided with the new species lately discovered in China, and which combines the solemnity of the cypress with the tender grace of the weeping willow—the Chion tei, of which Mr. Fortune gives a graphic description, and a figure, in his Wanderings in China (vol. ii. p. 42). The fine-grained, fragrant wood, with its beautiful red colour, was highly prized from the earliest period, and was justly famed for its durability. The Egyptians made of it cases for their mummies, and the Roman pottists are still, we believe, consigned to cypress coffins; and, as a proof of its comparative indestructibility, it is said that when the cypress doors of St. Peter's at Rome, which had lasted from the days of Constantine, were eleven centuries afterwards removed by Pope Eugene IV., in order to be replaced with gates of brass, they were still perfectly sound. From the similarity of the name, it has been very generally supposed that the "gopherwood" from which Noah's ark was constructed was cypress, and we are not aware of any topographical consideration which should render this opinion improbable; whilst the durability of the timber..."
is in favour of the supposition, when we remember the length of time that the ark was in building.  [2, n.]

CYPRUS, a large island in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Phoenicia and Cilicia, lying south-west and north-east. The island is of very irregular shape, and toward the north-east stretches out into a long narrow peninsula. Its extreme length is about 143 English miles, and for two-thirds of the length it is about 40 broad. The mountain range of Olympus occupies the main body of the island, and in some of the higher points reaches to the height of 7000 feet. The scenery in many parts is bold and rugged; there are abrupt eminences and lofty woodlands, but those often interchanging with fertile fields and deep picturesque valleys. The mountains contain copper, gold, and silver, and a considerable variety of the precious stones. Accordingly the Phoenicians, the great miners and traders of remote antiquity, soon found out its value, and to a considerable extent colonized it. Its earlier inhabitants were of Phoenician origin; but the Greeks in process of time established cities in it, and ultimately became its chief and ruling population. The principal cities were Salamis, Citium (now Larnaca), and Paphos (now Pafos), all near the sea-coast; but there were many others of some note. In its political relations the island passed through much the same fortunes that befell the part of Asia to which it is subject. Under Amasis it was in submission to Egypt; but from the time of Cambyses it became a portion of the Persian empire. It once and again revoluted against the Persian yoke, but was each time reduced to subjection. With the fall of the Persian power it passed over to the sway of Alexander, and furnished him with 120 ships for the siege of Tyre. After various other changes of dominion it was taken possession of by Rome, in a manner far from creditable to the imperial city; and before the Christian era, was turned into a senatorial province governed by proconsuls, with the title of pretexts. When the empire was divided, Cyprus was attached to the Byzantine or eastern section. The crusaders conquered it in 1191 under Richard I., and held possession of it for about three centuries. But in 1193 the republic of Venice acquired it, and it remained under their sway till 1571, when it was finally subjugated to the Turkish yoke by Selim II.

Cyprus was one of the earliest fields of missionary enterprise out of Palestine. This partly arose from the scattering abroad that took place on the death of St. Paul, A.D. 67, and still more from Cyprus having been the birthplace of Barnabas, who naturally desired to carry to his native region the tidings of that salvation which he had himself received. The general population of the island must have presented anything but a hopeful field for the speedy triumph of the cross, as they were not only sunk like other heathen in abominable idolatry, but were more peculiarly devoted to a species of worship which everywhere told most disastrously upon the manners of the people. This was the worship of Venus, or rather the Syrian Astarte; for the worship partook essentially of the oriental character, and wanted much of the grace and refinement which the Greeks threw around even their corrupt superstitions. The Venus-worship of Cyprus was carefully licentious, and had respect mainly to the generative powers of nature. Sexual indulgence, therefore, flourished under the patronage of religion, and of necessity pressed like a nightmare upon all the higher feelings and aspirations of the soul. Still, however, Barnabas did not despair: he hoped against hope, the more so as there appears to have been a number of Jews in the island, who stood free at least from the grosser forms of pollution around them. He accordingly sailed straight for Cyprus, when he and Paul were sent forth by the church at Antioch, A.D. 41. The particulars of their mission in regard to Cyprus are not given, except in regard to the personage of the island, Sergius Paulus, who sought an interview with them at Paphos, where he was residing. This circumstance alone implied considerable success; as it is no way probable that a man in the station and with the propensities of Sergius would have paid any heed to such ambassadors of the cross, unless their mission had already caused some stir. In dealing with him their chief obstruction arose from the middle and perverse attempts of a disloyal Jew, Pariseus, one of that class, at this time unusually numerous, who, for purposes of gain gave them selves to the cultivation of magical arts, by which they played upon the credulity and fears of the heathen. This man so resisted the work of the Lord as to draw down upon him the solemn rebuke of Paul, also through his word a judicial visitation of blindness; which so impressed the mind of the governor, that he became obedient to the faith. The island was subsequently visited by Barnabas, in company with John Mark, after the painful separation between him and Paul, Acts xvii. and the gospel, we may reasonably suppose, from that time began to take root, and spread through Cyprus the blessings of salvation. The great majority of the people are still professes Christians, but with all the ignorance, credulity, and superstition that usually distinguish the members of the Greek church.

CYRENE, on CYRENE. G. Keparn, modern name, was the chief city of a district in the north of Africa, called Cyreniaci, also the Lybian Pentarchia, from its comprising five principal towns. The district lay between Egypt and Carthage, having the former on the east and the latter on the west. Libya was the African name of the territory in which Cyrene was situated; and on the African side it stood nearly right over against the Greek Peloponnesus, with Crete lying between. Cyrene was in ancient times the most important Greek possession in Africa. It was founded by Greek colonists, who were Dorians, under the direction of Battius, about 659 years before the Christian era. The site was well chosen, being in one of the most attractive and fertile districts of North Africa.
Even still, says a recent explorer, "the hills in the neighbourhood abound with beautiful scenes. Some of them exceed in richness of vegetation, and equal in grandeur, anything that is to be found in the Apen-nines." (Hamilton's Travels in North Africa, p. 28.) It would seem that the old Hellenic colonists cultivated friendly relations with the native Libyans, and to a much greater extent than usual became intermingled with them by marriage-relationships (trust, a twos.
The constitution of the state was framed somewhat, after the model of Sparta, and took the shape of a limited monarchy; for several generations the supreme power remained in the hands of the family of Battius.
But ultimately the entire district became an appanage of Egypt, and along with this passed into the hands of Rome considerably before the Christian era (v. c. 75).

Cyrene, when in the height of its prosperity, carried on an extensive commerce with Greece and Egypt; and it has even left its marks on the history of Hellenic literature. Aristippus, a native of the place, was the founder of a philosophic sect; and Callimachus, the poet, and Cornesecus, the founder of the new academy at Athens, were both by birth Cyrenians. Such incidental facts indicate great literary as well as commercial activity; and we need not therefore be surprised to find, either that numbers of Jews were located there, or that they belonged to the more active and enterprising portion of their countrymen. Accordingly, Strabo expressly mentions Jews as forming a considerable part of the population (see v. xi. 22), and, for so distant a settlement, they occupy a rather prominent place in New Testament scripture. The Simonian who bore our Lord's cross was of Cyrene, Luke xxiii. 26. They had a synagoge of their own at Jerusalem, Acts xxvii. 20, some of the members of which took an active part against Stephen and others, however, embraced the doctrine which Stephen had taught, and on being dispersed by the persecution which arose at his death, they went back to their native region publishing the gospel of the kingdom, Acts vii. 58.
Lucius also, a native of Cyrene, is mentioned in Ac.
viii. 4, as one of the prophets and teachers in the church at Antioch. We need not wonder, therefore, that the country at an early period was brought under Christian influence, and Cyrene was doubtless one of the main centres from which the light of the gospel diffused itself so early, and with such wonderful success, throughout Libya and the neighbouring regions of North Africa.

Extensive ruins have been found on the site anciently occupied by Cyrene, and they have recently been made the subject of more careful research. Some account was given of them by Delia Cella, who visited the ruins in 1821-22; by Captain Beechy, in 1829; and still more recently by Hamilton, in the work already referred to. Various of the remains, chiefly statues of Cretan model, and somewhat mythological, have been deposited in the British Museum. The most striking remains, however, are the tombs, which are hewn out of the solid rock, and have thus survived the destruction which has overtaken the city. Tombs of this description were not in accordance with Greek usage, and they are justly regarded as an indication of the influence possessed in Cyrene of the native population of the district, and bespeak a certain affinity between the cast of thought prevalent there, and that which constructed the magnificent tombs and pyramids of Egypt.

CYRENIUS G. Keparnae: It is properly a Latin name, and should be written Quirinius or Quirinus.
The only person referred to in Scripture of this name is the one mentioned in Lu. ii. 2, in connection with the taxing or enrolling which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem at the time of Christ's birth. The statement has given rise to much dispute, and to various modes of solution, with the view of meeting the historical difficulties with which it is connected. There can be no doubt that the Cyrenius referred to—whose full and proper name was Publius Sulpitius Quirinius—was procurator or governor of Syria subsequent to the birth of Christ, and who about ten years after the real, or six years after the calamity, began to take up a census of the whole population with a view to taxing.
This event is referred to in Ac. v. 37, and at various places in Josephus, as one that led to very considerable disturbances among the people. So far as it, therefore, is concerned, there is no room for any difference of opinion. But is that the event to which St. Luke points in the statement before us? So, many in present as well as former times, have maintained. The evangelist, they imagine, confounded the time of the Saviour's birth with that of the census of Cyrenius; or, as is now more commonly alleged, he confounded some special mission introduced to Cyrenius involving some enrolment of the population, with the work of the regular census which he took up some years afterwards, when he had actually become president of Syria. There may have been, it is thought, an order issued for certain statistical returns some years previous to the census, and Cyrenius may have been sent into Syria to execute the work in that part of the empire. In which case the minutes of Luke would simply have consisted in saying that the enrolment was made while Cyrenius presided over Syria, he having been at the time only a special commissioner, acting under the regular presidents or governors (so Meyer). Or, on the ground of this special though subsidiary agency, he may have been regarded as ruler or saperd pres. of Syria (so Beza, Trench, Lichten, Cremer, Robinson, &c.). Another view, advocated by many distinguished writers, proceeds on the ground of the enrolment itself being here put for the comparative: “This enrolling was made before Cyrenius was governor of Syria.” (Lardner, Eichard &c.) And a still further modification of meaning in connection with the enrolment has been adopted by Dвин, Wetzstein, Mack, Hofmann, and others, according to which it is taken adverbially, thus: “This enrolling was first made before Cyrenius was governor of Syria.” The decree for it had been issued before, and certain steps in connection with it had been taken, but the actual execution, at least towards the taxing, only took effect when Cyrenius became president of Syria.

Of these different modes of understanding the passage of the evangelist, none is quite natural, and some are plainly inconsistent with the historical accuracy, not to say inspiration, of the writer. In so plain and simple a narrative, it is against probability to suppose that a superfluous should have been put for a comparative in the way indicated by one class of interpreters that the evangelist should have said “first of his presidings,” instead of “before that he presided,” and the examples brought in support of the latter are regarded as strongly parallel. Nor, if the mission of Cyrenius at the time referred to had been of the special and subordinate kind understood by another class, could be with propriety have been represented as at the time preceding over Syria; for it is one thing to speak of a person being a ruler in a country, and as such having some special work to do in it, and another to say that such a thing was done while he had the presidency or government of it. This naturally implies that he was at the time its presiding and governing head; which Cyrenius could not have been in respect to Syria, if he had simply been commissioned to take up some statistical returns concerning its population. It is possible, however, according to the last form of opinion indicated above, that an enrolment with a view to taxing, or a general census of some sort, may have been ordered at the time of Christ’s birth, and, after having proceeded a certain length, may have been somehow arrested in Judea, and only at last carried out when the good will of the people had entered into the hands of Cyrenius. This is perfectly conceivable, and the view suggested by it is no further liable to objection, than that it requires somewhat too much to be supplied to make the statement properly intelligible. If the decree for the enrolment was actually issued at the birth of Christ, and had the effect of bringing Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, it would have been a rather brief and enigmatical mode of announcing the future progress and result of the matter to say, that the enrolment was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria—if so be that his government only commenced after a lapse of ten years from the birth of Jesus.

While therefore we might say of this mode of representing the matter, that grammatically it is not unanswerable for nominal adjectives, such as minor, in the historical narrative are often used adverbially, qualifying the verb that follows rather than the noun to which it is joined, and that the historical circumstantial might also have been in substantial accordance with the view it takes; yet it is not altogether satisfactory. And if one is to go by what may be called the fair and natural impression which the words are fitted to convey, we shall be disposed to infer that at the time of our Lord’s birth there was a decree of enrolment actually carried into effect in Judea; that at the time Cyrenius was the highest and most direct representative of the Roman power in Syria; and that the enrolment in question was a first one, as well as a last, the latter being drawn from something of a similar description that subsequently took place. The question then is, whether any historical support can be found for these positions, and especially for the position that Cyrenius had to do with the government of Syria about the actual period of our Lord’s birth, as well as afterwards, at an interval of about ten years. Now, this latter point, on which so much hangs for the minute accuracy of St. Luke’s account have received a very remarkable elucidation, and evidence apparently conclusive has been adduced to show that Cyrenius was twice in command of the province of Syria; and on the first occasion much about the period indicated by the evangelist. In a work on Roman antiquities by A. W. Zumpt (Commentations Epigraphicae ad Antiquitats Romanae Pertinentes), there is a chapter on the presidents of Syria from Cesar Augustus to Titus Ver-susian, and in the course of his historical investigations the author necessarily comes across the statement of St. Luke regarding Cyrenius, which he properly regards as entitled to consideration in a simply historical respect; the more so, as there are confirmatory statements of a similar kind in some of the fathers (Keis. in loc. i. 55.4: Iren. Hist. iii. 27.6: Tert. Adv. Mart. iii. 6.4). In these places reference is made to the fact of a general census being taken at the time of Christ’s birth, and also to Cyrenius as being governor of Syria at the time. Zumpt therefore concludes that there is prior from ground for holding such to have been the case, and proceeds to consider, whether there be any notices in Roman history relating to the period which are capable of throwing light upon the subject. The first, and the leading passage he refers to is one in Tacitus Annal. i. 59, noticing the death of Cyrenius in A. D. 21, in which it is stated of this Cyrenius, that he was a man of comparatively humble origin, born at Luniuviu; that in the army he had proved himself to be a person fit for conducting affairs that called for stringent and active measures; that under Augustus he had obtained the consulship; that by and by, for having reduced the forces of the Homalades throughout Cyrenia, he had obtained another consulship, and had been appointed proconsul to Cilicia (grandson of Augustus), on the latter obtaining the government of Armenia, in whose company, while at Rhodes, and before actually entering on the administration of Armenia, he had paid court to Tiberius, who was at the time sojourning there. By comparing this with various other statements in Tacitus and contemporary notices from other quarters, it is found that the Homonadenses here referred to as having been subdued by Cyrenius, and on account of whose subjugation he obtained triumphal badges, were the rough and free-booting highlanders in the uplands of Cilicia; and both from the force necessary to overcome them, and from the honours awarded to him in consequence, it is plain that Cyrenius must have had a legion at his command, and in connection with that a province.

What, then, constituted the province? Cyrenius by himself was far too small to form a province worthy of being assigned to a man of consular rank, with a legion under him; there must have been coupled with it some neighbouring region, which, from its extent of territory and relative situation, admitted of being conveniently associated with Cilicia, for the purpose of being placed under one jurisdiction. And it so happens that Syria, the region on the east of Cilicia, is the only one that can be thought of. For Proconsular Asia was too remote from the Homonadenses, and was besides in a subjection, at that time, under the emperor, and made a senatorial province; nor, for the same reasons, could it be Bithynia and Pontus. Galatia, adjoining the Cilician territory; but the governor of it had no legion assigned him, and it is also known to have been usually assigned to one of the rank merely of praetor. It is stated by Dio (iii. 10), that Augustus in the twenty-seventh year of his reign surrendered to the senate all the thoroughly reduced and quiet provinces, the only districts he reserved to himself in connection with Asia Minor were Cilicia and Cyrene. But in A.D. 22 Cyrene was also granted to the senate (Plin. i. 28). So that Syria, along with Cilicia, would be convenient to coupled with Cilicia, to make out a sufficient province for a man of consular rank, and having command of a legion.

There are other collateral notices which confirm the result thus obtained from the passage of Tacitus. For it appears, that both some years before the birth of Christ and some years after, Syria and Cilicia belonged to one province. Aulus Piso was governor of Syria in B.C. 17, and when obliged to levy troops against Germ-ania, he called in an order for soldiers to the Cilician regiments (Var. ii. 10), which there is no probability they would have complied with, unless he had had a right to demand what he sought. Besides, Piso himself was afterwards accused by Titubius of seeking to possess the province of which he had the command; and the evidence of this was, that he was reported to have seized the fortress of Cyzicus, a fortress in Cilicia (vi. 40). Vitellius also, when president of Syria, about 39, sent troops to subdue the Cilicians, who were a people of Cilicia (Ann. ii. 19). So that there is ample evidence of Cilicia having been coupled with Syria, about the period of the Christian era, under one provincial administration.

Supposing then, as we are plainly warranted to hold, that Cyrenius was one of those who had the presidency of the two regions conjoined into a single province, what precisely was the period of his holding it, as indicated by Tacitus in the passage noticed above? It must have been at some time before the year A.D. 21, for it was the probability of his province to that of Armenia, obtained by Caius, which specially fitted him for doing the part of the young prince. In this capacity he visited Egypt with Caius, and some other places, but did not accompany him to Armenia; for before Caius went thither, M. Lollius was already appointed, and Cyrenius it would seem had gone therefore at the request of the emperor to be married to Lepida, a lady of high rank, who had been destined for Lucius Caesar, the brother of Caius. But Lucius died in A.D. 2; and connecting this period with the time during which the marriage must have taken place close upon the death of Lucius Caesar, it is evident that marriage must have taken place close upon the death of Lucius Caesar, and that, if anything, before the year A.D. 1, that Caius Caesar, after being made consul, set out for Armenia, accompanied by Lollius as rector; and consequently in that year also it must have been, or perhaps the latter part of the year before it, that Cyrenius quitted his post in the East, and was succeeded by Lollius. Several notices mention Lollius in his capacity as rector to Caius, and the part he took with him in Armenia (Ann. iii. 52: volumes v. p. 591: but there is no evidence that Cyrenius was with him after he actually entered on his office. Before the close of the year A.D. 1, therefore, Cyrenius had held the governorship of Syria and again quitted it—he had subordinated the Homonadenses in the Cilician part of the province, a work so difficult and meritorious that he obtained triumphal badges on account of it—he had afterwards for a time held, along with his province, the office of rector to Caius Caesar on his way to Armenia; and for all this it is impossible to assign a period of less than about four years. He must have entered on his presidency about four years before the Christian era, and that is precisely the term by which the real birth of Christ seems most probably to differ from the vulgar era. Hence the conclusion is, that Cyrenius actually did hold the presidency of Syria about the time of Christ's birth; and as Luke was himself a native as is supposed of Antioch, the chief town of Syria, it was quite natural that he should by some brief notice indicate the governor of the province at that important crisis. The proof of all this may be seen at length in the work of Zumpt above referred to, or more briefly in Edkins's Homonadenses Mon. p. 160, sqq.

It has been usual for those who look simply to the accounts of Josephus, to ascribe the presidency of Syria at the birth of Christ either to Saturninus or Varus, according as they have placed the period of his birth earlier or later. Josephus certainly speaks of Varus as being governor at the period of Herod's death (Ant. xvii. 53), which in all probability took place shortly after the birth of Christ. And there can be no doubt that Saturninus immediately preceded Varus. The succession, however, as fixed by Zumpt from other sources, stands thus (the dates are those of the common era):—

C. Saturninus Saturninus obtained the province in B.C. 9; P. Quincettius Varus, B.C. 6; P. Sulpius Quirinius, B.C. 4; M. Lollius, B.C. 3; C. Marcus Censorinus, A.D. 2; L. Volusius Saturninus, A.D. 4; P. Sul. Quirinius (the second time), A.D. 6, &c. It is quite possible that after Cyrenius entered on his province, and in the western parts of it, among the ravines and fastnesses of Cilicia, was subduing the Homonadenses, Varus may have continued for some time in the government of the eastern parts; and hence as the person still exercising in fact the powers of government in those parts, Josephus may be guilty of no historical inaccuracy in the mention...
Cyrus

he makes of Varus after the death of Herod. Engaged as Cyrenius was elsewhere, either Varus or some other person must for a time have had the command of the troops in the district bordering on Judea.

In regard to the ἀναγγέλησις, or registering itself, which is associated by the evangelists with the government of Cyrenius over Syria, in the absence of definite information, it is impossible to arrive at certainty. It is spoken of in language that seems to denote a strict universality as far as regards the Roman empire: the decree went forth from Caesar Augustus, that all the world—ὡς ἀπὸ τοῦ αὐτοῦ αὐτοκράτορος—should be enrolled or registered. Expressions of this sort are, no doubt, sometimes used of a definite locality more immediately in the eye of the writer; but as the subject of discourse is a decree of the Roman emperor, it seems scarcely competent to understand the sphere it was to embrace, when so described, as less extensive than the dominions over which his authority prevailed. The decree therefore was for the Roman world, and for Judea and the country around, merely as a part of that great whole. But possibly enough the decree may not have been issued at once and the same time for all: though a general order, it may have been, and most probably was, appointed to be carried into effect piecemeal. The evangelists indicate only two things regarding it: its general character, and the mode and time in which it was brought into operation in Palestine. In no in this date he say that Cyrenius had any charge of it there; but simply that the time when it was carried into effect was that in which he held the presidency of Syria. The decree, it is not improbable, was connected with some general survey of the empire. During the reign of Augustus, a geometrical survey of the empire appears to have been taken; for it is incidentally referred to by several writers on rural affairs in particular by Frontinus (De aquis), who speaks of the measurements made of all boundaries and boundaries in the time of Augustus, and even mentions the names of the dimensions over which his authority prevailed. It is impossible to say how far in such a life as that of Cyrus even these were to be depended upon; the probability is, that they were far from presenting an unvarnished tale. Besides, the history itself of Cyrenius has been lost, and nearly all we know of that part of it which relates to the times of Cyrus is contained in the extracts preserved from it by Phoebus. In various things, however, he differs widely from Herodotus: and so again does Xenophon, whose Cyropaedia in cannot be regarded as anything, and indeed scarcely professes to be anything, but a historical romance. There must unquestionably have been something very peculiar and extraordinary in the life and career of Cyrus to have given rise to this fabulous tendency; and one can easily conceive that when once fairly begun the tendency would grow, and that as it grew, and the account was taken, it would accumulate, as the foundations of the Persian empire became more extensively diffused. The further from his age, the more difficult would the task of discrimination become. Elements of truth there may have been in the other accounts, which are altogether omitted in Herodotus; but upon the whole, his account is now generally supposed to approach the nearest to the truth of any that have come down to modern times.

The exact date of the birth of Cyrus is not known: but the accession of his grandfather Astyages to the Median throne is ascribed to B.C. 594. Mandane, the daughter of Astyages and mother of Cyrus, was given in marriage to Persian of the name of Cambyses. So far the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon agree; but they differ entirely in regard to the relation of Cyrus to Astyages. According to Herodotus, the old king was resolved to destroy the life of the infant as soon as it was born, on account of an unpromising dream he had prior to the birth; and with this view he got Mandane beside him, during the period of her pregnancy, and committed the child, at the moment of its birth, to his favourite Harpagus, to have it secretly dispatched. Harpagus gave it to a she-bear of Astyages, whose wife happening at the time to give birth to a still-born child, the latter was exposed, and the infant Cyrus substituted in its room. The child grew and became distinguished for king-like qualities, which betrayed his origin; and Astyages, incensed at the deed that had been practised upon him by Harpagus, took the cruel revenge of inviting him to a banquet at which the flesh of his own son was served up to him in a dish. Harpagus, however, in turn took his revenge; for, when Cyrus had reached manhood, he was invited by Harpagus to dine at the overthrow of Astyages, whose tyranny had made him odious to his people, and a party among the Medes was at the same time organized to support the pretensions of the young Persian. The plan succeeded. Cyrus at the head of the Persians revolted against Astyages, and in the contest that ensued victory declared on their side: Astyages was routed, and with him the Median dynasty terminated. What followed was strictly the Persian dominion, though from the connection of Cyrus through his mother with the Median race, and from the Medes readily accepting him as king, the empire he founded is usually styled that of the Medo-Persian. Xenophon represents Cyrus as occupying quite another position toward Astyages. He was brought up at the court of his grandfather, was treated with the greatest kindness and respect, served in the Median army, and became, when his father was deposed at the age of the general and deputv of his uncle, conducted the war against the Babylonians and took the city. The fabulous nature of this account, however, appears from another, and more strictly historical part of Xenophon's writings; for, in his Anabasis iii. 17, 12, he refers to the transference of empire from the Medes to the Persians, and represents it as the result of a civil war. The account of Herodotus, therefore, must be viewed as the more correct; although it is perfectly possible, that either Astyages himself, or one of his sons, may have been for a time associated with Cyrus in the empire, with the view of reconciling the Medes to the change. Cyrus, there is every reason to believe, became, when a comparative youth, and by force of arms, the real head of the kingdom; but—as even Herodotus reports him to have treated Astyages with kindness after the conquest—policy may have dictated the association of Astyages with him in the empire, or possibly Caxaraces, the son of Astyages, mentioned in the erroneous account of Xenophon, may have been the real deputy of the Medes, and Astyages, at the time of Cyrus's accession to power, can only be spoken of metaphorically: recent investigations connected with the Assyrian and Chalcean remains have as yet thrown no fresh light on them; and the uncertainty which has hitherto rested on the matter is likely still to prevail. That Cyrus became king of Persia, or supreme head of the Medo-Persian empire, admits of no doubt; that he also, as leader of the Medo-Persian forces, successfully copecl with the Chalcean power, and made himself master of Babylon itself, by diverting the course of the river, and entering by its then deserted channel into the heart of the city, while the people were engaged in a festive celebration, is likewise sufficiently authenticated. These are the two main facts in the history of Cyrus, which are pre-supposed regarding him in Scripture, and to which very explicit reference was made in Isaiah, even before they actually occurred. (His earlier victories over Croesus and the Lydians are not alluded to.) The point which in this connection chiefly causes difficulty, is the statement in Da. v. 31, which affirms that "Durin the Median took the kingdom (viz. of Babylon), being about three-score and two years old;" and in ch. vi, which speaks of Darius as the king, after the Median conquest, and represents Daniel as prospering under him, and afterwards under Cyrus; or the Persians. The most common mode of explaining this part of the sacred history has been by adopting the account of Xenophon in preference to that of Herodotus, and supposing that Daniel's Darius the Mede was the Cyaxars of Xenophon, the uncle of Cyrus. An ancient opinion, however, identified him with Astyages; an opinion espoused by Synesius, and apparently favoured by Da. ix. 1, where Darius is called the son of Ahasuerus or Ahashueresh. This is but another form of the name Cyaxars (as appears alone from Tobit xiv. 124), and Astyages was the son of Cayaxarcs. In that case, Astyages may be regarded, not as the proper name of the old king, but as a name of honour, which, indeed, there is some reason for supposing at any rate; since it bears some resemblance to the Hebrew, "the biting snake," which was long borne as a title by the old Scythic kings of the country (mackinnon's herodotus, i. p. 474 note) The personal name of the last Median king, whom Cyrus succeeded, may still have been Durin. The chief objection to this explanation is a chronological one. To the fall of Babylon is fixed by the most careful inquirers to the year B.c. 538; and if the person designated Durin the Mede was the same with Astyages, and then only in his 624 year, he must have been born in the year B.C. 608, which is only about seven years before the date usually assigned for the accession of Astyages to the throne, and is also at variance with a fact stated by Herodotus, that he was married in his father's lifetime (B.C. 70). But the dates and transactions of the Median history are not very certainly known; and it is possible that if we had the means of more thoroughly and minutely understanding them, the apparent inconsistency now adverted to might disappear. We must either suppose this, or conclude with Mr. Rawlinson that "there are scarcely sufficient grounds for determining whether Durin Medus of Daniel is identical with any monarch known to us in profane history, or is a personage of whose existence there remains no other record." (Herodotus, i. p. 44.) The explanation given in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology is founded on the tradition of Darius the Mede with Astyages. After stating that the Scripture notices do not really accord with the representations of Xenophon, and that his account is entitled to no credit, the writer proceeds to state "that a much more probable explanation is, that Darius was a noble Median, who held the sovereignty as the viceroy of Cyrus, until the latter found it convenient to fix his court at Babylon: and there are some indications, on which a conjecture might be founded, that this viceroy was Astyages. It is quite natural that the year that the viceroy in which Cyrus began to reign in person at Babylon should be reckoned as it is by the Hebrew writers, the first year of his reign over the whole empire. This view is confirmed by the fact, that in the prophecies of the destruction of Babylon, it is Cyrus, and not any Median king, that is spoken of." (But see under Darius.) The procedure of Cyrus in reference to the Jews, after he took charge of affairs at Babylon, is highly honourable to him, and in itself not unnatural. From the position of Daniel he could not remain long unacquainted with the case of the Jews, and, we can scarcely doubt, also would be informed of the things noted in their Scriptures which he had been instruc mental in fulfilling. Such information must alone have rendered him favourably disposed toward them, and the comparatively pure form of monothelism, under which he had been reared in Persia, must have still further disposed him to look with favour on those who stood aloof from the idolatries of Babylon—the rather so, if, as there is reason to believe, the reformation effected by Zoroaster in the popular creed, and the recall of the Persian people by him to a proper worship, was coincident with the reign of Cyrus. The divine unity being already received by him as a fundamental principle, and the sun, or fire generally, being regarded only as a symbol of God, he might with perfect propriety say, as he is represented to have said in the decree he issued respecting the Jews, "The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth," xvi. 12. But that he opened his mind to the instructions of Daniel and his fellow worshippers of God's people, and from these received his most special light, there can be little doubt. And hence, both from his readiness in listening to divine counsel, and the important part he acted in accomplishing the divine will, he is called by anticipation in Is. xlv. 1, "the Lord's anointed," for though without the external form, he had the reality of a divine mission, qualifying him for important service in connection with the kingdom of God. It is on this account, and not simply because he was a king, that such language is used concerning him.

After the conquest of Babylon, Cyrus, according to Herodotus, engaged in a war with the Massagetae, a people beyond the Araxes, and there lost his life. Gossin represents him as falling in battle with a nation called Derbies, who were assisted by the Indians. According to Xenophon he died quietly on his bed, and after the manner of a sage, holding serious discourse with those about him. The probability is that he fell in battle, as nothing but truth could have given currency to a report of that description, after so splendid a career. His tomb was at Pasargada, the palace near Persopolis, built on the spot where he defeated the Medes. A description is given of the tomb in Arrian (vi. 20), it was a neat quadrangular edifice, with a low door, leading into a little chamber, in which lay a golden sarcophagus, containing the body of Cyrus. The tomb bore this inscription, "O man, I am Cyrus who gave the empire to the Persians, and was lord of all Asia; therefore grudge me not my sepulchre." It is generally supposed to have perished, but Sir R. K. Porter has sought to identify it with an extant building (vol. i. p. 265).

DABERATH, written also DARETH, in the Sept. as Darath and Azurath, a town on the borders of Issachar and Zebulun, Josh xi. 27, vs. 19, v. 22. It was one of the cities assigned to the Leviites, and is understood to be the same with the Dabiria of Eusebius and Jerome, which they connect with Mount Tabor in the region of Decapolis. Robinson supposes the name to be still preserved in Dibarik, "a small and unimportant village, lying on the side of a ledge of rocks just at the base of Tabor" (vol. i. p. 160). The ruins of a Christian church are still visible.

DAGON, a god of the Philistines, with an important temple dedicated to him at Gaza, and another likewise at Ashdod or Azoth, Deut. xxvii. 25, 18: 19. x. 19. The same name occurs in the Sept. as Zorath. It was a name among the Assyrians, worshiped under the name of Oannes (Greeks in Curtius, Fragments, p. 22, 23, 39, 31; Assyrian sculptures in the British Museum; Rota's great work, p. xxvii.). The passage in Sennacherib (1189, p. 19), which derives Dagon from Dagon, p. 27, "corn, because this deity was the discoverer of corn and husbandry," has given rise to much discussion among the learned (Beckert, Herod. 14; Röper, Meth. ad spec. gen. 226); but as the same authority also affirms that after Dagon had found out bread, corn, and the plough, he was called Zeus Aratrus, it would follow that the Dagon to whom the temples were dedicated was a distinct deity from the Dagon or Zeus Aratrus, the god of agriculture. The derivation from do (<der>, der, and <gol or gui>, idol Dagon) is on the other hand much more conclusive and accordant with the principles of formation, and with the root דג (doph), which signifies "to multiply, to be increased"—for nothing can be more prolific than a fish, hence a symbolic form compounded of the human intelligence—man, and of the property of the inhabitant of the sea—a fish, would be a most significant idol for a commercial and maritime people like the Phenicians. It seems plain indeed, from the description given in Scripture itself, 1 Sam. v. 4, that the form of Dagon was of this sort—human only in the upper part, and in the lower deficient, and so peculiar as to present what was properly distinctive of the idol. The words strictly rendered stand thus: "When they arose early on the morrow morning, behold Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground before the ark of the Lord; and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off on the threshold, only Dagon was left on him"—that is, which properly made him the idol he was, and which gave him the characteristic fish-like appearance. The Assyrian sculptures also place before our eyes an actual representation of the Dagon of the Philistines, which exactly corresponds with the description in question, and likewise a representation of the Dagon of the Assyrians, according in all particulars with the account of Berosus. The sculpture from Khorsabad (Botta, xxii. sq.), represents the building of a port or making of a road from the coast up to some important maritime city, situated upon an extremely steep and rocky eminence, and large pieces of timber for the work are being brought by numerous ships and boats. The prow of the vessels terminates in the head of a horse, the emblem of the Phœnicians and the Carthaginians, and the stern in the tail of a fish. That the wood is brought some distance by sea is intimated by its having to pass two considerable places, one built on a projecting piece of land, a rocky promontory or perhaps island, which may represent male Tyr, whose king in the time of Solomon supplied all the cedar and fir for building the house of the Lord, 1 K. v. 6, 7; Est. iii. 7; and the second fort, built on the coast, possibly Sidon.

Among a great variety of marine animals, including the shell-fish of the Tyrian dye, the Assyrian combination of man, bull, and eagle, is seen walking with stately gait, and the dignity of the Philistines, Dagon, half man half fish, is likewise accompanying the expedition and encouraging the men. A bull with eagle's wings, but not the head of a man, is seen sporting in the waves. In none of the castellated buildings are any signs of hostility, and we are further assured of the pacific character of the operations by the presence of the divinity of the coast, and of the Assyrian symbolic figures, uniting in conterminancy and aiding some project, probably of defence, executed by the natives of the coast. (For a further account of this subject, see Mr. S. Sharpe in Niniveh and its Palaces, 3d ed. p. 150.) The sculpture found at Niniveh, and now in the British Museum, represents the figure of a divinity wearing a short fringed tunic, hanging turban, robe, bracelets, amulets, and two daggers. In his left hand he carries a richly decorated bag, and his right hand is raised in the act of presenting a phial. His beard is elaborately curled, and on his head is an egg-shaped cap, with three horns and the ears of a bull; covering the back of this cap is the head of a fish, while the body of the fish falls over his shoulders and continues down his back; the whole figure in short as described by Berosus. In the first year there appeared from that part of the Euxine Sea which borders upon Babylonia, an animal destitute of endowed with, try) reason, by name Onins, whose whole body (according to the account of Apollodorus) was that of a fish; that under the fish's head he had another head, with feet also below, similar to those of a man, subjoined to the fish's tail. His voice too, and language, was articulate and human; and a representation of him is preserved even to this day. In Miss Fanny Corben's admirable papers on "The Rechams," she has some ingeniously calculated to prove that the Chaldaean Onins, the Philistine Dagon, and the Misseminon Onins are identical (see The Rechams, and their Connection with Egyptian History, John Stuart's Literature, vol. iii. No. 5, not serial).

The temple of Dagon at Gaza was pulled down by Sannum, Jos. xvi. 23. When the Israelites were defeated at Elvenezer, the Philistines took the ark of God and deposited it in the temple of Dagon at Ashdod, 1 Sam. iv. 11, 12. After the death of Saul at Gilboa, the Philistines cut off his head and fastened it up in the temple of Dagon, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4-7; 1 Chron. x. 14, 15. The temple of Dagon at Ashdod was burned by Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabees, about B.C. 148, 3 Macc. x. 81. There was a city in Judah called Beth-dagon, Jos. xiv. 14, and another on the frontiers of Asher, Jos. xix. 27.

It is not unimportant to notice—as confirmatory of the view just given of Dagon worship—that deities of the same description were worshipped along the Syrian coast; in particular Derceto, the female deity of Ashkelon, of which Diodorus testifies, that she had the face of a woman, but the rest of the body was in the form of a fish αμμωνις φαλακρον, which Basset has translated as "the sea unconverted to fish," in which the fish-women Derceto and Atargatis must have derived. The latter, which assumes so many forms, Atargatis, Astarte, Adarigata, Astartis, Artaxis. Astarta, is as to its derivation compounded of addir (sea), great, glorious, and dog, fish, and consequently designates the great, the divine fish. The other name, Derceto (Derceto) is only an abbreviated form, and has arisen from the dropping of the preformative syllable; for there still always remains the root-syllable dog, dog, and, most, the essential one in the designation of the fish-deity (symbolik, n. de 15). The worship of deities under this unnatural and fantastic form probably had its first rise (as is also indicated by the learned writer just quoted) in the traditions respecting the prevalence of the waters in primal times, terminating in those of the general deluge; in consequence of which the marine powers of nature seemed to issue in, and give birth to, the dry land and its productions, with man at their head. So that a fish form, culminating in a male or female head, might, according to the crude and idiolatrous notions of the ancient Syrians, be a suitable representation of the deity to which they owed their place and being on the Syrian coast.—Ed.

DALMANUTHA; what in Mar. v. 10 are called "the parts of Dalmanutha," appear in Mat. xv. 39 under the name of the "coasts of Magdala." Dalmanutha was probably a village on the western shore of the Lake of Gennesareth, either the same with Magdala, or in the same neighbourhood. But no certain information has reached us regarding either.

DALMATIA, anciently a part of Illyricum, but mentioned separately in 2 Ti. iv. 19 as the region for which Titus had left Paul, while the latter was at Rome. It lay on the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea, and stretched towards Macedonia.

DAMARIS, the name of an Athenian female, who, along with Dionysus the Areopagite, is honourably mentioned as having listened to the preaching of St. Paul, and formed part of the infant church which he founded at Athens. Nothing further is known of her.

DAMASCUS [Heb. דָּמָשְׁכָּס, modern name داماسك], certainly one of the most ancient cities of the world, the capital formerly of the kingdom of Syria, and still the seat of a patriarch, as well as an important mart of commerce. It is situated at the foot of the most south-esternly range of Anti-Libanus, which in that region varies from 600 to 800 feet, but near Damascus rises to 1500 feet above the extensive plain with which Damascus is connected, while the plain itself is about 2200 feet above the level of the sea. An hundred more may be added for the site of the city, making fully 2300; whence it has the advantage of a temperate climate and cooling breezes. It lies in the direction of north-east from the Sea of Tiberias, from which it is distant about 26 hours or three ordinary days' journey, and as many more are required to complete the distance to Jerusalem.

The site of Damascus combines so many advantages in respect to beauty and fertility, as well as geographical position, that a city could scarcely ever have been wanting to it. It forms a convenient halting-place and entrepot between the northern and southern regions of that part of Asia; and a more desirable locality for the purpose cannot well be conceived. The scenery in the level plain, its horizon bare, its lines of surrounding hills bare, all bare far away on the road to Palmyra and Bagdad. In the midst of this vast plain lies at your feet the vast lake or island of deep verdure, walnuts and apricots waving above, corn and grass below; and in the midst of this mass of foliage rises, striking out its white arms of streets hither and thither, and its white minarets above the trees which embosom them, the city of Damascus.

have been the Abana of the ancient Syrians, called also Chrysorheas by the Greeks. Its course, after leaving the mountain range out of which it rises, is along the north wall of Damascus, thence proceeding eastwards through the plain, till it empties itself by one branch into the lake of Kildijeh, and by another into a lake a little farther north, esh-Shukrijeh. On passing the city, however, as many as nine or ten branches are derived from it for supply to the houses and gardens, as also to feed flocks in different directions through the plain. But notwithstanding such drawbacks, it retains a considerable volume of water, and preserves the appearance of a fine clear stream. The Pharaoh, anciently spoken of as also a river of Damascus, 216 c. 12, could scarcely be any other than the Abaj, which rises in Mount Hermon, and flows through the more southerly parts of the plain in which Damascus is situated, till it reaches the lake Hijijeh. It could therefore only be called a river of Damascus, because Damascus being identified with the kingdom of which it was the capital, or at least with the extensive plain in which it formed the chief point of interest. The distance of Damascus from the two lakes into which the Barada falls is about 20 miles, or 6 hours; to the other lake the distance is a little more. In regard to the city itself, there is nothing new at least, whatever there may have been in remoter times, which is fitted to awaken much admiration in the minds of European travelers, except the copious supply of water, and the pleasant gardens, orchards and baths, which it is thereby enabled to possess. This, however, has its accompanying evils and disadvantages: for the number of reservoirs and fountains scattered throughout the courts, and often even introduced into the parlours of houses, favours the production of mosquitoes in the later part of summer and autumn, renders the lower apartments in houses damp, also cold in winter, and is the source of a good deal of ague and rheumatism. It has led too, to the very general practice, especially among the females, though not confined to them, of walking upon high cloths or platforms. Of the streets there are only a few that produce a favourable impression; the greater part are narrow, crooked, and dirty. The principal street is also one of the straightest, and is regarded by the Christian population as the street which Josephus says the Christian Jews walked in. It is that in which Paul took up his abode shortly after his conversion. It runs right through the city nearly in the direction of from east to west, and is about a mile in length. That it is not by any means what it once was seems certain. Comparing the past with the present, Mr. Porter says, "In the Roman age, and up to the time of the Mahometan conquest, a noble street extended in a straight line from this gate (the east, Bois-Shorjeh) westward through the city. It was divided by Corinthian colonnades into three avenues, opposite and corresponding to the three portals. I have at various times traced the remains of these colonnades over about one-third of their whole length. Wherever excavations are made in the line, bases of columns are found, and fragments of shafts lying prostrate under accumulated rubbish. The street was like those still seen in Palmyra and Jerash; but unfortunately the devastations of war, and the vandalism of Arab and Turkish rulers, have destroyed almost every remnant of its former grandeur" (Tract., p. 177). This street is chiefly remarkable now for the busy scene it usually presents of persons coming and going in the interests of trade and commerce. The houses in this street, as well as others, are commonly built with a framework of timber, filled in with the clayey soil of the plain, the better sort having a false stores of stone at the bottom. Externally they have a shabby appearance, but those of the wealthier inhabitants are highly decorated inside, and are of course richly provided behind with fountains and shrubs.

Among the more noticeable public buildings, though none are very remarkable, is the eastern gate already mentioned, which exhibits some remains of Roman architecture—the castle, which is situated in the north-west quarter of the city, and in its foundations dates from the Roman period, a large and imposing structure, viewed from without, but little more than a shell—and above all the great Mosque of the Ommandjes, which is understood to have been originally a heathen temple, and afterwards the church of St. John the Baptist. It occupies a quadrangle of 169 yards by 180; is of various styles of architecture; is divided into nave and aisles by Corinthian pillars, has a floor of tessellated marble, and three minarets. There are many smaller mosques throughout the city, upwards of eighty it is said, the domes and minarets of which are among the chief architectural ornaments of the city. The bazaars are of great variety and extent; a particular quarter of the city is assigned to them, and they are separated according to their respective wares and trades. They usually take the form of covered arcades, with a row of narrow shops on each side. The commerce connected with Damascus consists to a considerable extent in goods brought from the East, especially from Baghdad, and from European countries through Beirut. But the manufacture of the place are also of some variety and importance. Its once famous sword-blades, indeed, exist no more; and the fabrics named damasks from the city, though still made there, have lost their ancient renown, and are surpassed by those of European production. About 4000 hours, however, are said to be employed for stuffs of mixed silk and cotton; for cotton alone about 400. Gold and silver thread is manufactured pretty largely, horse and camel gear, perfumes and delicate oils, soap, &c.

The population of Damascus, with its suburbs, is estimated at 120,000. Of these nearly 120,000 are Moslems, with whom there are about 4000 Greeks from 5000 to 6000 Jews. The Christians are subdivided into the various sects of Greeks, Greek-Catholics, Syriac-Catholics, Maronites, &c., the two first divisions, however, constituting by much the greater number. The Christian and Jewish populations have each a quarter of the city assigned to them—both in the eastern part, but the former more to the north, the latter to the south.

History.—The notices that occur in Scripture of Damascus reach back to the time of Abraham; the steward of his house, whom at one time he expected to become his heir, was Eliezer of Damascus, Ge xiv. 21; and as another place, Hobah, had its locality indicated from its relation to Damascus, the latter must even then have been a city of some note, Ge xiv. 15. Its origin, however, is lost in antiquity, and that it was built by Uz, the son of Aram, and great-grandson of Noah, according to Jewish tradition, cannot be received with any confidence. How it flourished, or through what changes it passed during the generations that followed the time of Abraham, we know not. After the lapse of well-nigh a thousand years, it appears as an important in the manifold vicissitudes which passed over the province of Western Asia, till it fell in, A.D. 1516, into the hands of Sultan Solim I; from which time it has remained under the sway of Turkey—head of a large pashalic, and the most populous and flourishing city which belongs to Asiatic Turkey. Many cities in the East have surpassed it in the extent of their population and the splendour of their edifices; but in tenacity of existence, and the power of maintaining a certain measure of prosperity under all circumstances, and through the most varied vicissitudes of fortune, Damascus may be said to stand unrivalled in the world's history.

stood second in number, having no fewer than 62,700 adult males, Nu. 1:29. These had increased to 61,100 at the close of the sojourn in the wilderness, Nu. xxvi. 13. It does not appear, however, that the tribe was otherwise distinguished, or ranked quite in proportion to its numbers; for nothing remarkable is noticed in the history respecting its general influence, and though it was placed at the head of the northern division of the host in the march through the wilderness, Nu. iii. 25, yet when actually settled there a comparatively small territory was assigned it: nor did its people, even within that territory, succeed in dispossessing the original occupants of some of the better positions. The portion assigned them lay on the coast, having parts of Judah and Benjamin on the east, Ephraim on the north, and Simeon on the south. But being in the immediate neighborhood of the hardy and well-equipped Philistines— for the district lay partly within the Philistine territory—the available land proved somewhat too narrow for the Danites, and they were pushed back into the more mountainous region, where they encroached on the boundaries of Judah, Jos. xv. 33; xvi. 1-31. It is said in Jos. xiv. 17, according to the received translation, “And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them.” In the original there is nothing corresponding to the too little; but by an old interpretation the going out from them, which is in the original, was understood to mean, drawn away from them, so as to leave them too little for a possession. This however is a somewhat arbitrary mode of interpretation; and the more correct rendering is, “And the border of the children of Dan went from them,” that is, away to a distance from their proper settlement, or beyond the district at first allotted them. And the text immediately proceeds to tell how; for it is added, “And the children went up to fight against Laish (Laish), and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Laish Dan, after the name of Dan their father.” This is a brief notice of what is related at length in Ju. xviii., with attendant circumstances not very creditable to the religious and moral character of the tribe. The Laish or Laish referred to stood on the most westerly of the sources of the Jordan, about four miles from Panas on the way to Tyre, and the settlement formed there by the Danites constituted the extreme northern possession of the Israelites; so that “from Dan to Beersheba” became a proverbial expression to indicate the entire distance from north to south.

The most notable personage connected with the tribe of Dan was the Nazarite Samson, who, being raised up and miraculously endowed by God for the deliverance of his people, gave an additional and specific confirmation to the word spoken by the dying patriarch. Furnishing in the person of Samson one of the judges of Israel, it was true also of Dan, in this more restricted and peculiar sense, that he judged his people; but not even then was he remarkable for the higher attributes of character. Samson’s mode of warfare, and we may probably infer the procedure of the tribe generally, strikingly corresponded with the description given in the remaining portion of Jacob’s words, “Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse’s heels, so that his rider shall fall backward.” By a misapprehension of the proper import of these words, and a misapplication of them to events not lying within their scope, some of the Christian fathers found in them a prediction of the future Antichrist. What they really contain is a characteristic delineation of Dan as a warlike tribe, indicating it as one that should be distinguished less for bold, decided, and magnanimous action, than for sly and effective ambush-work; watching its opportunity to strike a blow when the objects of its hostility were not looking for it, and making severe reprisals when the victory might have seemed to be won. Such was peculiarly the characteristic of Samson’s victorious energy; and the procedure of the tribe in regard to the conquest of Laish was much of the same description. Possibly its proximity to the powerful and warlike Philistines may have fostered this tendency in the tribe, and led them to adopt the policy it naturally gave rise to, as the wise, sometimes the only practicable one, in their circumstances.

2. Dan was also the name of a city, situated in the extreme north of the Promised Land, as Beersheba at the farthest south. In later times it acquired a bad notoriety from having been selected by Jeroboam as one of the two centres of his idolatrous worship; he set up the calves he made, the one in Dan and the other in Bethel, 1 Ki. xii. 29. The latter place, one can easily see, was well chosen as a rival to Jerusalem, and might catch many who were on their way thither. But Dan was so much on the more outskirts of the Israelitish territory, that a place mere within the district afterwards known by the name of Galilee would evidently, in point of situation, have been more suited for Jeroboam’s purpose; and we naturally imagine that some collateral reason must have weighed with him in fixing upon so remote a position. This we readily find in the preparation that had been made to his hand in that new settlement of the Danites; for at the very first they set up there, and continued ever afterwards to maintain a species of idolatry. On their way to the place they stole the image of Micah, and carried with them his priest, Jonathan; and the sons of this man, it is said, continued to be priests in Dan, and to minister in connection with a corrupt worship, till the day of the captivity of the land, Ju. xviii. 24. All therefore that Jeroboam had to do, was to substitute one graven image for another, and to adapt the sacred buildings associated with it to a greater throng of worshippers—which the Danites were more likely to hail with satisfaction than to resist as an innovation. It is probably on this account more particularly— that is, from the low moral tone of the tribe of Dan generally, and the shame it had in the corruption of the worship of God in ancient times, that in the sealing vision of the Apocalypse, 2. vii, in which by means of numbers derived from the Israelitish tribes—12 x 12 x 1000—a representation was to be given of an ideally perfect and complete church, since one of the tribes required to be omitted, that of Dan, was the one actually fixed on. The city that bore the name of the tribe, and some of the most prominent events of its history, were so identified with the work of apostacy and corruption, that it seemed meet to exclude this name from a scene which so distinctly pointed to the election according to grace.

The city became early involved in the judgments and calamities which befell the northern parts of Palestine, 1 Ki. v. 29, and is never mentioned after the close of the Old Testament record; nor has any certain trace been found of it in modern times. As according to an ancient opinion, which however is obsolete of any solid foundation, the second syllable in the name of the river Jordan was derived from this town. (So JORDAN.)

DANCE. The term used for this in the Hebrew Scriptures (תָּנָךְ—nancal) is derived from a root which signifies to move or leap in a circle, to twist or turn round, and most naturally indicated that kind of ring or churn dancing, which appears to have come very early into practice on joyous occasions, and in eastern countries still retains its place. That the Heb. signifies to dance after this manner, in such passages as 1

xxii. 21; 25; 1 Sa. viii. 5; 2 Sa. vi. 16, admits of no reasonable doubt. But some prefer taking the word (nancal) in the sense of a musical instrument—a probably a kind of pipe; and the Arabic version sometimes renders it by a word that imports a sort of drum. But the ancient translation of the Septuagint gives the sense of dance (αἰκός), and the highest modern authorities, such as Gesenius and Fürst, take the same view. In all the passages where our English Bibles speak of persons giving vent to their joyous feelings in dances, they have the support both of the most ancient interpreters and of the most competent scholarship of the present day.

The earliest notice we have of the dance in Scripture presents it as an accompaniment to sacred song, and this among the Hebrews appears to have been always its chief employment. The lyrical productions which sought to express the more lively and melting moods of the soul, were bound, especially on occasions of profound and general interest, to be insufficient in themselves to represent the strong exaltation and rapid movements that were expected within; the flow of words must be aided by appropriate sounds and actions by music and dance. So it was on the exciting occasion of the deliverance of Israel from the Red Sea, when the triumphal ode which celebrated the deliverance was sung with music and dancing: Miriam taking the lead, and followed by others of the Israelitish women, Ex xvi. 25. In like manner, at the lamentable slaughter of the Philistines which was inaugurated by David's personal victory over Goliath of Gath, the women are told came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, answering one another and saying, Saul hath slain his thousands and David his ten thousands, 1 Sa. xviii. 6. David himself at a later period danced before the ark of the Lord, when it was carried into Jerusalem—danced and played on instruments of music with such warmth and energy as to incur the reproach of Michal, for acting, as she thought, in a manner unbecoming his royal dignity, 2 Sa. vi. 16. The usual practice, it would appear, in Israel was to allow the dancing on joyous occasions to be performed by hands or chorus of women; they are very commonly named as the only parties that engaged in it; and this, no doubt, would tend to aggravate in Michal's eyes the apparent indecorum of David on the occasion referred to; he would seem to be doing in the excess of his religious joy what it was hardly proper for a man, to say nothing of a king, to perform. The kind of dance that was usual on such occasions (indicated as already noticed by the etymology of the name) may be gathered from what is still common among the Arabsians. The dance of the Arabs resembles in some respects that of the Albanians, and those who perform it are scarcely less extravagant in their gestures, or less extravagant in their excitement, than those wild mountaineers. They form a circle, holding one another by the hand, and moving slowly round at first, so through a shuffling step with their feet, twisting their bodies into various attitudes. As the music quickens their movements are more active; they stamp with their feet, yell their war cry, and jump as they hurry round the musicians. The dances of the women are not without grace, "As Hannah's Nieces and Female, p. 193. On strictly religious or serious occasions, there would of course be some modification of this energetic action, and on all occasions where females alone were the performers, What still prevails in the East is probably not materially different from what was usual in the time of David or even of Miriam. "The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps; and if she sings make up the chorus. The times are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time" (Lady M. Wortley Montague's Letters).

Unless the case of Jephthah's daughter be regarded as an exception, when she went out to meet him on his return from victory with timbrels and dances, 1 Sa. vii. 13, there is no mention among the ancient Israelites of dancing but in connection with sacred songs and religious solemnities. It may have been practised at other times; most probably indeed was it by the more fashionable and worldly part of the people; but more or less exists of it. And as the jealous manners of the East admit of little comparatively of free intercommunication between the sexes, so the practice of what is called promiscuous dancing—dancing performed conjointly by men and women—appears to have been nearly, if not altogether unknown. It was regarded as peculiarly a female mode of expressing joy or affording entertainment; and on those occasions when both sexes did take part in the performance, they seem to have occupied separate places. Such we learn from Jewish authorities was the case in that feast which was more than any other celebrated with demonstrations of joy—the feast of the greater victory. By connecting Nebuchadnezzar's coming against Jerusalem, therefore, with the third year of Jehoiakim, we must suppose that the period of its curban servitude is given (compare Jonah i. 3, where the same expression is used of a setting out), while in reality the capture of Jerusalem, and the deportation of a portion of its inhabitants to Babylon, was a year later. Two other deportations followed after this; one in the reign of Jeconiah, after an interval of eight years, and the final one on the destruction of Jerusalem, ten years later still, in the time of Zedekiah.

According to the common chronology it was in the year 606 or 607 that Daniel and his companions were transported to Babylon. His own age at the period is not given; but there can be little doubt that he was in comparative boyhood, having been selected, along with some other of the Israelitish captives, for their comic appearance, good parts, and liberal education, that they might be instructed in Chaldean learning, and become qualified for standing before the king and serving him in matters of state. It is not expressly said that Daniel himself was of the seed royal of Judah; but as the captives of this first period would seem to have been chiefly of the nature of hostages, and as particular mention is made of the princes and the king's seed among them, there can be little doubt that Daniel belonged, if not to a family of princes rank, at least to one of some consideration and influence in Judah. In common with his three companions, who were selected for a three-years' training, Daniel received a new name, that of Belteshazzar, which meant private or favorite of Bel; as if he was now given over and conscripted to the god of Babylonia. So doubtless he would have been if he had followed the course which the king of Babylon had destined for him; but another spirit moved in the breast of the Jewish captive, and rendered the Daniel, not the Belteshazzar, the proper index to his public career. It was the spirit of the Jewish theocracy, awakened into fresh life in his bosom and that of his noble companions, by what might have served in less thoughtful and elevated minds to extinguish it. He did not disdain by reason of it to submit to the training appointed for him, and to apply himself to the study of the heathen lore, in which the king desired his proficiency. This he well understood might be serviceable to him, as increasing the materials of his skill and cultivation; and in such departments of knowledge and art he had before him the eminent examples of Moses and Joseph. But in the matter of food—as the law of God had given definite prescriptions respecting what might and might not be partaken of—prescriptions that were sure in some respects to be violated in the preparation of every heathen, especially every royal, banquet—Daniel made conscience of abiding by the divine requirement, and refused to go beyond the simple but lawful fare of a vegetable diet. The remonstrances of the overseer could not shake him from his purpose; and approving himself, as he did, superior to the heathen youths of his standing in wisdom and learning, the experiment which he requested leave to make in respect to his food was granted to him. The result proved entirely satisfactory; he was found to have gained rather than lost in personal appearance by his adherence to the dictates of conscience, which, in the circumstances, could not be regarded otherwise than as an indication of the favour of Heaven.

Having stood so well the trial of the three years'
course of preparation, Daniel was received among the learned men—the magi—attached to the court of Nebuchadnezzar. And apparently not long after—for the matter is assigned to the second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, but, that is, after he came to the full possession of the kingdom, which was not according to the usual compounding till about two years after the subjugation of Babylonia—at that early period of his connection with the fraternity of Chaldean sages, an event occurred which at once fitted Daniel to the highest place among the trusty friends and advisers of the king of Babylon. The thing of itself originated in caprice and folly, but it was overruled by God to exhibit in the most convincing manner the insight which Daniel was privileged to gain into the divine secrets. Nebuchadnezzar had been visited by a dream which troubled him, and having meanwhile lost hold of the dream itself, he demanded from the class to which Daniel belonged, both the recovery of the dream and its interpretation; not only demanded this, but enforced his demand by the threat of instant death, if they failed to satisfy his desire. They did fail, however, and all their efforts to satisfy Nebuchadnezzar were of no avail, until a dream was given, and its dream and its interpretation revealed to him from above. The effect of this singular interposition in behalf of Daniel and his companions was, that through them Nebuchadnezzar came to some knowledge of the true God whom they worshipped, while Daniel was at once raised to one of the highest places of trust in the kingdom, and his companions also shared in his elevation.

A considerable period elapsed, during which no incident in Daniel's personal history is recorded, but which, in respect to his companions, was distinguished by the remarkable circumstance of their deliverance from the fiery furnace. In this second and still more wonderful interposition of Heaven in behalf of the Hebrew captives must have greatly added to the impression already produced of the living power and presence of Jehovah; and the more so, as the iron wall of Nebuchadnezzar himself, no less than the honours of his gods, had been prostrated before the superior glory that man found himself called upon to worship, and as if the close of the transaction the Babylonian monarch had become an intelligent and reverent believer in the most high God. But though some sacred influence may have remained upon his spirit, the sequel too clearly proved that he was not properly warned either from his idols or from his own overweening pride. For another—and the only other—occasion in connection with this monarch, which was rendered subservient to the establishment of Daniel's character and position, was one also which betrayed the still unsmitten spirit of Nebuchadnezzar. It was the dream he had—probably at no great distance from the close of his reign—respecting a lofty and unbranching tree, giving shelter for a time to all the beasts and fowls of heaven, but by and by cut down by a decree from the upper sanctuary, and left with nothing but the stump in the earth, till seven times had passed over it. This dream, after a fresh failure on the part of the wise men of Babylon, Daniel interpreted of the present position of Nebuchadnezzar himself, and the judgment that was impending over him for his heaven-defying pride. It was a trying thing for Daniel to be the bearer of such an interpretation; and we cannot but admire the mingled fidelity and tenderness which appeared in his mode of communicating it. This could not but soften the mind of Nebuchadnezzar the time; and the view disclosed respecting the approaching future was so remarkably verified in providence, that it led to the issuing of a general proclamation by Nebuchadnezzar, which at once extolled Daniel as superior to all men in spiritual wisdom, and magnified the name of God as above possessing the kingdom, the power, and the glory among men.

It would appear that after the time of Nebuchadnezzar Daniel's merits had fallen into neglect; for in the next emergency with which his name is associated—that of Belshazzar's feast—with the disastrous tragedy in which it closed—he was brought to remembrance by the queen, as now a comparatively unknown Jewish captive, but one who had acquired celebrity in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, for the supernatural wisdom and discernment which were found in him, and had been raised to the highest place among the wise men of the time. The Belshazzar here mentioned is called the son of Nebuchadnezzar; but as this word is often used for any near descendant, as well as for the immediate offspring of a person, it has generally been supposed that the Belshazzar of Daniel was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and corresponds with the Nabonid of Berosus. (See Nebuchadnezzar.)

The materials are still too defective for enabling us to pronounce with certainty on the names of those who succeeded each other in the old Babylonian dynasty, and their relations to each other. But there can be no doubt that the evening king, at the time when the city was taken by the Medo-Persian army, was distinguished for luxury, wisdom, rather than for valour, power, and that the city was even surprised by its captors when dissolved in revelry and mirth. The story in Daniel contains this account; and surpasses the intelligence, that the scene of the royal banquet was suddenly disturbed by the appearance of a hand writing certain words upon the wall, which being alone was found able to read and interpret. The meaning he drew from the hand-writing imparted the immediate overthrow of the Babylonian empire by the Medes and Persians; and in announcing the fearful import of the vision, he took occasion to connect the impending doom with the sins that led to it, and declared the insult which was that very evening given to the God of heaven, by the profane use of the vessels of his sanctuary to purposes of festive entertainment, to be the filling up of the measure of Babylon's iniquity. So that, putting all together through this Daniel—this God-judging man, first the mystic king of Babylon, then its lordly magnificence and pride, and now finally its very existence as an independent empire, was judged and brought to naught, that the word and kingdom of God might stand.

The change of dynasty in Chaldea however did not relieve Daniel from the molestation of adversaries, or secure for him the undisturbed possession of the honour and influence he had won. The very distinction he had acquired, and which appears to have been fully accorded to him by the Medo-Persian conqueror, for the king thought to set him over the whole realm proved a source of danger, as it provoked the envy of the heathen governors over whom he was exalted. They therefore concerted a plan for his overthrow, by getting it enacted that no one for a period of thirty days should ask a petition of any one except of the king. On the ground of this foolish and arbitrary statute Daniel was accused of high treason, because he continued as before in prayer to God, and was determined to be cast into the den of lions. The king found his mistake, when he perceived the advantage that was taken of his enactment; but to maintain invalid the fixed character of the Medo-Persian legislation, which was pressed by the adversaries of Daniel, he allowed the judgment to proceed—hoping that deliverance might somehow come to Daniel from a higher source. Nor was he disappointed. The faithful servant of Jehovah was miraculously preserved from the mouths of the lions; he came up again unscathed; while those who had sought his destruction, when the judgment they exerted against him was vested out to themselves, fell a prey to the ferocity of the lions the moment they were cast into the den. Thus, under the new dynasty, as under the old, this chosen representative of the cause of Heaven continued to judge the heathen, and to present a living exhibition of the invincible might and glory of Jehovah.

The only other action in which we find him engaged, was one that exhibited not merely his strong theocratic spirit, but along with that his fervent and humble piety, which now enabled him to prevail directly with God, as formerly he had prevailed with men. It was near the close of his long and honoured life, when finding that the period had drawn nigh for the accomplishment of God's purpose to recover the dispersions of his people, and be favourable again to his land, he poured out his heart before God in confession, supplication, and thanksgiving; and, in answer, obtained the remarkable prophecy of the seventy weeks, which were to terminate in the events of Messiah's work and kingdom, ch. x. This is represented as having happened in the first year of Darius, about the year b.c. 536, which, on the supposition that Daniel was only fourteen years old when he went into exile, would make him now in his eighty-fifth year. He still lived a few years after that; for the vision commencing with ch. x. is referred to the third year of Cyrus; so that he must have reached the verge of ninety before his course on earth was brought to a close. (For the references made in certain parts to NERCHAINEZAR, Cyrus, and Darius, see the articles at these words.)

The other events that fill up the recorded life of Daniel consist of the series of apocalyptic visions he received. The first of these is assigned to the first year of Belshazzar's reign, ch. vi.—the vision of the four successive kingdoms, represented by so many wild beasts, followed by a fifth under the image of one like a Son of man; the second, which represented, under the images of a ram and a he-goat, the fortunes of the Medo-Persian and Grecian monarchies, with the bearing of the latter on the affairs of the covenant-people, is placed in the third year of Belshazzar's reign, ch. vii.; and the third—omitting the vision of the seventy weeks already noticed, ch. x.—is connected with the third year of Cyrus, and goes into many detailed representations concerning the operations of the earthly kingdoms with which Israel after the restoration was to be brought into contact, pointing at the close to the final issues of the divine administration, and the consummation of all things, ch. xii. Specific reference will be made to these visions in what follows; and it is unnecessary to characterize them further at present.

As regards the personal history of Daniel, it is only necessary to add, that while he lived to see the proclamation issued for the return of his countrymen to their native land, and had his heart intently set on its accomplishment, he did not take advantage of the opportunity given to exchange his heathen abode for a home on Israelitic ground. His extreme age would doubtless form a sufficient reason for his remaining where he was—compelled, it may be, with the consideration that during the short remainder of his earthly life he might be of more service to the infant colony at the seat of worldly power, than if he should go to take part with them in the struggles of their new position, for which also his advanced age well-nigh disqualified him. It is probable that he died in Susa, where he received his latest visions; and that this was the general tradition among the Jews in the East appears from the monument which was erected to him there, and which Benjamin of Tudela reports to have seen, in the latter part of the twelfth century, standing in front of one of the Jewish synagogues. But other reports fix on Babylon as the place of his death and burial.

II. It was not to be supposed that a history of deeds and revelations which presents so many of the peculiar and the marvellous, as that now surveyed, should escape the attacks of modern rationalistic criticism, as well as of the infidelity which is opposed to everything supernatural and divine. A great many minor objections have been brought into the field—more, however, for the purpose of affording a cover to opinions which are somewhat unwilling to rest their disbelief on simply ineluctable grounds; but there can be no reasonable doubt that the head and front of the objections taken at the history and the writings of Daniel lie in the extent to which they exhibit the supernatural element, first in action, and then in prophecy. Now, this ground of exception should vanish, with these at least who are believers in revelation, if it can be shown that the affairs of God's kingdom were at the time in such a position as to call for peculiar interpolations from above, and that those exhibited in the book of Daniel are precisely the kind which the circumstances of the period and the analogy of the divine dealings might warrant us to expect. This, we think, is what can easily be made appear.

The era of the Babylonish exile, coupled as it was with the present downfall of the throne of David, and the scattering of the Lord's people by a heathen power, was obviously a very singular one in the history of the divine dispensations, and if not met by extraordinary manifestations of the power and faithfulness of God, must have proved most disastrous to the interests of truth and righteousness. Something corresponding to it appeared at an earlier period—though in a comparatively nascent form—when the children of the covenant, as represented by the person and family of Jacob, were ready to sink under an accumulation of evils—the most hopeful scion of the family being sold as a captive into a foreign land, where he was for a time treated with cruel injustice, and by and by the family itself involved in the struggles of a severe and long-continued famine. It seemed for a season as if, instead of being destined to benefit the world by the overflow of blessing secured in covenant to them, they were to be overthrown by the troubles and calamities which were pressing in upon them from the world. But God could not allow matters to proceed thus; he must vin-
Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar, the representatives of the world of the sceptre of the earth, were delivered over to the world of the sceptre of heaven, which, it is plain to this last that the preference is due. For after having for a series of ages identified himself with the covenant-people in Canaan, and set up amongst them a throne and kingdom to which he had solemnly promised the heritage of the world, the Lord now, on account of their inscrutable obstinacy in transgression, cast their glory in the dust, and gave them as a helpless prey into the hands of the gigantic worldly power which, in the person of Nebuchadnezzar, seemed to spurn all limits to its dominion. If there had really been no limit to the exercise of power in the religion of the covenant people and their spiritualized kingdom, they had been broken and scattered under the sceptre of a heathen monarch; then the power of the world had proved mightier than the truth and faithfulness of God. This could not possibly be the case; nor could it even appear for any length of time to be so, without the most unhappy results both in respect to the representatives of the worldly power and to the faithful remnant of the covenant people. How were such results to be prevented? No otherwise than we can conceive than by fresh interpositions of divine power, exerted in behalf and through the instrumentality of that faithful remnant, such as might compel the king of Babylon and his minions to see that in them few and politically impotent though they were—there shone a might and a skill, before whose conquerors must own themselves vanquished. The war between God and the world would thus be carried into the enemy’s camp, and the weak things of God made to confound what is strongest in man; or, in other words, the higher elements of power which belonged to God’s people would be made to shine and overpower the weaker, which are all that the world in the very midst of its glory can bring into play.

Now, the wonders exhibited in the history of Daniel, and recorded in his book, are precisely of the kind that were needed in the circumstances, in order to produce the effect here supposed. This has been well stated by Keil: “The miracles are wrought for Daniel’s sake and his companions; they tend to Daniel’s glory. The reason of this is to be sought in the position which Daniel was called to occupy; since at a time when God could not manifest his glory in his people as a body, he had, on the one hand, to represent that people in his own person before the king of Babylon, who deemed himself almighty; and, on the other hand, to represent before the heathen, and at the supreme court of the world’s heathen monarchy, the theocracy which externally had fallen a prey to the power of the Chaldeans, as well as to strive by his presence for the preservation of those personal and spiritual interests to their own land. It was necessary not only that there should be miracles, but that the miracles should assume a powerful and imposing character, in order to make a due impression on the powerful representatives of heathenism; and that they served this purpose is shown by the termination of the exile, and especially by the election of Cyrus, which does not limit itself to a bare permission for the Jews to return to their own country, but expressly accredits honour to the God of Israel, as the God of heaven, and commands the building of his temple.”

Considered in this point of view the question respecting the supernatural events and revelations recorded in the book of Daniel resolves itself into another whether the cause of the old covenant really was the cause of God, and as such was to be preserved from falling under the power of the world. If it was to be saved from the general wreck which overtook the existing relations and interests of the period, nothing could have accomplished the purpose but some such singular interpositions as are here reported to have taken place in its behalf; and that it did survive when all around perished—may, sprung into fresh energy of life and action from what seemed the very grave of its existence, can no otherwise be accounted for than by the fact of such interpositions; the extraordinary result is the outstanding merit of its character, the transcendency of its claims employed to bring it about. For even if we could suppose that the writings of the other prophets, in particular those of Isaiah, might have contributed, on being made known to Cyrus, to bring about the result, there must still have been found some one like Daniel, who possessed the requisite consideration and influence to communicate that knowledge, and induce the conqueror of Babylon to act upon it. This, in the circumstances, could be no easy matter. And if extraordinary providence may have been required to produce the individual needed for the occasion, they were certainly not less required to sustain the faith and reanimate the hearts of the scattered members of the covenant, so as to keep them from total apostasy, and dispose them when the time came to undertake the re-establishment of their polity. It is impossible to conceive how this should have taken place, without the clearest signs going before of the special interposition of God in behalf of the affairs of the covenant, and the palpable ascendancy of his cause above the powers of heathenism.

And that Daniel was the person through whom the transcendent worth and living agency the miraculous intercession of Heaven displayed itself, not only the testimony of his own book, but the references made to him by the prophet Ezekiel, afford convincing evidence. In two places he refers to Daniel—first, at ch. xiv. 14-20, as along with Noah and Job an illustrious example of piety and worth in the midst of surrounding declension, though without being able to deliver others by it; and at ch. xxviii. 3, as the beam of light, which Tyrus in his extraneous self-delusion thought it possible to surpass. The earliest of these notices occurs in prophecies delivered probably about fourteen years after Daniel’s removal to Babylon—ten after his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, which laid the foundation of all his greatness; and the other nine or ten years later still, when his excellence and fame must have been known far and wide. There is no ground, therefore, for regarding the allusions in Ezekiel otherwise than as a strictly historical kind; and they could only have been made to supply the character and fame of Daniel’s character and fame having been fully established.
But Daniel as there represented was a type, as well as an emblem and a chosen vessel of divine communications. He was, in the true sense, a representative man; his personal history hinged the course which his predictions indicated as destined for the church of God; it produced a rise from the lowest depression, and through a long, arduous, often-renewed conflict with the powers of evil in the world, to the highest plane of authority, to the mastery of the world itself. The exhibition of this chequered, but ultimately triumphant course, forms the great burden of the peculiar revelations that came through him; and they were given forth—not as in the prophets strictly so called, with a directly authoritative aim, and with respect to the immediate wants of the church—but as from his own political position, standing on the world's watch-tower, where he was conversant with its higher movements, and from whence, with an eye illuminated by the Spirit of God, he could see over throughout future time the manifold evolutions of its successive monarchies, till they were finally displaced by the kingdom of God. There was thus a perfect congruity between his calling as a man and his revelations as a seer. His sphere of life brought him into contact with the affairs of states; and the Spirit gave him an insight into such affairs, both as regards the world and the church, for the ages to come. His book, therefore, in its distinctive character and its grand scope, may be designated the Apocalypse of the Old Testament, the Revelation of St. John is that of the New.

The prospective circumstances of the Lord's people now peculiarly called for such an apocalyptic insight into the future. The exile formed a new era in their condition, and was the commencement of a state essentially different from what had previously existed. They were never to be altogether gathered again from their dispersions among the nations; and henceforward the kingdom of God was to assume a more diffuse character. As a consequence of this new phase of things, prophecy as an abiding gift and ordinance in the sacred community was presently to cease. Even with the remnant who found their way back to Judea, and maintained a political organization till the times of reformation, there was to be no aid from the living voice of prophecy, except at the very outset, and in the long dark period of comparative helplessness and adversity was to intervene. During which, with curtailed privileges and a defective political organization, the people of God should have to maintain a struggle with heavy trials and discouragements, sometimes even with the most fierce and determined assaults on their very existence as the covenant-people of Jehovah. The seventy years of exile (so it was revealed to Daniel) were to be succeeded by seventy prophetic weeks, weeks of years, before the great hope of the nation was to be realized, and as well previous to that event, as in connection with it, troubles and desolations were appointed. If there was any period, as Calvin has said, when God might seem to have been asleep in the heavens, it was during the period that elapsed between the close of the Babylonish exile and the advent of Christ. And it could not but prove the more trying to the Lord's people, as the writings of the prophets abounded with so many glowing representations of the glorious future that awaited them. There was therefore a peculiar need, ere the period actually commenced, for those apocalyptic visions, which opened up the vista of the future in a way that had not been done before—which at once announced the happy and triumphant issue, and portrayed the dangers and conflicts through which it had to be reached. Even the particularity of the delineations, which have respect to the nearer future, ch. vii. xii., and which from the earliest times have been an occasion of offence, finds its explanation in the great want of the period—the want of a clear light to guide believers in the midst of the gloom that enveloped them; and in so far as it differs from other prophecies of a like kind—such as 1 Ki. xiii. 2; Is. viii. 7; xiii. 14, &c.—differs only in degree, and much also as the character of the respective periods themselves differed.

One may still further note the congruity, not merely of the revelations as a whole to the circumstances and prospects of the covenant people, but also of the form and manner of their communication to the respective positions of the parties interested. It was Daniel done, indeed, through whom all the revelations came, but the first apocalyptic outline was given to Nebuchadnezzar, the representative of the world's monarchies, though he had to wait on a higher wisdom for skill to decipher its import. And hence, as given to one who was conversant with the political aspect of things, that vision contemplates the several kingdoms in their external nature and relationships, ch. xi., while the next vision, ch. xii., which stretches over the same field, and exhibits substantially the same general outline, penetrates into the interior of the objects contemplated, and reveals their hidden character. For such a vision Daniel's spiritual discernment supplied the proper receptivity, and therefore it was reserved for him; and even to him was only communicated after he had been in a measure specially prepared for it by the earlier and less profound communication. It was not only that the rise, operations, and downfall of the Old Testament antichrist were fitly disclosed, ch. xii. 2-7, since they concerned the internal, even more than they did the external, affairs of God's kingdom.

And to assure the hearts of the true children of the covenant still further—to satisfy them that, however severe and terrible the conflict should be while it lasted, it was only to be a temporary cloud darkening their spiritual horizon—some more detailed visions were afterwards given to the apostle Peter. And a final phase of this dark period of comparative helplessness and adversity was to intervene, during which, with curtailed privileges and a defective political organization, the people of God should have to maintain a struggle with heavy trials and discouragements, sometimes even with the most fierce and determined assaults on their very existence as the covenant-people of Jehovah. with the individual names. And, on the other side, there fail to be added to what has been already advanced in support of the genuineness and canonical value of the book, the following important considerations:—

2. The reference made to the book in the time of the Maccabees, as already extant and familiarly known to the covenant-people, is also important. (See especially 2 Macc. 1:3; 8:9, 26, comp. 1 Esd. 5:27.)

3. So, too, and still more, its recollection by our Lord and his apostles, and that not only as forming part of the Jewish scriptures, which were collectively stamped as the oracles of God, but as containing explicit predictions of things yet to come. Our Lord, in Matt. xxiv. 25, pointed emphatically to the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet," words which at once designate him as a divinely-inspired man, and as the bearer of an announcement which, at the time referred to, was going to find its verification. Christ's familiar appropriation also of the title "Son of Man," is based on the prophecy in Da. vii., and the expressions in Matt. xxi. 32, xxv. 31, evidently point to the same prophetic work.

In St. Paul's writings, 1 Th. ii. 2 is founded upon Da. vii. 22, and 2 Th. ii. 3, 4 on Da. vii. 26, xi. 36; while, in the Apocalypse of St. John, there is a pervading use of the language and the symbols of our prophet. Allusions are still further made to portions of the book in Lu. i. 10 and He. xi. 33. Indeed, there are few books of the Old Testament that have exercised so marked and decided an influence over the New, or have there received an acknowledgment so explicit and full.

1. The language, partly Hebrew and partly Chaldee or Aramaic, and both precisely those of the period to which the book belongs, is a strong confirmation of its genuine and truthful character. It is somewhat difficult to assign a satisfactory reason for the alternating manner in which the two dialects are employed: first Hebrew to ch. ii. 4, then Aramaic to the end of ch. vii., and again Hebrew to the close of the book.

We cannot say that the historical portions were given in Aramaic as the vernacular, and the more strictly prophetic in the more sacred dialect, for the second and the seventh chapters are both in the fullest sense prophetic. Nor will it altogether do to say with Anthis (ch. ii. 5, b), that the Aramaic was used in ch. ii.-vii., because in these portions the development of the worldly powers is represented from a world-histori-
DARiUS is the Greek form of what in Hebrew reads Dārīwah, דאריוו; and this again is now understood to be a Hebraistic modification of the Persic Dārīwah, which has been found in a Persian inscription. Dārī, in modern Persian, means lord, and this, either with the formative termination ob, or with an abbreviation of lazeh, king, made the name Dārīwah, which the Hebrews pronounced Dāravwah, and the Greeks Dārion or Darus. Adhering to the Greek form of the name, which is most familiar to modern ears, Darius appears in Scripture as the name of three kings.

1. Darius. The first person of this name, is the one mentioned in Da. v. 31; vi. 1; x. 3, where he is called "Darius the Median," "son of Ahasuerus-Ahashverosh, of the seed of the Medes," and is represented as having taken the kingdom of Babylonia, or being "made king over the realm of the Chaldees." This it has often been averred, is contrary to fact; as, Cyrus was the conqueror of Babylonia, and the first Darius who reigned over the Medo-Persian empire was Darius Hy-tapes, who succeeded Cambyses, the son of Cyrus. It is true that the Greek historians so represent the matter. According to Herodotus and Ctesias, the line of Median kings ceased with Astyages, and the empire was transferred to the Persian Cyrus; so also Ptolemy Sic., Strabo, Polyaenus. Xenophon, however, ascribes to Astyages a son, whom he calls Gyaxares; a name which has been shown by Seligcr to be identical with Ahasverosh, the Greek Xerxes. And as those Medo-Persian names were all of the nature of titles, it is supposed by the authors referred to, and many others, that the Darius of Daniel was the Gyaxares of Xenophon. This view is confirmed by the testimony of Josephus, who calls Darius the son of Astyages, but adds that he was known to the Greeks by another name,

And under the word Darius, a gold coin. Suidas has the explanation that it was "so named, not from Darius the father of Xerxes, but from another and more ancient king," which again is confirmed by the fact of this coin being mentioned in the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The chief difficulty in this explanation arises from the different parts assigned to the son of Astyages in Xerxes and Daniel respectively; in the former, Xerxes has nothing to do personally with the conquest and government of Babylonia, while in Daniel Darius is represented as both getting possession of Babylonia and living for some time in it. On this account the supposition has lately been made (contrary to Ancient History and Mythology) that the Darius of Daniel was probably the first governor of Babylonia under Cyrus, and that he is viewed as the actual sovereign till Cyrus himself found it practicable to take charge of the kingdom. But this view seems to create as many difficulties as it solves, and cannot be regarded as satisfactory. In particular, it leaves unexplained these passages, both in Scripture and in profane authors, which ascribe the overthrow of the Chaldean power to the Medes in combination with the Persians, and indeed sometimes to the former even more prominently than the latter. (Da. xii. 4; Ezr. vi. 2; Ne. vi. 2; Jos. Ant. x. 5, 6). I have passed over Alexander, quoted from Sacy, and referred to by Herodotus in his remarks upon this subject. And if Darius had been merely a viceroy, appointed by Cyrus for a time, we cannot understand why his reign should have been spoken of as an independent thing, and lasting till that of Cyrus the Persian. In short, there seems as yet no satisfactory unravelling of this part of ancient history; and as matters stand, we must simply hold that there is evidence to believe in the existence of a Median monarch at the time of the capture of Babylonia called Darius in Daniel, but one who seems to have occupied little more than a nominal place, and that the real power was in the hands of Cyrus.

2. Darius. The second person spoken of in Scripture under the name of Darius, Ezra. i. 3; ii. 1; i. 2; x. 1, there can be no mistake in the well-known Darius Hy-tapes of history, who succeeded the temperate Cyrus in B.C. 521. He carried into execution the decree of Cyrus regarding the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, and the re-establishment of the Jews in their ancient territory.

3. Darius. He is named, N. x. 22, as the king up to whose time the succession of the priests was registered. The probability is that this was the Darius Notus of the Greeks, who ascended the throne B.C. 423—i.e. within a few years after Nehemiah's time—but some understand it be Darius Cambyses. (See JERUSALEM.)

DARKNESS, in the physical sense, is on three occasions very specially noted in Scripture. The first is at the period of the creation, when darkness, it is said, "was on the face of the deep," the dispelling of which, by the introduction of light, was the commencement of that generative process by which order, and life, and beauty were brought out of the primeval chaos. (See CREATION.) The second relates to the period of Israel's deliverance from the land of Egypt—a visitation of peculiar darkness, "darkness that might be felt," being one of the plagues that were found necessary to break the iron will of Pharaoh, and induce him to let the people go. (See PLACES OF EGYPT.) The third occasion was the awful moment of our Lord's crucifixion, during which St. Matthew relates that "from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour." It is rightly rendered "over all the land," for though some, chiefly ancient writers, have insisted on adhering to the more general import of the original Da. xxvii. 45, "over all the earth," and have sought out certain verses which seem to favour their opinion, there can be little doubt that the other view is the correct one. It was only in the land of Judaea, where the tragedy of the crucifixion was proceeding, and where alone any sense of its enormity, or even any knowledge of its existence, might be found, that the exhibition of a prevailing darkness could carry an intelligible significance. The world at large had not as yet come into contact with the person and the claims of Jesus; and beyond the theatre of his earthly ministry the darkness attending his crucifixion would have been as little in place as the miraculous attestations that heralded his birth, or the earthquake that opened the graves of many at his resurrection. It is, therefore, a mistaken zeal which prompted the inquiry after a universal darkness in connection with the death of Christ. But how that local darkness, which overspread the land of Judaea, was produced, is a point on which no information has been given, and on which it is needless to speculate. The fact of its having been at the time of full moon, and when consequently the moon could not come between the earth and the sun, puts the supposition of an eclipse out of the question. It is enough to say that, as the divine purpose required at the time a supernatural darkness in attestation of the appalling nature of the judgment which was in progress, so by some means or another, a peculiar obscuration of the sun's rays was effected sufficient to strike an awe into the minds of thoughtful observers.

As a symbol of spiritual truths and ideas, darkness has a somewhat varied application in Scripture, founded on the different properties and effects of the natural phenomenon. With reference to the obscurity in which darkness wraps the objects of nature to one's view, it is often used as an emblem of spiritual blindness, of total or comparative ignorance of the glories of kingdom, as when it is said, "darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people," Rev. 4:7; "the darkness is past, and the true light shineth," John 1:5. With respect, again, to the gloom in which things are enveloped when covered with darkness, this naturally becomes significant of sorrow and distress; hence, "the day of darkness" is an expression for the season of sore trouble and calamity, Isa. 20:4, 5; Jer. 27:2, 3; and "outer darkness" is the term used by our Lord to indicate the blank despair and unavailing melancholy of hell, Matt. 25:41. Still again, as darkness affords a convenient pretext and covering for the performance of deeds which shun the light of day, so "the works of darkness" is employed to designate the most flagrant exhibitions of wickedness, evil, and evil. Finally, from the awe which intense darkness produces upon the mind, the sense of profound and solemn mystery which it awakens respecting the scenes and operations around, the Terrestrial City of God, in its more mysterious and awe-inspiring manifestations; so God is represented as dwelling in the thick darkness, and having clouds and darkness round about him, Isa. 44:13. In the same spirit, while, in respect to the purity of his character and the overflowing riches of his goodness, he is also said to be light, and to have in him no darkness at all. (Dav.)

DATES. No. PALM-TREE.

DATHAN (belonging to a fountain), one of the chieftains in the tribe of Reuben, who took part with Korah in his rebellion against the authority of Moses and Aaron. (See Korah.)

DAUGHTER is used in Scripture, like sons, with some latitude. Even when referring to natural relationships it is not confined to those of the first degree, does not simply indicate the immediate female offspring of any one, but includes also the more distant relatives and descendants, such as daughter-in-law, niece, and sometimes even sister, Gen. 42:16; xxvi. 17. More generally still it is used of the female branch of a line, or the female portion of a community, as in the expressions, "the daughters of Meals," "the daughters of the Philistines," "the daughters of Aaron," Num. xxvi. 1; xxvii. 30; xxviii. 15. Then, as cities were very commonly personified as women, they naturally had the designation given to them of daughters of the country to which they belonged—as the daughter of Zion, the daughter of Jerusalem, or, as some prefer putting it, the daughter-Zion, the daughter-Jerusalem, taking the particular city as in opposition with the term daughter, which indicates its relation to the country, see Hengstenberg on Ps. 54:14. If, according to the other method, we take Zion, Jerusalem, as the mother that has the daughter, then by daughter must be understood the people who inhabit the city—its living progeny. It seems upon the whole better, and more in accordance with the oriental style of thought, to regard the city itself as the daughter; the offspring of the country as the seed of art and active occupation, much as the branches of a tree are also called its daughters, because springing from it and sustained by it; for example in Gen. xlix. 22, "a fruitful bough, whose daughters branched run over the wall." And finally, as a person may be regarded in some sense as the product of the time or period that has passed over his head, so the daughter or the son of so many years is a Hebrewistic mode of indicating the stage to which such an age has attained; thus Sarah is designated in the original "a daughter of ninety years," Gen. xvii. 17.

DAVID (bowed), one of the most renowned names in sacred history, and one that has perhaps more interesting and enduring associations connected with it than any other in Old Testament times. David was indeed, as David Lang has remarked, "one of the greatest men in the world," although Bayle himself, in his article on the life of David, certainly did what he could to diminish the greatness, by presenting in as odious a light as possible the sins and infirmities that marred the perfection of David's character.

Early life. David was the son of Jesse of Bethlehem, the youngest of eight sons, 1 Sam. viii. 11. The precise period of his birth cannot be ascertained; but supposing him to have been fifteen or sixteen years old at the time Samuel was sent to anoint him king which cannot be far from the mark, his birth may be assigned to B.C. 1054 or 1055. Of his boyhood nothing whatever is recorded, but as his father was the lineal descendant of Boaz, the grandson of that "righteous man of wealth," we may reasonably infer that the family was in good circumstances, and that the earlier years of David were spent in ease and comfort. It makes nothing against this that on the first occasion of his appearing on the stage of sacred history, he had to be brought from tending his father's flocks; for according to the simple manners of those times, the sons of even wealthy families took part in such employments: Boaz himself shared in the labours of the harvest-field. In that particular line of employment also, to which, whether from personal inclination or from respect to parental authority, David gave the early flower of his life, we cannot but perceive an important means of training and preparation for his future career. He thus became acquainted with the solitudes of nature: knew what it was to make his home in gloomy caverns and desert wilds; and while, in the ordinary tenor of life, finding ample opportunity for silent thought and heavenward musings, he was not without scope for active energy and stirring adventure, in climbing, as he must oft have done, the rocky heights or deep ravines with which the pastoral districts in the south of Judah abound, and in defending his flocks from the assaults of the beasts of prey that occasionally issued from the wilderness. David himself at a later period mentions two encounters of this description, in one of which a bear, and in another a lion, fell under his hand, 1 Sam. xxvi. 15. In a further respect, too, there was a fitness in the scenery and the oc-
The purpose of God to reject Saul and his family from the throne of the kingdom, brought David at once from the depths of obscurity to a prominent place in Israel's history. We only know of him as Jesse's son, when we hear of his distinction by divine appointment, and solemn consecration to the highest office in the commonwealth. Saul had been chosen because the desire of all Israel was toward him; but the divine sovereignty manifested itself so peculiarly in the case of David, that no one suspected—not even the prophet—employed on the occasion, nor the members of Jesse's family—that the election was to fall on him. One after another of Jesse's sons was made to pass before Samuel, but with no other result than of giving him to understand that still the object of the Lord's choice was not there; and it was not till the prophet had asked whether there were not a son still remaining, that the real object of search came into view. This was David, who at the time was in the fields tending his father's sheep, but could be lost for and appearing, the divine voice whispered in the ear of Samuel, This is he; “and Samuel took the horn of oil and anointed him in the midst of his brethren.” 1 Sa. vii. 12. It was emphatically the Lord's doing; no man, if left to his own imaginings, would have thought of choosing this youthful shepherd to the high but hazardous position of becoming the rival and successor of the house of Saul. Yet there was something in his appearance, it would seem, which young and inexperienced as he was, gave promise that the choice might one day find its full vindication; for he was of winning aspect and poorly to look upon. Nature had already in the youth given assurance of a man; but greatly more than nature even in her highest gifts and endowments was needed for the lofty undertaking devolved on the son of Jesse. Chosen to do the part of a man after God's own heart, and to found a kingdom in which God's mind and will were to be carried out, in opposition to the rebellious strivings and headstrong violence of man, he must be in an especial manner a vessel of grace; and so, what was symbolized by the anointing presented itself; and “the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward.” Spiritual endowments were conferred upon him corresponding to the high place and calling he had received.

There can be no doubt that the specific object of the anointing was to set apart David as the future possession of the throne; and that Samuel was perfectly cognizant of its full import; for the word that came to him was, that he should go to the house of Jesse in order to anoint one of his sons to be king; and precisely on this ground Samuel at first expressed his unwillingness to execute the commission, lest Saul should hear of it, and kill him, 1 Sa. xiv. 12. It does not appear, however, that the prophet gave any distinct explanation of the matter to the family of Jesse. The transaction appears rather to have been done as a kind of mystery; and it seems probable from the narrative, that while the family of Jesse witnessed the anointing of its youngest member, they were left to gather from the result what was its ultimate aim. The whole, possibly, they could gather from it in the meantime, was that David was set apart for some special service to God, and was to be furnished for his mission with appropriate gifts. How much more David himself knew we cannot tell; the prophet may have communicated to him privately a further disclosure of the divine purpose, which we cannot doubt David himself would be anxious to obtain. But whether he got this at the time or not, he must have perceived, from the very nature of his position, that it was only gradually the purpose of God concerning him could reach its destined aim; and that the high sphere he was called to occupy must be won by high service previously rendered. We are nearly in these accounts, with some (Samm. court. 14, p. 77), to bring into suspicion the historical verity of the outward anointing, as if it were but a symbolical representation, under the guise of history, of David's internal call to the destiny that was before him. In a case like David's the internal call must have had an external occasion on which to ground itself; and as the end to be reached was not merely a position of honour or influence in God's kingdom, but a divine office, to which consecration by oil through the hands of a competent party had also been given, it is not improbable that thus, in a God's providence, could have satisfied and sustained the mind of David in the desperate struggle that lay before him. Besides, incidental notices which occur in later parts of the history show that others, even in the opposite interest, had become e-guizant of David's appointment to the kingdom, as if some decisive act on the part of God concerning it had come to their knowledge. Saul himself, in one of his melting moods, declared his belief that David should surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel should be established in his hand; and Jonathan had virtually confessed as much some time before, 1 Sa. xx. 12; xxiv. 20. At the close of the struggle, when the tribes of Israel came to Hebron to acknowledge David as king, and have him publicly consecrated, they came with the testimony that the Lord had called him to feed his people, and be the captain over Israel, 2 Sa. v. 2. Abner also, somewhat earlier, puts it even more strongly; for he speaks of the Lord having sworn to David concerning the kingdom—apparently pointing to some notable and overt procedure regarding it, 2 Sa. v. 3. In short, comparing one part of the history with another, we cannot dispense with the historical reality of David's consecration by Samuel; this was the fundamental ground at once of his own hopes and aspirations, and of the general recognition of his claim; and the fresh anointing that took place at Hebron can only be regarded as the national response to what had been long previously and as in a mystery transacted at Bethlehem.

The new calling and endowments of David presently began to discover themselves—but at first only within the comparatively humble sphere of private life. Higher things, however, than the tending of the flocks now at times engaged his attention; for when mentioned, as he next is, in connection with Saul's spiritual malady, we find him commanded by one of the royal attendants as one whom he knew to be "cumming in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in discourse:" he added also, "comely in person, and the Lord is with him." This does not necessarily imply that David had already taken part in warlike expeditions, and distinguished himself on the field of battle, for which up to the period in question he could have had little or no opportunity. But it indicates that God, who had called David to a higher sphere of life, had also prompted his mind to the employments and pursuits which were to fit him for reaching and filling it aright. His poetical spirit and fine taste, which were afterwards to be turned to such noble account, had been seeking improvement, and next exercised, by the use of the harp; already, perhaps, welding sweet music to immortal verse. And as in those comparatively rude and disjointed times exigences and expedients required an indispensable condition skill and bravery in war, he also applied his energies in this direction, and became expert above his fellows in the handling of military weapons, and remarkable for the heroic bearing which bespeaks the capacity for their suitable employment. Then, doubtless, as he was under God's special training, opportunities of a certain kind were from time to time afforded him, both for the display of his gifts, and for his acquiring the confidence in them which it was essential to possess. On such a kind, particularly, was the occurrence respecting the lion and the bear, to which reference has already been made, and the report of which could not fail to spread to some distance. But we may be sure there were others also of a like kind, calculated to deepen the impression, though no special notice is taken of them in the brief narrative of his early life. And it was perfectly natural, that when an occasion was presented at the court of Saul for the use of some of his peculiar gifts, there should have been one at hand who in the providence of God was able to testify to their existence and bring them to notice. The occasion, we are told, led to David's introduction to the presence of Saul, and his employment for a time around his person. When Saul heard of David's skill as a harper, he sent a request to Jesse that he would cause David to repair to him; and Jesse, not only complied with the request, but himself also went, carrying some presents for the royal household. The object, too, contemplated by the proposal, we are informed, was gained; David's music quelled the tumult and gloomy workings of Saul's bosom, so that he loved David greatly," and he asked and obtained permission from Jesse to let the young stranger continue with him. It is even said he made David his armour-bearer. But this must have lasted for but a short season; and it is even difficult to account for what follows, on the supposition of David having stood for any period of time in the presence of Saul, and been much about him as an armour-bearer. For when David, in the next scene described, stepped forth and accepted the challenge of the Philistine, there was an apparent ignorance respecting him on the part of Saul and those about him, which it is not quite easy to understand. Various efforts have been made to get rid of the seeming anomaly—some by transposing portions of the text, others by altogether omitting portions, on the ground of their being later interpolations, &c., but without producing any satisfactory result.

The more probable view of the matter is, that the difficulty arises from the brief and somewhat fragmentary character of this part of the sacred memoir. The account of the affair with Goliath, contained in ch. xvii., has all the appearance of a separate and independent piece at first; probably written for the purpose of being handed about, as an autographic and full narrative of a most memorable transaction, and inserted by the historian just as it stood. Hence, in this portion of the narrative a fresh statement of David's family relationship is given, ver 14, as if nothing had been said about them before. Yet even here a pre-existing connection is implied between David and Saul, in the passing intimation that "David went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem." The original connection had been speedily broken up, probably by the report of warlike preparations on the part of the Philistines summoning the king to active duty; and David had been too much occupied during the brief sojourn at Saul's court with his artistic employment as harper, to become widely known in any other line. For his nomination to be one of Saul's armour-bearers imports little as to any peculiar intimacy with Saul. Job, we learn, had no fewer than eighteen armour-bearers, _in nubilo_; and it is likely Saul had a still greater number. The name was probably given to David at first very much as a kind of court-distinction; without involving anything like the necessity of personal attendance in warlike operations, such as those which were required to meet the Philistines. David therefore returned to Bethlehem, and resumed his original occupation, in order to allow his older brethren to join the army of Israel. He might the rather do so, as he must have perceived that it could not be in the capacity of a common soldier he was to find the road to eminence opened for him. But yet, after what had already happened, there could scarcely fail to be some kindlings of desire and hope in his bosom, perhaps some moving impulses of the Spirit, instinctively drawing him toward the field of conflict, as soon as the camps of Israel and the Philistines had come to be pitched in hostile array against each other. When so drawn thither, the fitting occasion presented itself in the proof and insane defiance that was hurled by Goliath of Gath against the host of Israel. He saw with shame the hearts of his countrymen quailing before the heathen champion; and felt constrained by the Spirit of God to accept the challenge, and wipe off the reproach. Already the zeal of the Lord's house consumed him; and in spite of fears suggested by the timidity, and taunts thrown out even by his own brethren, he went forth to grapple in mortal conflict with him who defied the armies of the living God. There was no faltering in his step; his heart was strong with heroic confidence for the occasion; but it was confidence in the might and faithfulness of God, rather than in the skill and prowess of his own arm, and a confidence that could throw itself back for support on earlier experiences of the divine interposition. Nor was it now misplaced; the giant adversary fell under the God-empowered shepherd of Bethlehem; and catching the spirit of this youthful hero, the heathen abashed forces of Israel rose as one man, and put the embattled host of the Philistines to rout.

The impression produced by this action was immense; not merely the thing done, but the spirit and manner of doing it, rose far above the sphere of ordinary life.
It was as if a higher being had suddenly alighted upon the scene, and made a new era to emerge in the affairs of Israel. No wonder that men's minds were astounded, and that even such as were not entire strangers to David began to ask who he was. It is in this way we would account for the interrogation of Saul, "Whose son is this stripping?" It does not necessarily imply that he was totally unacquainted with David; possibly enough he recognized in him the stripping harper, who had been for some time in his own employment; but now the youth had sprung into such higher being so noble a heroism breathed in his words and behaviour, that the little Saul had known of him seemed by no means adequate to account for what now appeared; and he could not but think that the youth who could speak and act thus must have had some peculiar training. It was quite natural in the circumstances, and another peculiarity in the narrative—one which has often been the occasion of difficulty, or of formal objection, that, namely, of David's being said to have taken the head of Goliath to Jerusalem—may find its explanation in the original design of the narrative, already adverted to. For if it was intended to present a sort of model and complete view of David's history in reference to this important transaction, which, in a sense, laid the foundation of his future greatness, the ultimate destination of the head of Goliath might fitly enough have been noticed at the close of the narrative, although it was not till a considerable time afterwards that the circumstance actually occurred. At the same time there is nothing in the known relations of the period to have prevented its being done immediately; for the scene of conflict was at no great distance from Jerusalem; and though the fortress of Zion was not taken till David became acknowledged king, the city of Jerusalem was from an early time occupied in part by the Israelites, i. e. xii. 7.

The greatness of David's success in this remarkable conflict proved the occasion of unexpected trouble: for the ascription of higher praise to him than to Saul in the songs with which the women greeted the conquerors—"Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands"—roused the mortal jealousy of Saul, and prompted the question respecting David, "What can this meaning of Saul, and such praise be about his kingdom? He would probably never have crossed his mind, but for the solemn announcement made to him some time before by Samuel, that the Lord had rejected him from being king, and had given the kingdom to a neighbour of his that was better than he, 1 saul. xxvii. Thence it became impossible to shut his eyes to the probable result that seemed hovering in prospect, and thinking of David as the neighbour destined to occupy his throne. He eyed him, therefore, from that day forward. Yet the secret conviction that the hand of God was in the matter—the excellence also which shone forth in David, his winning manners, and prudent behaviour, which were equal to his prowess in war, rendered it advisable for Saul in the meantime to suppress his feelings, and proceed by stratagem rather than by open violence. But he could not control himself; and in the part he actually played, stratagem and violence, deceit and cruelty, alternated with each other. Even in the first deliberate attempt against the life of David there was something apparently of both; for the evil spirit, it is said, came upon Saul, and he prophesied (i.e. assumed somewhat of the frenzied air and excited manner of a prophet), and availed himself of this extraordinary state and humour of the moment to strike at David with his javelin. David, however, was upon his guard, and the blow missed its aim, 1 saul. xxvii. It would appear that something of a like kind was tried a second time, for it is stated that David avoided out of Saul's presence twice; so that a feeling of awe seemed to spring up in the mind of Saul respecting David, as toward one under the special protection of Heaven, and visibly partaking of the divine blessing. He would therefore resort to other and more covert methods: give him command of a troop of soldiers, that he might be exposed to the perils of war; send him on an expedition against the Philistines, in the hope of having him slain by their hands; even wed him to his daughter, on condition of his producing an hundred foreskins of the Philistines, hoping that he should lose his life in the attempt to make it good. But all in vain as regarded the great object of Saul's ambition: David prospered whithersoever he went, rose higher and higher in the general esteem, and was not only married to Michal, Saul's daughter, but greatly loved by her, and by Jonathan his brother. These members of the royal family did what they could to appease the brooding jealousy and disire of their father. David's intervals still tried the charmed influence of his harp; and Jonathan put not his honour merely, but his very life in jeopardy, that he might secure for David upright and honourable treatment at the hands of his father—but with no beneficial result. The repugnant spirit of Saul became more and more settled in its antipathy to the purpose of God regarding the son of Jesse: and it became at last evident that nothing remained for David but flight. Even this he effected with difficulty, and only under cover of a stratagem practised by his wife, by means of an image representing him in the bed, and by feigning him to be sick.

Then began one of the most marvellous series of trials and persecutions, of wondrous malice and resolute prosecution of evil, on the one side, and, on the other, of noble endurance, elastic energy of spirit, fertility of resources, and wonderful escapes, coupled with manifold reversions of good, to be found in the records of history. In threading his perilous way through this dark and stormy course of his career, it is impossible to say that David always kept the right course, and that he never resorted to improper means to secure his safety or advance his interest. There can be no doubt that his faith sometimes failed, and that a mistake occurred and virtual falsehood occasionally took the place of open and manifest reliance on better resources. Of such a kind, in particular, were his false pretences to Ahimelech at Nob, that he was in urgent haste upon the king's business, which incidentally led to a most disastrous result, 1 saul. xxvii; his repairing for protection to the king of Gath, and feigning himself mad to escape the danger in which he found himself involved, ch. xxii; his subsequent return to the same quarter, after many narrow escapes from the hand of Saul, and carrying with him now a well-disciplined force, with which he professed to be doing service to his country, while in reality he was taking the advantages his situation afforded to fight against the enemies of his country, ch. xxiv. These were undoubtedly marked and obvious failures in the history of David, and should mar the perfection of his character, from the consequences of which he needed once and again to be rescued by the special interposition of God. But it should be remembered, on the other side, that the circumstances in which David was placed were of a singularly harassing and vexatious description. He was, in the most emphatic sense, a persecuted man; for his troubles came upon him, not from any native harboring in his bosom, or wickedness found in his hand, but on account of his pre-eminent value and worth, and these as the signs of a calling from Heaven, which he distrust not if he would. The adversary, too, with whom he had to struggle, whatever he might originally have been, was now in a most relentless and savage humour; a man who sought to strengthen himself by his wickedness, Ps. xlii. 7, and so resolutely bent on the destruction of the cause of David, that no deceit, treachery, or vindictive violence was deemed unsuitable to his purpose. Experience shows how rarely even mature Christian men can, in similar circumstances, and for any length of time, preserve their equanimity, and refrain from meeting one form of evil by resorting to another. But how much more must it have been so in the case of a solitary individual like David! and he a more stippling at the commencement of the troubles, little more than turned of twenty, and moreover, he lived under a far less clear and perfect dispensation than the Christian! Even with such odds against him, he did for a time bear the provocations and assaults aimed at him with a fortitude and a meekness of wisdom but rarely exemplified. And if afterwards, when hunted like an outlaw from place to place, and, amid the general terror and suspicion that prevailed, scarcely knowing whom to trust, or whither to betake himself, he should sometimes have stumbled in his course, this ought rather to move pity than excite our reproachment or draw forth our censure. David himself was by no means insensible of his failings. He ever, indeed, asserted his innocence in respect to the charges brought against him by Saul; and protested, that so far from seeking after mischief, he had often returned evil with good, and was suffering for his very righteousness, Ps. xix. xxiv.; Ps. vii. xxi. in n. But this was perfectly compatible with a sense of shortcoming or sin in other parts of his procedure. How readily, for example, did he take blame to himself on hearing of the results that incidentally grew out of the deceit he had practised at Nob—the slaughter of the priests—excluding in bitterness of soul to Abiahaar, "I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father’s house!" Ps. xxi. 22. So again, in the affair with Nabal, his consciousness of error betrays itself in the benediction he pronounced on Abigail for arresting him in his rash purpose to shed blood: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me; and blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from shedding blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand," ch. xxxii. 25, and still again, in Ps. xxxiv., composed on the occasion of his escape from the miserable plight in which he found himself at the court of Achish, though he does not expressly confess to the error of his course, he yet virtually does so, by ascribing his deliverance entirely to the loving-kindness of God, in no respect to his own crooked policy—nay, solemnly warns all who would look for mercy and blessing from Heaven, to keep their tongue from evil and their lips from speaking guile. The truth now burst fully on his view, that while present safety, or at least ultimate deliverance, was sure to all God’s people, it was only to be obtained through humble reliance on God’s name, and steadfast adherence to the way of his commandments, but his was a very indulging of this, and many more spiritual songs, during the period of these Sauline persecutions songs so remarkable for the healthfulness of their tone, so fervent in their breathings after God, so fraught with the dewy freshness of a youthful piety—is itself a conclusive proof of the habitual uprightness of David’s course—a palpable evidence that they could be only occasional aberrations into which he fell, while still in its settled frame his soul continued right with God.

From his excommunication to his great backsliding. The third stage of David’s career commences with the fall of his great adversary, which opened the way to his possession of the throne. The change was instantaneous in one respect, though only gradual in another. The defeat of Israel on Gennesaret, which proved fatal to Saul and Jonathan, relieved David of all fear of further persecution; the strength of the rival interest was gone; and the two parties had virtually changed places. On David’s part, however, there was need for all the discretion and practical sagacity of which he had hitherto shown himself to be so abundantly possessed. For his connection hitherto with the Philistine territory could not fail to have involved him in a certain degree of suspicion, which the adherents of the house of Saul would gladly take advantage of to his prejudice; and the very misfortunes which had led him that house itself would not unnaturally create in the bosoms of many a reced in its favour. Moved partly perhaps by this chivalrous feeling, Abner, the captain of Saul’s host, had resolved to stand by the cause of his late master, and gave to Ishbosheth the benefit of his military talents and experience. It was evidently proper, therefore, that David should leave no room to doubt how he felt in such a crisis of his country’s affairs as had now arisen, and show where his sympathies really lay. Hence, at the very outset, the summary judgment he caused to be inflicted on the selfish and coward Amalekite, who by his own confession had given the finishing stroke to Saul’s life, and then hurried off to David with his crown as an offering, which he had a right to present, and which David could not but thankfully accept of; and by this friendly greeting he sent to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, who had jeopardized their lives to give to the bodies of Saul and Jonathan an honourable burial. And, more than all, the song he inspired in their mournful fate—so touching in its allusions, so free and full in its chorus of tender and patriotic feeling, that no one who heard it could doubt the generous affection that glowed in his bosom, or fail to perceive how truly his heart beat for the honour and well-being of his country. As the knowledge of such things spread, the impression in David’s favour must have grown, and the minds of the people have been turned toward him, as the only man fitten to rally the scattered forces and repair the shattered condition of Israel.

It need not therefore surprise us to learn, that the men of Judah presently came and anointed David as their king, 1 Sa. iv. 1. He had previously, in obedience to the divine direction, left Ziklag and taken up his abode at Hebron. But even before this, and also before the catastrophe at Gibeon, the way was preparing for David’s ascendency, and many accessions were made to his party. In 1 Ch. xii. we have a long list of persons, many of them designated mighty men of war, who DAVID went over to David from the different tribes of Israel—not only from Judah, but also from God, Manasseh, and not a few even of Saul's "brethren of Benjamin"—so that, as it is said, "there came to David to help him day by day, until there was a great host, like the host of God." It would seem that the signs of Saul's perdition had become so palpable, and the yoke of his arbitrary and jealous administration so oppressive, that the result was anticipated by a considerable number of the more clear-sighted and valiant men, who turned away from Saul as the destroyer, and began to look to David as the preserver of the country. So that by the time David left Ziklag for Hebron he had, one might say, the state and equipment of a king; and the large spoil which he had been enabled to distribute among the cities in the south of Judah, after his defeat of the Amalekites, at once enforced the strength of his host and the liberality of his heart toward his brethren of his own tribe.

David was still only thirty years of age, 2 Sam. vii. 1—a comparatively youth, though already old in a varied and hard-earned experience. It was now simply a question of one of his subjects to the possession of the entire kingdom; for it soon became manifest that Ishbosheth was altogether unfit to guide at such a crisis the reins of government. There were, however, a good many skirmishes between his forces under Abner, and those of David under Joab; in one of which Asahel, the brother of Joab, fell a sacrifice to his own rashness by the hand of Abner. A quarrel by and by ensued between Abner and Ishbosheth, on a ground far from creditable to the former; and Abner immediately entered into negotiations with David. What were the terms of their agreement we are not told, excepting that David made the restoration to him of Micheal, Saul's daughter, an indispensable preliminary. The reasons for this doubtless were, that Micheal, in the first instance, was his lawful wife, and had been unrighteously taken from him and given to another man of the name of Phaltiel; that it would have been unbecoming in him, a manifest violation of order and decorum, to have set on the throne of Israel, while his proper wife remained in the possession of one of his subjects; and that the resumption in this respect of his own, was fitted to tell with a conciliatory effect on the adherents of Saul's house. To place Phaltiel's attachment to Michael in opposition to such grounds, and represent David's conduct in the matter as selfish and hard, is to subordinate the claims of reason and principle to mere natural feeling.

This part of the conditions was speedily fulfilled by Abner, Phaltiel weeping, it is said, at the separation of Michael from him, but offering no resistance. The further connection of David with Abner was violently interrupted by Joab, seeking to be revenged for the death of his brother Asahel, and not improbably also actuated by some feeling of jealousy in regard to the place likely to be occupied by Abner, under the guise of a friendly interview with Abner took occasion to slay him. David was affected with deep sorrow at this calamity, which both in itself, and from the manner in which it was perpetrated, was fitted to tell most unfavorably on his interests. He therefore publicly bewailed what had happened, celebrated the memory of Abner as that of a prince in Israel, and strongly reproached the conduct of Joab, though he durst not proceed further against him. There was no necessity for any such restraint in regard to the perpetrators of another crime— the two men who laid violent hands on Ishbosheth, and brought his head to David; those he ordered to be instantly put to death. But now the path was clear for the reunion of all the tribes under the sway of David; by the providence of God, and by his own inherent fitness for the work, he stood in a manner alone; and so the whole commonwealth of Israel came by their representatives to Hebron and anointed him their king, 2 Sam. v. 1-30. This was the third and final anointing David received. The precise date of it is not given, but it must have been near the close of the seven years during which David is said to have reigned at Hebron; since it was clear he could not for any length of time have continued the seat of his government there after being made the head of the whole nation. Accordingly, the first thing we hear of his movements after his elevation to the full sovereignty, respects the conquest of the stronghold of Zion, which till then had been held by the Jebusites, and the selection of Jerusalem as the capital of his kingdom. The situation had many natural advantages for such a purpose. It was so carefully fortified by David, that it became a place of great strength. The prosperity of David however, in one direction, naturally gave rise to opposition and as more in another. It was to be expected that the Philistines in particular, with whom David had been so closely connected, would resent his elevation to the throne, and would endeavour to establish over him the ascendancy they had hitherto acquired over the house of Saul. Accordingly, they came up in full array against him once, and even a second time; but in each case were completely defeated, 2 Sam. v. 17-25. At a later period the Philistines appeared again among the assailants of David, but not, it would seem, by themselves; they acted in concert with the other surrounding nations—the Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and Edomites—who together involved David in a series of arduous struggles, and sometimes in great apparent danger; but with the help of God he proved triumphant over all, 2 Sam. vii. 16; comp. Ps. cxix. 7-10. So that the kingdom received through his instrumentality both in firm consolidation and a wonderful enlargement. Israel was united at home into one compact body, and it held a political sway over the tribes that lay around them from Egypt to the Euphrates. But David knew his mission too well to suppose that a political ascendency, or a national resurrection, was all he had to accomplish. The religious, not less than the political, state of his people called for a reformation. There were disorders of old standing, such especially as had come in about the time of Eli's death, and which must have been aggravated by the ungodliness that characterized the party and later proceedings of Saul. David therefore addressed himself in earnest to the task of bringing the public service of God into a proper organization, and infusing new life into its institutions. This lay fully within the scope of his calling, as the earthly head of the theocracy; for as such it belonged to him to rule in the name of God, and take order to have all that pertained to the divine will and glory efficiently carried out. And as the tabernacle was still in a similar condition, the ark of the covenant having never been restored since it was captured by the Philistines and deposited at Kirjath-jearim, his first object was to have this brought back and set in its proper place. That place now, he was given to understand, was Jerusalem—where was to be the centre of the kingdom in a religious as well as a civil respect; and the covering under which it was to be put was a tent specially provided for it, doubtless after the pattern of the old one, and so provided, we may naturally suppose, by divine direction. The probability is, that the original tent was by this time in a decayed and shattered condition—unit for being transferred to a city like Jerusalem, and set down there in the midst of new and ornate buildings. It was therefore left at Gilboa, 1 Sam. ii. 11, while a new one formed after its likeness was pitched in Jerusalem: whether also were carried the brazen altar, together probably with the rest of the more important utensils. A day was then set apart for bringing up the ark to its appointed place in this tabernacle; but from want of due preparation, and a certain degree of indifference shown by Uzziah in having hold of the ark, the judgment of the Lord broke forth, and awe-struck by the visitation of Heaven upon Uzziah, it was left for a time in the house of Osiroth, which was much at hand. But only for a time, the voluntary going up of the ark into Jerusalem was again resumed, and accomplished also amid great demonstrations of joy and gladness.

In these David himself took so active a part, that he was reproached by Michah for behaving in an unmikin-like manner. His hilarity, however, was the result of religious feeling, the exuberance of spiritual joy, which it was more his glory to exhibit on such an occasion, than would have been cold and stilted demeanour, such as Michah descripted. It is to that occasion also, as regre'ttedly belated, we owe one of the finest of David's sacred lyrics—Psalm xxxiv., equally remarkable for the depth of its spiritual meaning and for the hallowed fire that glows in its moving strains. But this was only one of many compositions of a like nature, which David through the Spirit prepared for raising the hearts and animating the devotions of the covenant people. They now reap'd in this respect also the fruit of David's byzame troubles. For, as has been justly said, "it was the cross which first brought David's poetic gift into full development.

His first psalms were composed during the time of the persecutions from Saul, and the old saying, "where would have been David's psalms, if he had not been persecuted? has its foundation in truth." (Hengstenberg on the Psalms, App. sect. 2.)

Besides the psalmonic poetry which David produced in such abundance for the service of the sanctuary, he also paid much attention to the cultivation of sacred music, in which he was himself so great a master.

Certain Levitical families were set specially apart for the purpose of conducting the music of the temple, with their heads and leaders Asaph, Heman, and Jotham, 1 Chron. xxv.

No fewer than 10,000 out of the 30,000 Levites existing in David's time were employed in this department of service; some, however, being stationed at Gilboa beside the old tent, while the rest served at the new one in Jerusalem. Ultimately, of course, the temple absorbed the whole. For the purpose of securing an orderly and efficient administration in other parts of the sacred ritual, the priests also were divided into families, forming twenty-four courses, which continued to apostolic times, 1 Chron. xxiv. Some of the arrangements were, we may suppose, introduced gradually, and certain alterations would naturally be made after the erection of the temple. But to David belongs the honour of initiating this higher and more perfect celebration of the Old Testament worship, and of accompanying it with such spiritual songs as gave living expression to its great truths and principles.

David's zeal for the house of God did not even rest with these strivings for a more lively and befitting performance of the tabernacle service: he sought to have the very fashion of it changed, by raising the tabernacle itself into a magnificent temple. He thought it unseemly that the ark of God should continue within certain walls, whilst himself dwelled in the house of cedar, 2 Sam. vii. 2, and do all that is in his heart, said Nathan the prophet, when he first heard the proposal; but he afterwards received a special revelation from God, instructing him to express the divine approval of David's purpose, but reserving the execution of it to the peaceful times of David's successor; and in consideration of David's faithfulness and zeal, assuring him of a perpetuity of his kingdom, yea, indicating in no doubtful terms, that from his bones, and as the ultimate inheritor of his throne, should come the glorious Sauvoir and Head of the Messianic humanity, Messiah.

This great promise forms the basis of all the Messianic psalms, in which its import is more distinctly unde\ld, such as Ps. ii. xvi. xvii. xv. xx. It forms the climax of David's heritage of glory, as the period when it came was that also of the culmination of his spiritual life: he had now done his noblest works for God, and in return he received the highest tokens of the divine satisfaction. Would that he had but known how to stand where he had attained, and to drink with meekness of wisdom the cup of bliss which was made to run over!

But the result proved otherwise: David could not abide in this fulness of honour. There had been a root of bitterness in his domestic condition tolerated in him as in others from the imperfection of the times, but by no means accordant with the scriptural idea of a holy life—and from its very nature apt to grow and become a snare to the soul. We refer to his polygamy, wife after wife having been added to his household as he rose to consideration and influence in the world; beside Michah, first taken from him and again restored, Abinadab and Abishai, whom he unsuccessfully married in the wilderness, then at Hebron the daughter of Talmah king of Geshur, Abital, Ethah.

And now, in the midst of his prosperity, as if these could not suffice to minister to his fleshly desire, and having espied in a moment of weakness the beautiful wife of Uriah, he took her to his bed, while her husband was fighting at a distance in the service of the king. A most mournful deflection of itself in such a man! but fearfully aggravated by the series of iniquities that followed in its train: the base attempts, first by meancing, then by intoxicating drink, to hoodwink Uriah in regard to the dishonour that had been done to him—and, when these failed, the still baser device practised through Joab of sending him to a post of danger, and treating him so as to insure his falling by the hands of the enemy. One soul trembles, on reading the history, at the amazing depth it discloses of deceitfulness and depravity in the human heart—even in a heart that has passed through so peculiar a training and risen high in the divine life. So blind and senseless in spiritual things had David become, that nothing but the message of God by Nathan, with the piercing application—"Thou art the man," availed to raise him from his false security, and bring him to a sense of the enormity of his procedure. But when once properly aroused all his better feelings revived, and if the guilt of true believers seldom reaches a height like his, as rarely perhaps do they attain to his measure in depth and pungency of regret and remorse. The evidence of this survives, not merely in the historical record of his tears, and supplications, and fasting, as xi. 16, seq., but also, and still more, in these penitential psalms in which he has depicted "the soul's deepest hell of agony," and provided for all time forms of devotion for those who are wrestling with the fears of guilt and condemnation. Indeed, viewed in respect to his peculiar calling as the sweet Psalmist of Israel, David could not have served either his own or future generations of the people of God as he has done, unless he had grappled with convictions of guilt in their more appalling forms, and felt all God's waves and billows passing over him. For though—to use the language of another—"we neither excuse his acts of wickedness, nor impugn them to the temptation of God, who cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth any man, yea by his less the church hath gained: out of the evil of his ways much good hath been made to arise: and if he had not passed through every valley of humiliation, and stumbled upon the dark mountains, we should not have a language for the souls of the penitent, or an expression for the dark troubles which compass the soul that fiareth to be deserted by its God" (tracing, Preface to Homile on the Psalms).

Even that does not comprise the whole of the church's gain. As new views were now disclosed to David's soul of the unspeakable depth and bitterness of sin, so he was prepared for rebelling in his own behalf, and in a measure presenting to others, a new and deeper revelation of the future King that was to spring from his bones, and to bring the kingdom to its destined completeness. He already knew that the right to reign over the house of God was to be linked in perpetual union with his line; that blessing in the higher sense was not to be attainable among men, except as the fruit of the covenant made with him. But alas! how deeply must he now have felt that he was himself incapable of imparting that blessing! Outward triumphs he had been enabled to accomplish for the theocracy; his administrative gifts had secured for it a more compact or penitential life, and by his spiritual songs and energetic agencies he had most materialistically contributed to pour fresh life into its institutions and services. But what were all these in comparison with the good that was still needed to reach the destined result? In the great controversy that sin raises between man and God, David found himself like one sinking amid deep waters; his boles melted as wax before the fire; and from these depths of distress the cry arose in his bosom for one who should be able to grapple effectually with the mighty evil, and bring deliverance from its power. It was, we have reason to believe, when thus exercised, that the eye of David began to be opened by the Spirit on the prospect of a sin-bearing and suffering Messiah. It was no longer one who should merely conquer and rule, that could satisfy his desire—one that should subdue the nations under him and dash their rebel chiefs in pieces like a potter's vessel; but one who should be a priest upon the throne, yea, and a priest on his way to it making reconciliation for iniquity, and by the agencies of a mysterious but triumphant wrestling unto death, slaying the evil in its very root, Ps. xxi. 14. Such was the longing that now arose, the hope that now formed itself in David's bosom; and if it dawned upon him through the troubled gloom of painful experience—if even with much crying and tears he attained to some kind of assurance of this mystery of godliness, it was surely a blessed compensation to his sorrow, and a wonderful exhibition of divine grace, thus to connect the evil with the good, and make the deep agitations and earnest strivings occasioned by sin point the way so distinctly to the coming light and peace of the world. No common subject and vessel of grace must he have been, whose history in its darker aspects could have been made instinct with such life and hope to the church of God.

The sense of penitentiary, Abolam's recol.—The important spiritual ends to which David's great backsliding was overruled by God, did not prevent its being the occasion of heavy and in some sense irreparable evils in David's condition. And it is from this sad event that another, and in some respects the most trying and afflictive stage of his history, is to be dated. The prophet Nathan gave clear intimation to him, at the outset, that while God pardoned his sin—to the extent, that is, of not subjecting him to the legal penalty of death which was due to him should be in the coming events of providence palpable visitations of the divine displeasure on account of it, and that his iniquity should come back upon him in troubles and calamities that should overwhelm him with confusion. It was the glory of David in his better conditions to be a type of the kingdom over which he was placed; the men of his own generation and of future times were to see imaged in him the inseparable connection that existed in God's ordinance between the humble, spiritual, God-bearing disposition which it required, and the rich inheritance of blessing and honour which it promised. And when now, after having been so remarkably owned by God, and peculiarly identified with his cause, he turned from his duty of service by flagrantly violating some of the plainest commandments of Heaven, not only he, but all future successors of the throne, must see in God's subsequent dealings toward him, how infallibly a departure from righteousness involved a curtailment of blessing, and how in proportion as sin might be committed the chastisements which such sinfulness certainly be applied. Because he had given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, both the child born of Bathsheba must die, and other calamities, worse even than family bereavement, must be looked for.

It is not necessary to trace very particularly the successive stages in this latter and somewhat melancholy part of David's career: more especially as most of them will be found noticed in connection with the names of individuals who shared at different points in the transactions. But there came first, with mournful resemblance to the father's sin, the unnatural love of Amnon to his sister Tamar, ending in the violation of her chastity; then the murder of Amnon by Absalom, followed by Absalom's flight to Geshur. By and by came, after his recall from exile, the revolt of Absalom himself, who carried his disrespect to his father, and his own personal ambition, to its utmost height, by conspiring at once against David's life and for the possession of the throne. So skillfully had the plot been laid, and so grossly shaken were the foundations of David's authority at the time, that he was obliged to seek refuge in flight: having the sadness of his condition embittered by the twofold sting, that it was his own son who sought his life, and his own sin that was finding its retribution in the unnatural crime. It was undoubtedly this latter thought that made him at first so distasteful of his resources, and throughout the conflict that ensued rendered him subject to a weakness and vacillation, of which we find comparatively few traces in the earlier and brighter parts of his history. The remembrance of his grievous backsliding, as the real cause of the troubles that had come upon him, was as a bond between his soul and the comething of God; so that, with all his efforts to regain confidence and assured hope, fears and misgivings constantly returned upon him, and he was doubtful how long the cloud might be allowed to continue, or how far the rook might proceed. He did, however, by degrees attain to some measure of repose, by throwing himself back on the covenant faithfulness of God, and reflecting that however he might have stumbled in his course, still with him was the truth and righteousness of God, while those that were against him plainly made vanity and his refuge a show. Nor was his confidence misplaced. The Lord again interposed in his behalf, and gave to his armies success in the day of battle; although to him the joy of victory was more thancounterbalanced by the anguish he experienced from the death of Absalom. (2 Sam. xix. 30. xx. 6.) He afterwards recovered himself; and when the rebellion was entirely crushed, he wrote that stirring and sublime song which is given in 2 Sam. xx. 11., and which with certain alterations forms Psalm xviii., celebrating the Lord’s goodness in delivering him from all his enemies. The first part refers more especially to the troubles of his early life, and the second to those of the latter.

The procedure of David, partly during the period of this great rebellion, and partly after its termination, toward the family of Saul, has often been made the subject of severe remark. It is admitted that the king had shown great kindness to Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan; but he is charged with ultimately treating him in an unkind manner, following Ziba in retaining half the inheritance that belonged to Mephibosheth, after having improperly obtained possession of it by carrying a slanders report of his master, 2 Sam. xix. 20, 21. In this charge it is assumed that Mephibosheth’s account of the matter was altogether correct, and that the king had no ground whatever of complaint against him. But we are by no means sure of that; and indeed the natural impression of the narrative evidently points in another direction. The whole speech of Mephibosheth,” says Eisenholy, “betrays a bad conscience, and his guilt, which could not bear a close investigation, is but too manifest.” (p. 290). Had Ziba acted the utterly false and selfish part that is here represented, it is extremely improbable that David would have allowed him to be so great a gainor by his treachery; the probability rather is, that neither the servant nor the master had acted precisely as they should have done, and that such a division as that proposed by David was the readiest and most expeditious way of bringing the matter to a conclusion. It was a display of clemency to deal with it as David actually did. Another, and still heavier charge has been brought against David, in regard to the slaughter of seven sons of Saul to appease the anger of the Gibeonites on account of the nearly total extermination of them by Saul and his bloody house, in flagrant violation of the oath made with their masters. The bearing of this transaction on the relation of the Gibeonites to Israel and the moral government of Jehovah, will be considered in its proper place. (See GIBEONITE.) But in respect to David, “it has been suspected (so the accusers ran) that the whole was contrived by the revenge of the priesthood for the barbarous massacre perpetrated by Saul on the priestly city of Nob; and that David the more readily acquiesced, since it was decriable for the peace of his successors that the house of Saul should be exterminated. Both suspicions are too probable to be easily set aside.” (W. Oman.) We should rather say quite easily, were there nothing of an unbecoming and envious spirit bent on blackening the characters of those who have played a distinguished part in sacred history, and who facts fail for the purpose, drawing on imagination. There is not the shadow of evidence that David had a sinister end in view in the part he took in the transaction. He merely interposed to remove the family of Jonathan from any share in the inheritance; and afterward, to show that Nor was his confidence misplaced. The Lord again interposed in his behalf, and gave to his armies success in the day of battle; although to him the joy of victory was more than counterbalanced by the anguish he experienced from the death of Absalom. (2 Sam. xix. 30. xx. 6.) There is not the shadow of evidence that David had a sinister end in view in the part he took in the transaction. He merely interposed to remove the family of Jonathan from any share in the inheritance; and afterward, to show that stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel." The purpose, in its sinful character and tendency, was really of Satan, since God tempted no man to evil; but Satan could only act a subordinate and instrumental part; and that the evil took this precise form rather than any other, was not of Satan, but of God; the ends of the divine government required that it should take this particular direction. So that the action might indifferently be ascribed to Satan or to God, according to the point of view from which it was contemplated. But that the object aimed at in the numbering of the people had anything to do, as some have imagined, with the establishment of a military despotism, or with a scheme of foreign conquest, is an entirely groundless hypothesis, and in palpable contrariety with what is said of the people's participation in the guilt, as well as with the advanced age of the king. There was, no doubt, a large military force in David's reign—which, however, seems rather to have been a sort of militia, than a standing army; for it is said they served by monthly courses, 24,000 each month, 1 ch. xxiv. And with such an extent of conquered territory, and so many tributary nations to keep in check, a smaller force could scarcely have sufficed for the peace and safety of the kingdom.

To return to the act of numbering; it is somewhat singular that Joab should have possessed a spirit of discernment superior to his master's, and should have sought to divert David from his purpose. The captains of the army generally are represented as having been against it, 2 sa. xxx. 4, which renders it probable that the opposition proceeded from politic, rather than religious, considerations. They possibly thought that so formal a mustering of the forces of the kingdom would give rise to the idea, that a military conscription was going to be called for in some new form; or it might seem fitted in their view to awaken a spirit of jealousy toward the officers of the host who were charged with the investigation. But whatever might be the grounds on which they endeavored to withstand the proposal, the resistance was in vain. David would take no refusal; but no sooner was the work done, than he saw reason to repent of his folly. For, presently after the enumeration of the people was rendered by Joab, the king's heart smote him with convictions of guilt, and the prophet Gad brought him the choice of three fearful calamities—seven years' famine, three months' pursuit before his enemies, or three days' pestilence in the land. Whichever of these forms it might assume, the judgment, it is easy to see, was fitted adapted to the sin it was intended to chastise; for none of them could happen without laying in the dust the feeling of fancied security, and producing a salutary conviction of feebleness and danger. Pestilence was the calamity actually sent, as David had intreated to be left in the Lord's hands, rather than allowed to fall into those of man. And when no fewer than 70,000 had perished under the judgment, and the plague was beginning to break forth also in Jerusalem, David besought the Lord to accept of his life as an offering, that others less guilty might be spared: "Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done? Let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house." This cry of humble, self-sacrificing love, was heard in the sanctuary above. At the threshold floor of Araunah the Jebusite, the destroying angel was arrested in his course; and for a memorial of the transaction, David erected an altar, and offered burnt-sacrifices to the Lord, which were consumed by fire from heaven, 1 ch. xxi. 26. He even bought the ground for the site of the future temple, and said, "This is the house of the Lord, and this is the altar of the burnt-offering for Israel," 1 ch. xxii. 1. For the Lord had there not only pardoned the sin of David and his people, but had given the more peculiar token of his presence to accept the person and worship of his people. David therefore recognized this as the sign of a divine selection of the place for the future sanctuary; and in anticipation of the erection of the temple on the spot, he composed Ps. xxx., which at once commemorates his own sin, and the Lord's dealings of judgment and mercy. He had vainly conceived that he had made his mountain to stand strong (so he explains the matter in this psalm); but in a moment he was brought down as to the depths of hell, and only by the goodness of God had his sorrow again turned into joy. All is of God—let Israel henceforth worship on the spot which bears such emphatic testimony to this great truth, and, by acting of it, in a particular manner, to commemorate the place of his people.

After this few events occurred in David's history of a public nature. The subject that seems chiefly to have engrossed his attention was the prospective erection of the temple—for which, though restrained from building it, he made large and costly preparations. The quantity of gold and silver, of precious and useful materials of all sorts, which he had amassed for the purpose, was quite enormous; but it is not possible to give with any accuracy its value in modern computation. The spirit, too, in which he gave all, as only a faithful return to the Lord of a portion of what had been received from him, was truly admirable; and so also was the warm and earnest manner in which he pressed the more wealthy of the people to imitate his example, 1 ch. xxii. Never was a finer exemplification given of the means and influence of high place consecrated to the service of God; nor, when given, has it ever met with a more general and hearty response. David's soul was refreshed with what he witnessed, and breathed out a fervent prayer that the Lord would keep it for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of his people; that they, as well as Solomon his son, might keep God's statutes, and build the house for which so large provision had been made. On the same occasion Solomon was anointed king, to remove all doubt as to the succession, and to succeed to all further attempts like that shortly before made by Adonijah to disturb the peace of the kingdom. (See ADONIJAH.) To Solomon also David delivered the pattern, which he had drawn of the future house, and of its furniture, which the Lord, he said, made him to understand in writing by his hand upon him, ch. xxvii. 19; so that the primary and fundamental part in the whole matter was performed by David; Solomon's part was merely to carry into execution the counsel and plan of his father.

The faith and holiness of David were probably never more true and steadfast in their exercise than in this closing period of his history. His bodily frame had sunk into what might almost be called premature languor and inaction (for he was little more than seventy when he died), so that his attendants deemed it proper to resort to the peculiar and somewhat questionable device of providing a young woman (Abishag) to couch beside him, for the purpose of infusing a portion of her own warmth into his system. The tried, energetic, and laborious life he had led might naturally bring on this extreme bodily languor. But the powers of his mind seemed still to retain much of their vigour, and when roused into action, as they were at intervals in making his final disposition and arrangements, they shone forth with their wonted lustre, and were directed to the noblest ends. His great object evidently was, when drawing near the termination of his course, to leave upon the mind of Solomon and those about him a deep impression of the truth of God, and of the infinite variety and richness of its eternal principles of rectitude carried out in the administration of the kingdom. His addresses to Solomon alone upon this point, and in what are called his last words—that is, his last regular composition—he gave clear and solemn expression to it, made it emphatically his dying testimony. When exactly rendered, they run thus: "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was on my tongue. The God of Israel said, The Rock of Israel spake to me, the ruler over man, righteous ruler, the fear of God! as of old the word were identified with the others. And as the light of the sun shineth, a morning without clouds—from the bright shinning, from the rain there is grace out of the earth. For is not my house thus with God? for an everlasting covenant has he made with me, well ordered in all things and sincere. For it [or he] is all my salvation and all my delight; for does he not make it grow? And wickedness is like them—they shall all be driven away; for no one will take them into his hand; and if any one touch them, he is filled with iron, and the staff of a serpent; and they shall be utterly consumed with fire where they dwell."

The sentences want the flow of earlier times; the several utterances follow each other somewhat abruptly; but all the more, perhaps, they give vivid expression to the thought which held possession of David's soul, and which he would transmit to his late posterity—that the rule in God's kingdom must be wholly set for the interests of righteousness; and that for the very purpose of securing this was God's covenant established with his house for ever. In its full sense the word could only find its realization in His Son, who was to be at once the disposer of David and the Son of the Highest. But for that very reason as the kingdom in its provisional state was to foreshadow and prepare for the higher one in prospect, the lofty ideal of righteous government thus indicated with his dying breath by the psalmist, should have been constantly kept in view by every one of his successors on the throne, and as far as possible realized. In the spirit of prophecy David foresaw the ideal should one day become the actual—God's faithfulness to his covenant would secure it; and all true members of the covenant were called by his latest breath to strive towards its accomplishment.

Among David's last words and charges certain things occur, which have been thought by some to be at variance with those higher sentiments and aims. In particular, exception has been taken to the charge given to Solomon to bring Shimei to account for the shameful part he had acted in the day of David's calamity, and to mete to Joab the retribution that was due for the innocent blood he had shed, in treacheryously slaying Abner and Amasa. To ascribe this, however, to a vindictive spirit, and regard it as indicative of a want of honourable feeling, would be to place it in opposition to the whole tenor of David's life, which was distinguished for nothing more than its forgiving, generous, and disinterested spirit. And it is against all probability to suppose that the immediate prospect of death, which is wont to soften even wild and vengeful dispositions, should have stimulated David's habitual mildness into ferocity. The explanation is to be sought in a quite different view of the matter. "Beyond all reasonable doubt, it was regard to high public duty that moved David to hand over Joash to capital punishment, and commit Shimei to the vigilance of his successor. The conscience of the monarch was twined. As the highest magistrate of the kingdom, he felt that he had not vindicated the authority of God's laws in the case of Joash. Joash was an unqualified murderer. Shimei had been in him the spirit of a rebel and a traitor. If David had been under the influence of a personal feeling, he would have despatched both of them long before. His personal feeling was all the other way. The thought of their punishment was horrible to him; he could not bear to speak of it; but the sense of public duty was too strong to overcome always."

David's death is recorded in the thirty-first and thirty-second chapters of First Chronicles. It is there said, "David was an indifferent murderer, Shimei had in him the spirit of a rebel and a traitor. If David had been under the influence of a personal feeling, he would have despatched both of them long before. His personal feeling was all the other way. The thought of their punishment was horrible to him; he could not bear to speak of it; but the sense of public duty was too strong to overcome always." David died in a good old age full of days, riches, and honour; in many respects the most remarkable man who appeared in ancient times as a ruler over men, eclipsed only by that more than mortal King, who wields the destinies of God's everlasting kingdom. Not truly did he serve his generation according to the will of God; nor, all generations that have since arisen have had reason to call him blessed. And while a justly remarked by another (Eichhorn, worldy monarchs so commonly aim at the oppression of their people, or have the nature of their dominion marked only by external displays of power, and a glory that quickly vanishes out of sight, it was the distinguished honour of David, along with his ennobling properties, and by means of them, to give a permanent elevation to the entire state and prospects of his people, to set them free, to advance them far beyond their natural way, and plant among them the seeds of future life and fruitfulness. By what he was, and what he did, he became the root of all the higher developments and expectations that afterwards disclosed themselves in the kingdom of God.

The works of Eichhorn, Geschicht der Volksethik, vol. ii., of Eichhorn, Das Volk Israel, vol. i., in three portions of them which relate to the life of David, may be consulted with profit; although in what respects the historical correctness of some parts of the text, and some of the more peculiar points in the history, they are far from being safe guides. The treatise of Delitzsch, and Blum, on the life of David, are still deserving of being consulted; and a sensible, judicious, well-timed volume on the subject, by the Rev. W. G. Blaikie, David, King of Israel, 1856, will be found useful. Many of the leading features of David's character and history are also admirably touched on in Hengstenberg's and Delitzsch's Works on the Psalms. And for some of the differences in respect to numbers (for example, the three years of Saul's reign in 1 Chris. xxiii. 12, and now in 2 Sam. xxiv. 12, and other minute points in the account of Chronicles, as compared with that of the books of Samuel, see at Chronicles where he had lived, or at JERUSALEM. DAVID, CITY OF. See JERUSALEM.

DAY, one of the commonest divisions of time, and the earliest on record, being that so frequently introduced into the history of the creation, etc. As there used, it mark an entire revolution of time, as of natural day and night; not day as distinguished from night, but day and night together: "The evening and the morning were the first day." And it is remarkable that the evening takes precedence of the morning, as if the reckoning had been made from sunset to sunset, not from sunrise to sunrise. Such, in process of time, undoubtedly, came to be the Jewish mode of reckoning. "From even unto even shall ye celebrate your sabbath," was the order prescribed in the law, Ex. xxviii. 32; and so in regard to the paschal feast, which was appointed to commence on the fifteenth day of the month, or immediately after sunset on the fourteenth, Ex. xxix. 11. The same rule obtained in regard to other days. Nor was it by any means confined to the Jews; the Phoenicians, Nubians, and other nations of the East, are said to have followed the same custom, if it was not indeed the custom generally followed in remote antiquity. The ancient Germans, says Tacitus, "compute not the number of days, but of nights; the night appears to draw on the day," ch. ii. And Cæsar says, in like manner, of the Gauls, "They measure time, not by the number of days, but of nights; and accordingly, observe their birthdays, and the beginnings of months and years, so as to make the day follow the night." (Hist. Gal. vi. 19.) Of this a material still existing in the "seven-night," or "fortnight," to express the period of seven and fourteen days respectively.

In the earlier periods of Old Testament history no further divisions of the natural day appear than those of morning, noon-day, and evening, Gen. i. 5, xiii. 16. The night, in like manner, appears under a threefold division of first, middle, and morning watches, Ex. ii. 19, vii. 19; Ex. xiv. 21. The mention of hours first occurs in the time of the Babylonish captivity, Isa. iii. 6; v. 5. It would appear that the Babylonians were among the first to adopt the division of twelve equal parts for the day, as Herodotus testifies that the Greeks derived this custom from the Babylonians (ii. 100). The Hebrews also adopted it; and in New Testament scripture we often read of the third, the sixth, the ninth hours of the day, which were the marked divisions of the twelve. The night was divided into the same number of parts. But from the variations in sunrise and sunset, this division, which had these natural phenomena for its two terminations, could never attain to exactness, and was therefore limited to nations that had reached a high degree of civilization. Such nations accordingly fell upon the plan of adopting midnight as the fixed point, from which the whole diurnal revolution might be reckoned, divided into twelve, or twenty-four hours. And this division is now followed by all European nations, and in a great part of the civilized world. In many countries of the East, however, the old mode of reckoning from sunrise to sunset still continues.

With the exception of one passage, John xix. 39, which expressly mentions the twelve hours of the day, we never meet with New Testament scripture with the mention of any particular hours, excepting the third, the sixth, and the ninth, which correspond respectively to our ninth, twelfth, and third. The ninth and third were regular hours of worship at the temple, Acts i. 13; iii. 1, the times for the morning and the evening sacrifice. Other terms of a less definite kind are occasionally used as notes of time—such as cock-crowing, late, early, midnight; but these have much the same import in all languages, and need no particular explanation.

The Sabbath was the only day among the Hebrews which had a distinct name, the rest being designated simply as first, second, and so on. In later times the sixth-day, from its immediate relation to the Sabbath, was sometimes denominated the precesid, or preparation. (See under Preparation.)

Day is often used by the sacred writers in a general sense, for a definite period of time—an era or season, when something remarkable has taken place, or is destined to do so, Gen. ii. 4; Is. xv. 5; Joel ii. 28. And it accorded with Hebrew usage to designate by the term day or night what probably formed only a part of these thus by three days and three nights might be understood only a portion of three, Matt. xxv. 36; xxvii. 51, comp. Ex. xiv. 25. As it is also by day that the mere active portion of man's life is spent, so day is used to express the whole term of life considered as a season of active labour, John xiv. 4.

DEACON, DEACONESS, the English form of the Greek diaconos, which is used sometimes more generally of any one performing ministerial service, of whatever sort, and sometimes more specially of one filling the office of the deaconate in a Christian church. In the more general sense the term is applied to persons engaged in discharging the higher, as well as the lower kinds of service—to the apostles, and even to our Lord himself. In Acts xvii. 19 Christ is called "a minister (literally a deacon) of the circumcision." And once and again the apostle Paul designates himself and his fellow-labourers in the gospel the Lord's deacons, Eph. iii. 7; Col. iii. 14; Col. i. 2. But from an early period the word was appropriated as the distinctive appellation of a class of officers in the church—a class that has come into existence nearly from the commencement in all the more considerable churches, and probably also in many of inferior dimensions. When Paul wrote to the church at Philippi, he addressed his epistle "to the bishops and deacons," as the recognized and official representatives of the body. In his epistle to the Romans he incidentally mentions the name of a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, Rom. xvi. 1, implying that there were in that part of Greece even females who exercised a diaconate: and if these, certainly also males. And in writing Timothy as to the manner in which he should execute the special commission given him in respect to the churches at Ephesus, he not only points to the existence of deacons, but describes at some length the qualifications and behaviour by which they ought to be distinguished, 1 Tim. iii. 8, seq.

The earliest notice that exists in regard to the appointment of deacons is that of which an account is given in Acts vi. The circumstance that gave rise to their appointment determines also the nature of their office. While the church at Jerusalem was in the freshness of its youthful age, and abounding in charitable ministrations, certain of the Greeks, or converted Hellenists, complained that their widows were comparatively overlooked. It was a natural consequence of the rapid growth of the society, and of the apostles, who were its official heads, having more to do than they could properly undertake. On the presentation of this complaint, therefore, they began to see the necessity of a subdivision of office, with a corresponding distribution of work. The higher function belonged specially to them of ministering the Word of God, and founding by spiritual labours the church of Christ in the earth. To this they must devote themselves: and they could not leave it, as they said, "to serve (diasconic) tables." They therefore exhorted the people to look out for their own number seven men who might be set over this business—"of honest report, and full of the Holy Ghost." The advice was followed, and seven accordingly were chosen, whom the apostles ordained to the office of ministering or diaconizing in what lay below the province of those who had to attend to the ministry of the word and prayer. Their special business obviously was to look after the distribution of the alms of the church, and to see that none, especially of such as were not natives of Jerusalem, were neglected.

It has been argued by some, in particular by Archbishop Whaley (A.D. 1657), and Bishop Hinde (history of the first century), that as these seven were appointed for the purpose of superintending the ministration to Grecian widows, there must have been an earlier designation of persons to the diaconate, who had a general charge of the distributions, especially as the apostles treated it as a thing which did not properly belong to them; and that these new chosen were only added to the existing number, to prevent any further complaints of partiality. But this view is not acquiesced in by those who have most carefully investigated the apostolic age; nor does it seem borne out by the recorded circumstances. The church at Jerusalem only gradually acquired a complete and regular organization. For a time the constant presence of the apostles, and the all-pervading humanly feeling among the members of the community, would appear to render unnecessary official service of a subordinate kind. As they had their roots to a large extent in common, so the distribution would take place in a great degree also in common, the apostles allowing it to proceed, rather than actively interfering with it. But when the want of a more complete organization was found to have led to an irregular and partial action, the counsel of wisdom manifestly was to have a class of officers to look specially after the matter; and it was the foreign converts who in such a case were most apt to be overlooked, so the persons actually appointed were probably, for the most part, of that class. There is no reason, however, for supposing that they all were. Phillip, in particular, seems to have been a native of Cilicia, and so, it is possible, were some of the others, though their names were Grecian. But as it was chiefly those from a distance who, as we have said, were likely to be neglected, so prudence would readily dictate the selection of deacons in much greater proportion from the foreign than from the native membership.

The title of deacons is not actually applied to the persons thus appointed; although in being appointed, as it is said, "functiones superavit, to serve or minister at tables," they are virtually so called. All ancient ecclesiastical writers regard the occasion of their appointment as that of the institution of the order of deacons. Not, however, of that as it came by and by to exist, constituting a lower order of clergy. Chrysostom and others expressly distinguish in this respect between the original diaconate and the ecclesiastical diaconate of subsequent times; and so do all the more recent and unbiased church historians (Neander, Giesler, Rother) besides commentators, Bammert, Alford, Hackett, Alexander. The institution, as recorded in the Acts, appears to have contemplated nothing further than the remedying of a present disorder, and by a fixed arrangement providing against a recurrence of the evil. It had consequently to be simply with the proper management of the alms of the church and the oversight of the poor. And so, in the office set up in the other churches, and recognized by the apostle Paul, not a word is dropped of any higher work, having been assigned those deacons than what belonged to the primitive seven; it is with the present, or material interests of the congregation that they are associated, not with superintending and ruling in spiritual matters. At the same time, one can easily understand how closely, at certain points, the one department of duty would press upon the other, and how readily the respective limits of each might, to some extent, be crossed. Having charge of the alms and offerings of the church, the deacons would naturally come to take the management of the agape or love-feasts, also of what was required for the administration of the Lord's supper; and it was but a step farther, which in many cases could not fail to be soon taken, to distribute through their hands the elements of the supper to the members of the church, and, in connection therewith, to exercise some supervision over the members themselves. Hence, in the account given by Justin Martyr (A.D. 165) (I, 67) of the celebration of the eucharist, the deacons are represented as distributing to those present the bread and wine, and also conveying portions to the absent (ibid. sect. 65, 6). In the larger communities the work of the deaconship might thus by degrees encroach upon the province of the eldership, and include in its operations a certain amount of spiritual superintendence and pastoral agency; while, on the other hand, in the smaller communities, where there was no need for the same subdivision of labour, the presbyterate might themselves undertake what deacons were instituted to discharge.

Viewed in respect to the constitution of the church, the institution of the deaconship exhibits a development; yet one that was the result of circumstances, and afforded a pattern of what might lawfully and properly be adopted by Christian communities, rather than a direction, to which they must in all circumstances be conformed. The original occasion, and the fact of the institution of deacons, showed (as remarked by Bammert) that the apostolic office was not an adequate organization for the needs of the church. The weaknesses of human nature beginning, as they sooner, to discover themselves among the members of the community, called for the institution of a subordinate office, to work to the hand of those who filled the higher; and in yielding to this call the apostles gave the weight of their authority and example, not merely to the institution of this particular office, but also to a wise accommodation to circumstances in the direction and management of the affairs of the church. The high qualifications they set forth for those whom they deemed eligible to the office of deacon, disclosed to all future times the place due to the more spiritual elements of character in constituting a title to official appointments within the church; and the mode of appointment, recognizing alike the privilege of the ordinary numbers to choose, and their own authority to sanction the choice and ordain to the office, afforded at the outset a happy exemplification of the manner in which the rights of all should be respected. In process of time, and no doubt arising from an impulse felt necessary to remedy a present disorder, and by a fixed arrange-

in all probability, of taking the regular charge of the community, after the apostles began to be much required elsewhere, Acts xii. And of the seven who were first chosen to fill the office of deacon, two at least (Stephen and Philip) perished so largely of the egregious outpouring of grace then conferred on the church, that they entered with great success on the work of evangelists. This, however, must be carefully distinguished from what properly belongs to them as deacons, as distinct from the special endowments and impulses of the Spirit.

The mention of Phoebe as a deaconess in the church at Cenchreae, Acts xvi., implies, as already noticed, the existence of a female deaconship in apostolic times. It would be rash to infer, however, from such a casual mention, that appointments of this sort were general in the church; and from no recognition of the office being found in the pastoral epistles, and no historical record anywhere of its origin, we may justly conclude that nothing essential depended on it, and that it was to be regarded only as of occasional or temporary moment. (Some have thought that the prescripions regarding widows in 1 Tim. v. 9, have reference to deaconesses; but this is not by any means certain.) In the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, where women lived very much apart, and could rarely be had access to except by members of their own sex, deaconesses might be for a time almost essential to the well-being and progress of the church. But in Rome, and the West, greater liberty was enjoyed by the female portion of society in their intercourse with the world, and the service of deaconesses would be less urgently required. That they did very commonly exist in the larger churches, during the earlier centuries, the records of ecclesiastical history leave no room to doubt, though no general rule seems to have been adopted regarding them; and in process of time the institution of nunneries turned into a distinct and artificial channel nearly all that was available of separate female service.

DEAD SEA.

DEATH may be defined the termination of life; an event of different and unequal import, according to the nature and value of the life which it terminates and destroys. To this issue, life of every kind below the sun—vegetable, animal, human— is alike subject. In so far as it is connected with organization, this to our habits of thought appears, not indeed a necessary, but yet a natural consequence of the conditions of its existence. The material structures which are the seat and instruments of life, of volatile elements, and of fragile structure, seem not made to wear and last for aye; and in fact are constituted under a twofold law—the one determining their growth and development to an appointed maximum or maturity of life; the other, when this has been reached, inducing a process of decay, which, in the time appointed, issues in exhaustion of the vital functions, and decomposition and disappearance of the vital form.

Beyond question, it had been possible for God, if such had been his pleasure, to have made all creatures under a law of life. Scripture assures us, that man at least was at first placed conditionally under this law. There is, however, decisive evidence that, from the beginning, all other terrestrial life was constituted under the law of death. Besides the indications already referred to, of a limited and transient existence to plants and animals generally, the reproductive and assimilating organs and powers common to all living creatures, and the destructive organs, instincts, and habits of birds and beasts of prey, unmistakably contemplate, as they provide for, a system or constitution of things in which death should reign. It was long and generally held, indeed, that this law in the natural economy was suspended upon the introduction of sin. But this idea, which Scripture does nowhere assert or sanction, is hard to be reconciled with the conclusion which physiology and anatomy have deduced from the deadly and digestive organs and powers of the animal frame, with the same certainty that any final cause is inferred from any of the works of God. And it must be regarded as conclusively refuted by the discoveries of geology, which demonstrate the prevalence of death in ages long anterior to the creation of man or, so far as is known, the existence of sin. The earth's states are now found to be full of the appropriate and emblematical remains of extinct life. Entire creations appear to have been destroyed in so many successive great catastrophes; and it is made evident by the state in which many of these fossils are found, that then, as now, life was sustained by death. Nor can it well be doubted that this state of things obtained even in the days of man's primordial innocence. If we try, we shall find ourselves baffled in the attempt to conceive how, even then, death could be strange or unknown. Most now, the revolving year has been marked by the opening and the fall of the earth's foliage—the ripening, and consumption, and decay of the earth's fruits! Could our first parents drink of the rivers of paradise, or tread its verdant surface, or keep and dress its trees and plants, without—in every drought, at every step, by every stroke—quenching or cutting down myriads of animalcular or insect, as well as vegetable life! Although the flesh of animals was not yet given to man for food, it is supposable that the laws of animal life itself were all the while in abeyance—its instincts restrained, its powers unused, its appropriate pleasure withheld or denied! We know that, from the day of man's creation, he had given to him the idea of death. It was set before him as the just desert and consequence of disobedience. And whence should he have derived his conception of the import of the threatened evil, so readily as from death's visible dominion over the bowls of the heaven and the beasts of the field? It may be thought that this fact, if it were so, must have shaded and suffused the light and bliss of paradise. Yet with distinct knowledge and just confidence in the divine wisdom and goodness, why might it not as well consist with the happiness of unfallen man, as shall the greater death which sin has introduced, and will perpetuate in the moral universe, with the perfect blessedness of God's unfallen and redeemed family in the paradise above?

As incident to creatures of mere instinct or animal nature, there can be nothing judicial or of the nature of punishment in their condemnation to death. Whether it may have been ordained by anticipation, or in keeping with the moral and legal relation of man, as to exist in a state of sin, and under a dispensation of judgment, we are not warranted to pronounce. It is, however, beyond question that, from this cause, and for man's sake, a curse has been brought upon the ground, and the whole creation groaneth and travails in pain together until now. Still man himself is by this means the greatest sufferer; and so far as it affects the other creatures, it can be only a physical evil, equally without moral cause or penal effect, of which by their nature they are distinct and private. How this appointment is to be reconciled with the benevolence of the Creator is a hard question, which no light yet given to man enables him fully to resolve. So far, however, it may relieve the mystery, that, as a general rule, the enjoyments of the inferior creatures greatly exceed their sufferings—that death is but little, if at all, the object of their fear, or much even a cause of pain to them. Dr. Livingstone's experience, when seized by a lion, strikingly confirms this. "The shock," he says, "produced a stupor similar to that which seems to be felt by a mouse after the first stroke of the cat. It caused a sort of dreaminess in which there was no sense of pain nor feeling of terror, though quite conscious of all that was happening. It was what patients partially under the influence of chloroform describe, who see all the operation, but feel not the knife. This peculiar state is probably produced in all animals killed by the carnivore, and if so, is a merciful provision by our benevolent Creator for lessening the pain of death." (Transact.)

That the same animal enjoyment prolonged in death is hourly enjoyed by the higher creatures, and success, which both perpetuates life and preserves it in the vigour of its powers and the freshness of its joys, is certain; and also, as bearing upon the physical and moral condition of man, to whose behalf, as chief in this lower world, all arrangements and dispositions affecting the lower forms of life were subordinated that their subjection to death had been enlarged immensely the extent of his physical resources, and multiplied manifold the means of his moral development and discipline.

But man himself is involved in the common doom. It is appointed unto all men once to die. This appointment is felt by us of nearer concern, and is shrouded in deeper mystery. Whatever theory be held with regard to the constitution of our nature, all are agreed as to its high pre-eminence above all other forms of terrestrial life. "God made man in his own image, after his own likeness, and set him over the works of his hands." It surely is not the imagination of a vain conceit, but rather the suggestion of a due reverence of divine wisdom, which would anticipate exemption from death as the leading characteristic privilege of a creation which he has crowned with glory and honour. He guards and defends man's life by the severest sanctions of his law against the hand of violence; and can it be thought that, but for some special cause, his own hand would ever have been stretched out against it to destroy it? The reigning fact, man's death, seems to confute these reasonings, and almost irresistibly forces upon us the conclusion, that death is a physical necessity, or a universal law, extending to all material organizations, however otherwise psychologically distinguished or divinely allied. And this opinion has generally obtained among men of pantheistic and materialistic views in philosophy, and of Pelagian and Socinian views in theology. But surely it is impossible, consistently with God's omnipotence, to allege the necessity or the power of this law, as existing in despite of his pleasure and purpose, to constitute our nature under a law of life. It is more than probable that the other orders of creatures who dwell in life immortal in the heavenly places are not always and without their consent, but in the form of organized existence. We are assured that the bodies of the risen saints shall be clothed with incorruption and immortality. We know that, even as now constituted, the life of these frail bodies in antediluvian ages was prolonged to the verge of a millennium. And why should it be thought impossible for God, if so it had pleased him, to endue them with the powers, or provide for them the means, of repairing the wear and waste of life, so as to preserve their powers and susceptibilities in unabated vigour and freshness, "even to the length of days for ever and ever"?

This, Scripture informs us, was in the beginning providentially ordained. The threatening of death against the breach of the covenant, is rightly understood to imply the promise of deathless and incorruptible life, so long as the covenant should stand. And the tree of life in the midst of the garden, if not by its physical virtue the means of life's perpetual and perfect renovation, was certainly the sacramental pledge of God's purpose to preserve it inviolate while man was steadfast in the covenant. And now that death reigns over all, the appointment is referred neither to physical necessity nor to arbitrary will, nor, as some have urged, to its subordination to a partially beneficent economy in nature, by which the aggregate of sentient happiness in creation is increased; but to a judicial decree announced from the beginning by God, as judge, against man as a transgressor of his law.

Thus runs the tenor of the covenant or constitution under which life—man's life—was originally given and held, "Thou shalt not eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." And in terms equally explicit, to the transgression of the law is the entrance and reign of death over man assailed. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." And it is observed that this declare the cause of death as it reigns over all men only. It affirms nothing respecting the cause of death as it reigns over other orders of creatures, in the present or in preceding stages of the world's existence. Whether, in any way, they may have been constituted under a law of death by anticipation, and as in keeping with a state of things in which death should reign over men, we do not venture to pronounce. That, indirectly and as a consequence of their relation to man as a sinner against God, their sufferings have been increased, and their lives shortened, it is impossible to doubt or deny. But if, in this view, sin be the occasion of their death, it cannot be the cause of it. They are incapable of sin, and cannot die judicially for sin. The contrary opinion which long and generally prevailed, that the creature were immortal until man sinned, has as little to justify it in Scripture as in science. Death, it is there said, is the law of their being. And the true doctrine of the Scripture is, not that they die because man has sinned, but that man, because he has sinned, has forfeited his original and high distinction, and has become "like the beasts that perish." It is unnecessary here to multiply Scripture proofs of this awful and humbling truth. Every one is familiar with the frequent and equivalent testimonies, that death is "the fruit," "the wages," the "end," and consummation of sin. And the circumstances which attend and induce it impressively connect it with sin as its cause. How, if not through guilty forfeiture, should the life of man have been abbreviated by its term, so much more than that of many of the inferior creatures, and in so many instances still further shortened by disease and by calamity! To how great extent is it consumed by the fire of evil passion—suffocated by the stroke of vengeful violence—taken away by the arm of judicial authority!—in all these cases sin visibly working death. And while embittered and baulked by manifold pain and sorrow, how irresistibly does conscience within disquiet and alarm us, by the conviction of guilt and the apprehension of imminence of judgment.

But now, what is death?—or what does it import as an appointed doom? To answer this question rightly we require to ascertain the true constitution of our nature. Obviously death must be very different in the view of the materialist, who regards man as only a higher species of animal, whose mental and moral distinctions are the mere result of a higher physical organization; and in the judgment of those who consider man as the possessor of a soul distinct from the body, the subject and seat of a higher nature. If the body be the whole of man, death is the end of his conscious existence. If he consist of body and spirit, this event may prove but his birthday into another and more important state of being. Now, this point, which till the present hour has proved too hard for man himself to demonstrate, Scripture decides conclusively for all who will receive its testimony. Man is both body and spirit; the first placing him in communication with this outward world, the second alloying him to God and his spiritual creation. The record of his primeval state exhibits the reality and effect of this complex being. While his earthly paradise yielded its riches and pleasures to every sense and sensibility of his animal nature, his higher life found its appropriate and prominent occupation and delight in the service and communion of the "Father of his spirit."

These views, as they magnify the life which God gave us, must be felt to complicate the nature and effects of death. How then does it affect us? Does it reach the whole man, body and spirit? If so, how are they severally and together affected by it? And in what order, and by what process, does it consummate its work?

1. Death extends to the entire man and to every part of his nature. Against him self the threatening was directed, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt die." Beyond doubt the outward man perishes, and surely the inner man, the subject of that sin of which the body is but the instrument, cannot have escaped the force of the dread sentence. God's Word assures us that the soul that sinneth shall die. Nay, it speaks of men as already dead, who yet live in the body—dead therefore spiritually. On the other hand, it speaks of men now alive through grace, who shall never die, while yet the graves are ready for them. Men who walk after the course of the world, and live in pleasure, are pronounced "dead in sin"—dead while they live.

And while sootheth his brother has "passed from death unto life," he that hathth his brother "abideth in death." These scriptures, while they distinguish between bodily and spiritual death, represent both as included in the sentence, and threatened and executed against the sinner.

2. To what effect then does death exert its power upon the body and the spirit severally and together?

It is not unimportant to observe, that this is not extinction of existence, or annihilation either of the one or the other. For a time the body retains its form, and its substance, however changed, is never lost; much more may it be presumed shall the spirit survive. Not indeed that spirit more than body is immortal independently of God's will. But that seeing he preserves our inferior part, he will much more preserve the higher and more kindred product of his creative power. The effects of death upon the body itself are matter of common observation. Immediately it makes it powerless to sensation as the cold of the valley, quickly turning its comeliness into corruption and finally reduces its form and structure into shapeless dust. The effect of bodily death on the spirit of the man where nature is thus divided, it may be more difficult to estimate. This may depend in part on the value of the earthly portion he has lost, and partly on the future portion on which he has entered; but it cannot be indifferent either to the child of sorrow, or to the subject of grace, more than to the heir of this world, when it has stripped of his whole inheritance of good. While we look on the desolate and impious corpse, and say "It is all over with him now," the disembodied spirit must still find itself the subject of a maimed and imperfect nature. For the effect of death upon the spirit is necessarily different from the effect of it upon the body. Consciousness belongs to its nature, and must endure while it has being. Its proper life lies in the harmony and subjection of its powers and dispositions to the nature and will of God; its death in contrariety and enmity to Him. This involves the disruption of a holy delightful relation to the Father of spirits—and by inevitable consequence, a deprivation of those fruits of his love and favour on which life and blissfulness depend. "Your sins have separated between you and God." This is emphatically the bitterness of death. As it affects the body, it terminates all happy connection with the external world; as it affects the spirit, it excludes from all joy in God. Though now, while its effects are incomplete, it is neither altogether unfeared nor unfelt, yet the engrossments of earthly life meanwhile lessen our sense and apprehension of the magnitude of the evil. Not till the body is cut off from its earthly portion, and the spirit cast out from its portion in God, shall its awful import be fully known.

3. It may tend further to clear this subject, to notice briefly the order and process through which the work of death is consummated. Though incurred instantaneously on the act of transgression, its effects follow by successive stages, and at several and more or less distant intervals. As caused by sin, the spiritual man, as the proper subject and source of the evil, first feels its power. Its very touch intercepts all happy intercourse with a holy God. This was felt and seen on the day that Adam sinned. His fear and flight at the voice of the Lord God in the garden was the unmistakable symptom of a soul already dead in sin, which could not, dared not, live with God; while his expulsion in displeasure from the symbols of God's presence, marked no less clearly that God had ceased to live with him. Thus was executed to the letter the word which God had spoken, "In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die." But the work of death thus begun does not stop here. The disruption of the creature's relation to God, it may well be conceived, must introduce disorder into all the relations and interests of its being; nor unless with a view to some ulterior design of signal judgment or of more signal mercy, might its full development and consummation being long-delayed. But in suberviency to this end does man live on, in the body for a season, though, as to God, "he is dead while he liveth." Yet it is but for a little time. Whatever be the result of this day of forbearance, the work of death goes on—the body is dead because of sin. There is no discharge from this decree, and no exception to it. The body returns to the dust whence it was taken. This is another crisis which awaits every individual man in his own time. As distinguished from spiritual, it is called temporal death, as condemning exclusion from the things of earth and time, to the loss of all happy interest in God. There remains but one further stage ere it reach its complete and final issue, both in the individual and the race. When the design of the divine administration in our world are finished, the bodies of all who sleep in dust shall be re-organized. There shall be a resurrection of the just and of the unjust. While the just, by faith through grace, shall be raised to life incorruptible and glorious, the unjust, impotent and unbelieving, shall awake to the resurrection of damnation. The whole man shall go away from the glory and joy of God's presence into everlasting punishment. This is the second death.

This is the Work of God. With this sets forth the terror and duration of the death which entered and reigns over man through sin, we receive the glad tidings of life—eternal life, given back to sinners through grace. Christ, the Lord from heaven, having borne and exalted in his own body on the tree, the curse of the first covenant incurred by the sin of Adam, is constituted to his church and people the Redeemer from death and the Author of eternal life. It is an anxious question how may these tidings consist with the continued reign of death over the bodies of men, alike over man of Christian faith and character, as surely, as shortly, as painfully, as humbly, as over the unbeliever and the ungodly? Shall we hold that while it retains indissolubly the same repulsive and appalling aspect to all, its nature to the Christian is nevertheless changed from a foe to a friend, and as some speak, a favour—a benefit the fruit of God's fatherly love. This it will be equally hard to reconcile with Scripture testimony or human feeling. It is indeed said, that to the Christian "to die is gain," but granted this is not necessarily what it is, but of what it does. It is ever spoken of as the fruit and desert of sin, and as an enemy—"the last enemy." In Christians as in others, "the body is dead because of sin." But if so, where is the efficacy, or what the proof of the efficacy, of the Redeemer's death? If still his people die for sin, has not Christ died in vain? and is not the hope of his people vain? God forbid! Had it been the declared intent or the promised effect of the interposition of Christ, to arrest the sentence against sin, or to prevent its full execution upon the sinner, this universal mortality might have been alleged as a practical evidence of the entire failure of his design. But Scripture and experience concur to show us, that the purpose of Christ's interposition was not to prevent or arrest the work of death in progress, but to undo and reverse the completed ruin. It is to be observed, that notwithstanding the redemption by Christ, every child of Adam, in soul and body alike, inherits this sad entail. The heirs of the Christian salvation, like others, are born in spiritual death and abide in it, many of them often for a lesser or longer period of their time in the flesh. The redemption of the cross does not cut off nor remove from them the entail from the broken covenant, until in a day of grace they believe and live anew by his quickening Spirit. On the same principle we may presume it to reverse its dominion over the body as over the spirit. Thus first, under the power and in vindication of the first and broken covenant, sin reigns unto death over the whole man, and next "grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." This completed triumph however is reached, like death's conquests, by successive stages, and at several and distant epochs. First, in the day of regeneration, on the return of God's Spirit, when life begins anew, where death first began its work, in the soul. From thenceforward, though still bound to a body of death and sin, the man quickened and made alive from the death of sin. Again, in the day of dissolution, when the body returns to its dust, it is set free from the encumbrance of mortal flesh, and in the spirit reaches the blessed state of just men made perfect. And finally, in the day of the resurrection of all the dead, when Christ shall come the second time, to reap the matured trophies of his first advent, "death shall be swallowed up in victory." The bodies of his saints raised incorruptible, and re-united to their spirits, to live in the immortality of angels and life. DEBORAH [step], hence applied by Solomon as the distinctive name of the most holy place in the temple, (i K. ii. 15, 19, vi. x.). the name of a town in the tribe of Judah, a few miles to the west of Hebron. This was a later name, for before the conquest of Canaan it had been called Kirjath-sipher, which means book-city, Jos. xiv. 15, 16., and also Kirjath-sanna, Jos. xiv. 15, which, according to Becher, signifies city of law or instruction. These were probably but different forms of substantially one designation; and Deborah, in the sense of oracle or authoritative utterance, does not very materially differ in meaning. Some would make it still nearer, taking Deborah in the sense of things written, arranged in a row; but this seems unnatural (Deut. xxv. 15). The place is never mentioned in the history of subsequent times; but it must have been a town of considerable importance and strength at the time of the conquest; as its siege and capture by Joshua is particularly described, Josh. x. 6, 8, and having been taken by the Canaanites, Caleb promised his daughter Achsah to the person who should succeed in again subduing it. The prize was gained by Othniel, the nephew of Caleb, ch. xv. 14. We may suppose, from the name, that in former times it had been a seat of learning of some sort; and possibly this might form one reason for afterwards making it a priestly city, ch. xxiv. 15. Another town of the same name is mentioned in connection with the inheritance of God, Jos. xii. 28.

DEBORAH [step]. 1. Rebekah's nurse; of whom explicit mention is made only in connection with her death. She died after Jacob's return to the land of Canaan, and was buried under an oak near Bethel, Gen. xxxv. 8.

2. DEBORAH. By much the most distinguished person, who bore this name, was one of the public characters raised up during the period of the judges in seasons of trouble and emergency. The tribe she belonged to is not distinctly mentioned, though it is usually, and with the greatest appearance of probability, supposed to be Ephraim. She is called a prophetess, and is said to have enactments in the legislation of Moses may justly be regarded as a proof of its comparatively mild spirit, and still higher proof was to be found in the many wise provisions it contained for securing a well-conditioned people, and checking the evils that lead to the accumulation of debt. And no less is true of Deuteronomy and the Mosaic economy.

DECALOGUE (Δεκαλόγιον) the term commonly applied by the Greek fathers to designate the ten commandments, or ten words, as it always is in the original (Sept. ἴδιον Βοιαγατ), and now commonly employed in theological language for the same purpose. It does not actually occur in Scripture; but as it is the most fitting collective designation of the ten commandments, we shall present under it the explanations that seem needful to be given respecting the form and substance of this remarkable piece of divine legislation.

1. Due importance of the first demand made. The giving of it marks an era in the history of God's dispensations. Of the whole law this was both the first portion to be communicated, and the basis of all that followed. Various things attested this superiority. It was spoken directly by the Lord himself, not communicated, like other parts of the old economy, through the ministration of Moses—and spoken amid the most impressive signs of his glories, presence, and majesty. Not only were the ten commandments thus spoken by God, but the further mark of relative importance was put upon them of being written on tables of stone—written by the very finger of God. They were thus elevated to a place above all the statutes and ordinances that were made known through the mediator of the old covenant; and the place then given them they were also destined to hold in the future, for the rocky tablets on which they were engraven undoubtedly imaged an absolutely valid and important. It was an emblem of relative perpetuity. The very number of words, or utterances, in which they were comprised, led, I think, to the same thing; for in the significance that in ancient times was ascribed to certain numbers, ten was universally regarded as the symbol of completeness (Spence & Lee, vol. i. p. 515). And in accordance with all this, as also in further confirmation of it, the position in the tabernacle assigned to the tables which contained the decalogue, bespeak their singular importance: they were placed at the centre of the whole religion and polity of Israel—in the ark of the covenant, that stood between the cherubim in the most holy place, under the throne of God. They were emphatically "the tables of the covenant;" the law which was embodied in them was itself termed "the covenant," (Deut. iv. 13; ix. 20; xx. 21; xxiv. 15); and simply from being the depository of them the ark bore the name of the "ark of the covenant." In the revelation of law, therefore, the decalogue stands comparatively alone; it has a place and character peculiarly its own, and while it had a close and pervading relation to other parts of the Mosaic economy—had a close relation also to the prior covenant of promise, which it distinctly recognizes, and embodied in its very form (for all which see Law), there must have belonged to it a depth and fulness of meaning, such as no other piece of legislation possessed, and entitling it to the pre-eminent distinction it occupied. This on examination will be found to be the case; but there is a preliminary point that requires first to be briefly noticed.

2. There has been given to the decalogue a double record, first in Ex. xx. 2-17, again in De. v. 6-21; and there are certain differences between the two forms, which have been taken advantage of by rationalistic interpreters, sometimes for the purpose of disparaging the historical correctness of either form, and sometimes as a conclusive argument against the doctrine of plenary inspiration. The differences are of three kinds: (1) Simply verbal, consisting in the insertion or omission of the Hebrew letters, which is significant; in Exodus it is only omitted where it is found in Deuteronomy, namely, between various words and

Note: The text is a portion of a larger work discussing the historical and theological significance of the Decalogue, or the Ten Commandments, in the context of religious and legal history. It examines the unique place of the decalogue in the history of God's dispensations, its direct communication by God to Moses, and its special importance in the tabernacle and the ark of the covenant. The text also explores differences between the two recorded versions of the commandments, highlighting both verbal and conceptual distinctions, and reflects on the implications for the understanding of plenary inspiration and the historical accuracy of the biblical text.
it is precisely what would be natural in a rehearsal, though not in the original announcements, and came from combining with the legislative something of the narrative style. Such being plainly the character of this latter edition, its other and more noticeable deviations—the occasional amplifications admitted into it, the substitution of _divine for court_, with respect to a neighbour's wife, in the tenth command; and of the delivery of Israel from Egypt, for the divine order of procedure at the creation, in the fourth—fall to be regarded as slightly varied and explanatory statements, which it is perfectly competent for the authorized meditator of the covenant to introduce, and which, in nature and design, do not materially differ from the alterations sometimes made by inspired writers of the New Testament on the passages they quote from the Oldtesta._Homan Manual, p. 331, seq._ They are not without use in an exegetical respect; and in the present case have also a distinct historical value, from the important evidence they yield in favour of the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy; since it is inconceivable that any later author, fictitiously personating Moses, would have ventured on making such alterations on what had been so expressly ascribed to Moses to God himself, and which seemed to bear on it such peculiar marks of sacredness and inviolability. (_Homan's Introduction to the Pentateuch, sect. 25._)

It follows from these remarks, that any view formed of the decaugue as a whole, or of any of its parts, which rests upon the differences in the later as compared with the earlier form, and gives the preference to the latter, must be rejected; it inverts the proper order and relation of things. Of such a nature is the view that is sometimes propounded respecting the fourth commandment, where the reason urged in Deuteronomy for its faithful observance by the Israelites—their deliverence from the land of Egypt—is made to supersede the more general ground on which the institution is based in Exodus; and the subleitical ordinance is consequently exhibited as a distinctively Jewish sublimity. Even were this to be taken as the only reason assigned, the argument founded on it would not be valid; for the fifth commandment also is enforced by a strictly Israelitish promise, while no one is foolish enough to maintain, that the matter of the command is thereby contracted into a merely Israelitish obligation. In all ages of the church special reasons, arising out of present acts of mercy or of judgment, may be, and often have been, employed to enforce general and permanently binding duties. In the case now more immediately in hand, the special could never be intended to interfere with the earlier and more general; it could only have been thrown in as an incidentall and subsidiary consideration; both, because the deliverance of Israel from Egypt could not, like the argument from creation in Exodus, be deduced as an adequate reason for formally grounding an institution like the Sabbath, and also because the account in Deuteronomy professes to be no more than a rehearsal of what had elsewhere obtained its primal record. It is not there, therefore, but in Exodus, that we are to look for the more fundamental representation. God's delivering Israel from Egypt would well induce them to practice the mercy involved in the Sabbath as an existing institution; but the procedure of God in creating the world in six days and resting on the seventh, was what originated the subleitical order, and fixed it in the very constitution of things.

Another and equally groundless application has been made of the prece-dence given in Deuteronomy to the wife of one's neighbour, as if, by placing this before his house (which stands first in Exodus), a kind of separate place were secured for her, and to covert the wife were a different thing in principle from coveting house and possession; thus the prohibition to covet falls into two commands. So, for example, Kurtz, in _History of the Old Covenant_, distinguishes these points, because he presents what may justly be regarded as a conclusive argument against it: "The command. _Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house_, is said, however manifest may be the objects of covetous desire, is still essentially one. This is raised to undoubted certainty by the circumstance, that in Exodus the house, while in Deuteronomy the wife, is named first. If there were indeed two commands, the ninth according to Exodus would be. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, but according to Deuteronomy, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife." This, however, would be an absurd and inexplicable contradiction, whereas, if all the objects of covetous desire were brought into one command, the transposition would be quite trivial and insignificant, in no respect more noticeable than the other differences which appear in the free reproduction of the commandments in Deuteronomy" (ii. sect. 47, 3). Kurtz, admits the truth of this—if the relation of the account in Deuteronomy to that of Exodus were as we have supposed; but refusing to concede this, and concerning that the position of the wife in Deuteronomy may be the original one, that the form in Exodus may have arisen from a corruption in the text—that the twofold introduction of _thou shalt not covet_, applied to wife and goods respectively, renders it in fact a double precept as if the second command might not for a like reason be split into two—and that by so splitting it we must readily get a division of the whole commandments into the sacred three and seven—three for the first, and seven for the second; on these grounds, which are entirely hypothetical and fanciful, Kurtz adheres to the Roman view, which finds two precepts of the law in the command against coveting. The alleged grounds cannot weigh much with those who take the records of Scripture as they stand, and in their treatment of these acecent themselves to look at things in their broad and natural aspect, instead of straining after minute and refined considerations.

3. Discarding, then, such disturbing notions regarding the matter of the ten commandments, and holding these to have been pronounced and engraved on the tables as recorded in Ex. xx., we have to note the distinctive peculiarities and excellencies that characterize them as a revelation of God's will, or a comprehensive summary of man's duty. There are certain points concerning them on which a diversity of opinion exists, and particularly as to the distribution of the commandments into two tables: but there are great and important features about which little or no room for controversy may exist. (1) One of the most prominent of these is the intensely and predominantly moral tone of the revelation. It speaks throughout, not of formal distinctions or external services, but of fundamental principles, holy feelings, essential relationships, and the pure, reverent, upright, or merciful behaviour, by which they should be honoured and maintained. Even the comparative externality of the fourth command appears but as a provision for securing a moral aim—participation for each individual in the sacred rest and blessing of God, and reasonable reposes for his dependants and cattle. At such a time—in an age when religion was everywhere running out into shows and ceremonies—under an economy also which itself partook so largely of the outward and symbolical—it surely was a remarkable, as well as ennobling peculiarity, that this central revelation of truth and duty should have stood so much aloof from the circumstantial, and brought men's hearts so directly into contact with the realities of things. (2.) A second, and equally conspicuous point, is the relative place given to the things which concern men's obligations toward God, and those which concern their obligations toward their fellowmen. If it may be matter of dispute how many of the specific ten belong to the one class, and how many to the other, it is certain—palpable to every eye—that the claims of God are first, and gradually merge into the claims that lie upon one member of the human family to another. To be right with God—it was thus virtually proclaimed—is the first, the grand thing; yet, and that which, when properly attained, is the best security for keeping right with one's fellowmen. Religion, as consisting in the knowledge and love of God, is the root of social worth; and fidelity to the higher relationship is the ground and animating principle of obedience in the lower. Hence also it is in connection with these commandments which more or less directly affect our relation to God, that reasons are assigned for the observance of them; in the first the reason even takes precedence of the command; while in those that explicitly relate to our neighbour there is the naked utterance of the precept: as it, when the former was complied with, the latter could require no separate enforcement. Josephus already drew attention to this as one of the characteristic excellences of the constitution set up by the hand of Moses, who did not say but "He make religion a part of virtue, but saw and ordained other virtues to be parts of religion," and it is in the decalogue that this distinctive feature has its most palpable and striking embodiment. (3.) Another remarkable feature in this moral code is the admirable order and arrangement of its several parts. It does not merely present a summary of human obligation toward God and man, but presents it in such a form as itself bequeaths the impress of a divine hand. Thus in regard to the objects contemplated in the different precepts, they begin at the most vital point, and gradually recede to what less closely and directly touches the person or interest of the individual: God in his being, in his worship, in his name, in his day, in his earthly representatives; then one's neighbour—in his life, in his nearest possession this second-self, as it were, in his common property, in his general standing and position call that may be affected by false testimony regarding him, in his place in one's social will and affection. Then, in regard to the subjects of the obligations imposed, everything belonging to them as rational beings is in each department of duty laid upon their consciences, heart, speech, and behaviour; yet in different order, as might best suit the different relations. The moment one's relation to the true God—the spiritual, the all-seeing, the omnipresent—comes into view, it is of necessity the heart that is primarily concerned: he must have the proper place in its regard and homage, otherwise moulding in a manner is granted; the work of obedience is never so much as begun. Here, therefore, the decalogue takes its commencement, in the demand of God to be acknowledged as alone entitled to the homage of his creatures; no other must be set up before him—no even in the imaginations of the heart, for he is also there, may there specially and peculiarly. That the heart is more immediately in view, is still more evident from the prohibition given in the next command against graven images: implying, if he was properly eyed at all, it may be in the mind the inner man in the spiritual regard that was proper to a spiritual being, of whom no visible representation was admissible. Then, as here we have the consecration of the heart to God, so in what follows there is a like consecration demanded of the speech (the third), and the conduct (the fourth, and to some extent also the fifth).

If now we turn to the other class of relations, while the heart of love is equally necessary to yield a full and proper satisfaction to their claims, it is not so indispensable as regards the own acts of duty, or the personal interest of one's neighbours. He may be the object not of hostile or injurious, but of dutiful and beneficent treatment, though the heart is not toward him as it should be; and here, accordingly, the order is of the inverse kind (deed in the sixth, seventh, and eighth, speech the ninth, and the heart the tenth). But if we regard the fifth as occupying a kind of intermediate position between the divine and the human, parents being somewhat in the room of God, and yet the objects of only a human affection—then the honour enjoined toward them may be said to include all the three: heart, speech, and behaviour are alike involved in it. But as regards the precepts more distinctly and obviously relating to one's neighbour, the order is as exhibited above: from the behaviour to the speech, then from the speech to the heart. Thus, "the end corresponds with the beginning: the heart is distinguished as the alpha and the omega, as that from which everything proceeds, and to which everything tends" (Acts xxvii. 25). And with the spirituality of the law so clearly stamped on the very form of the decalogue, a law, too, as that proceeding from a spiritual and holy God, must necessarily have partaken of his own character: it seems almost inexplicable how divines can be found today sometimes still speaking of it as demanding only an external and civil obedience.

1. One further peculiarity concerning it deserves to be noted namely, its predominantly negative aspect. That it was not simply the prohibition of overt acts of evil which the decalogue aimed at, but that every "thou shalt not" implied a counter "thou shalt," is manifest from the heart being, as has been stated, so distinctly required, and also from some of the commands taking the positive form (the fourth and fifth). At the same time it cannot be without a meaning that they were made to run so much in the prohibitory style. It doubtless arises from the depravity of the human heart, which needs on every hand to be restrained and checked in its tendencies to sin. The more immediate reason of the law being given was, because of the abounding of transgressions in it; and the prohibitory form into which its commands were chiefly thrown, testifies that the bent of men's spirits is toward the evil and not toward the good. So that the decalogue, in its very form, is a standing testimony against the sinfulness of man, as well as for the holiness of God.
The Decalogue is seen to be a matter of comparatively little moment when the decalogue itself is rightly understood. Stress is undoubtedly laid upon the number ten, as that in which the whole were comprised; and the fact is also one and again stated, that they were written upon two tables. But it is nowhere indicated how many of the commandments were written upon one table and how many upon another. For anything said in scripture itself, the two may have been chosen simply because, from the size of the ark in which they were to be deposited, one might not have been sufficient for the purpose, and more than two would have been unnecessary.

In New Testament scripture we find the import of the ten comprised under two fundamental precepts, called respectively the first and the second commandments: the one requiring the supreme love of God, and the other the love of one's neighbour as one's self. But though the ground of this division exists in the very nature of the moral law, and the precise words embodying it are found in different places of the Pentateuch, so that it could not be unknown to the ancient Israelites, it is not said, either in Old or New Testament scripture, how many of the ten precepts of the law are embraced in the first and great commandment of love, and how many in the second. Nothing therefore depends, for any scriptural principle connected with the subject, on the precise division adopted: and if the several precepts were but slightly dealt with, fully exhibited, no concern need be felt about their formal classification. In reality, however, there have been considerable diversities of opinion in the matter, and not merely certain schools of interpretation, but entire communities have shown a disposition to take up here a distinctive ground regarding it. There can be no doubt as to what was the earliest, and what also must ever be regarded as the simplest view. Both Philo and Josephus expressly state, and in doing so doubtless indicate the prevailing belief of their time, that the decalogue fell into two halves, in correspondence with the two tables, and that five were written upon the one table and five upon the other.

In his treatise on the decalogue Philo calls the fifth commandment (Honor thy father and thy mother, etc.) the concluding one of the first table, and also represents it as having had its place on the confines of the two tables, because of the parental relationship appearing to partake partly of the divine and partly of the human. Josephus is equally explicit both as to the division into the two halves, and also as to the first five terminating with the command to honour father and mother (Ex. xx. 12, v. 13). "The first commandment," he says, "teaches us that there is but one God, and that we ought to worship him only; the second commandments not to make the image of any living creature, to worship it; the third, that we must not swear by God in a false matter; the fourth, that we must keep the seventh day by resting from all sorts of work; the fifth, that we must honour our parents; the sixth, that we must abstain from murder; the seventh, that we must not commit adultery; the eighth, that we must not be guilty of theft; the ninth, that we must not bear false witness; the tenth, that we must not admit the desire of that which is another's."

This arrangement, so far as regards the ten constituent parts of the decalogue, has also the suffrage of many of the most intelligent and learned of the fathers. Origen, in his eighth homily on Genesis, not only adopts it, but reasons for it, in preference to another mode which was beginning to find advocates, and which would throw the first and second command into one; he rejected this because he could not in that case get the number ten complete; either, therefore, not knowing of the attempt to accomplish this by dividing the prohibition against lust into two, or not deeming it deserving of notice. Jerome (in Ep. vi. 2), follows the same order: also the author of the commentary on Ephesians in Ambrose's works: Gregory Nazianzen, in his poem on the decalogue: and it became the prevalent one in the Greek church, as in later times among the churches of the Reformation, excepting the Lutheran.

Augustine adopted a different mode of enumeration, which has received the sanction of Reformed, and is also adhered to by most Lutheran divines. According to it the first and second commands, in the explanation just given, are thrown into one, on the ground that they both relate to the worship of God: and the prohibition against coveting is split into two, from its being said to be one thing to covet a man's wife, and another to covet his house or possessions. But obviously the chief reason was to find in the first part of the decalogue, the more distinctly religious part, a reference to the Trinity. After referring to the other views, Augustine said, it appeared to him more convenient to divide the whole into three and seven, "insuch as those who diligently look into the matter, the precepts which relate to God seem to insinuate the Trinity" (patent in Ex. 13). But this respect to the Trinity in a moral code would be out of place; and though both three and seven were occasionally employed as sacred numbers in scripture, yet one can see no adequate reason for such a division in the decalogue, which from the very nature and form of its contents points to a perfectly simple two-fold division. Besides, the command to acknowledge but one God did not of itself exclude the possibility of worshipping him by images: the one has respect to the object of worship, the other to its manner—two distinct things; while coveting is essentially one, whatever its precise object. To make the coveting of a man's wife different in kind from coveting his house or field, would be to take it out of the category of coveting, and place it in that of sensual indulgence (the seventh). This arrangement, therefore, is greatly inferior in naturalness and logical order to the one previously mentioned: and practically it has proved an unhappy one; as it has served in Roman Catholic countries to throw quite into the back-ground the prohibition against idol-worship.

A mode of enumeration current among the Jews, and indeed adopted in the Talmud, so far coincides with the Augustinian view, that it combines the first and second commands into one; but differs in other respects. The first command, according to it, is the declaration, "I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage—unto which, however, is no command, as Origen long ago remarked, but is simply the revelation of the Being who proclaims the commands, and, as such, lays the ground of all the obligations imposed, more especially of that imposed in the first command immediately following—to take him, and him alone, for God.

There still is a difference of opinion among the Reformed, who agree with Philo, Josephus, Origen, &c., as to the mode of making up the ten commands, in DECAPOLIS, the Greek συν έποια, the ten cities, thrown into one word, and applied as a proper name to a region or district lying to the north and north-east of the Sea of Galilee. It is occasionally mentioned in the gospels as a district, from which people came to wait on our Lord's ministry, or which he himself visited, but without any specific account of the territory it embraced, or the cities whence it derived its name. Matt. xxiii. Mark xvi. That it belonged to the part of Syria mentioned above is evident from the last passage referred to, where it is said that Jesus, "departing from the coast of Tyre and Sidon, came to the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the cities of Decapolis." It is sometimes spoken of as belonging to Galilee, but only one of the cities included in the ten lay within the boundaries of that province, Syria-Palestina. The List of Places is the following: Damascus, Philadelphia (the Rablath of De. iii. 11), Raphana, Scythopolis (the Bethshan of Isa. xxx. 10), Gadara in Perea, Marc., Hippos, Dyes, Pella, Gennes (Gadara), and Canatha. Flavius admits that there was some diversity in regard to the cities actually assigned to the district (in quo non nomen sydrense, bat. ii. 10; and Josephus certainly must have understood the matter otherwise, as he designates Scythopolis the greatest city in the Decapolis ως εξ αυτω, which he could not have done if, according to his reckoning, Damascus had belonged to it). Flavius seems to have regarded it as a section of Perea, since he describes it as that part of Perea which lies about Hippos, Pella, and Gadara (ουσιας). The probability is that the provinces to some extent differed at one period as compared with another. They seem to have been associated together, not in a civil, but in a commercial league, with the view of promoting the interests of the Greek population resident in them; and it may have been found expedient at times to drop a particular city from the number, and assume another in its place. The diversity that appears in the ancient enumerations would thus be quite naturally explained.

DEDAN occurs as the name of two different individuals mentioned in Scripture—the earliest, a son of Raamah, and grandson of Cush, Gen. x. 7; and the other, one of the sons of Jokshan, and grandson of Abram by Keturah, Gen. xx. 2. Nothing is said of the particular localities respectively occupied by the families or posterity of these two persons; only, as Jokshan, the father of the Abrahamic Dedan, was sent away by Abram, along with the other sons of Keturah, "unto the east country," it may be presumed, that it the family grew into a distinct tribe, it would be found somewhere in that direction. Such, in reality, was the case. In the burden of Arabia, as depicted by Isaiah, ch. xxv. 1, special mention is made of the trading companies of Dedanim; from which we may infer that they formed one of the many Arabian tribes, and that they were much given to the caravan or inland trade of the East. In like manner the prophet Jeremiah associates them with the Edomites, and represents the captivity which was ready to fall the seed of Esau, as fraught with danger to the inhabitants of Dedan; they are admonished to take special precautions, lest it might involve them also in ruin. ch. xxv. And in ch. xxvii he connects Dedan with Teman and Buz, two other Arabian tribes. The allusions in Ezekiel are entirely similar, both as to the region they occupied, ch. xxvi, and the manners they followed; for they appear among the tribes who minister to the extensive merchandize of Tyre, along with these of Sheba and Tarshish, ch. xxviii. 22, xxix. 11. These are all the notices to be found in Scripture respecting the Dedanites; and there can be little doubt that they are to be understood of the people who sprung from Jokshan, the son of Abramah by Keturah; since they were found in the quarter to which the father of that Dedan migrated, and appear also in a certain affinity with tribes which belonged to the same original stock.

Of the other Dedan we know absolutely nothing but his parentage; and it is quite arbitrary to suppose anything given. The genealogies given of the two Dedans were but different traditions of the origin and descent of the one tribe. It has been supposed, chiefly from a place Dedan being known to have stood near the Persian Gulf, that the descendants of the Canaanite Dedan had probably settled there, and given their name to the place. But this is quite doubtful, and it is mere in accordance with the actual truth to say that no certain information exists upon the subject.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. A special service of consecration, either in setting apart anything that was to be devoted to a sacred use, or in cleansing a sacred thing from some pollution, that had rendered it unfit for its proper destination, was called a dedication. Thus, the tabernacle was dedicated when, with certain rites of purification, it was actually set apart for divine service, Ex. xxviii. and in like manner the temple, when by solemn invocation and sacrificial offerings it was opened by Solomon and the ministering priests, 1 Kings. v. 4. But what among the later Jews was called emphatically the dedication, and in commemoration of which a state observance or feast was kept up, was the fresh consecration of the temple after it had been profaned by the foul abominations of Antiochus Epiphanes, as recorded in 1 Macc. iv. 32-59. The event it commemorated took place in 168 B.C. That this dedication is our subject is further indicated in the history of our Lord's earthly ministry. Speaking of his discourses with the Jews on a certain occasion, St. John states "it was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication; and it was winter," John x. 22. The feast fell in the ninth month of the Jewish year, which nearly coincided with our December, on the 15th of the month. Josephus expressly notices the observance of this feast in honour of the Macedonian dedication as practised in his day; and there is no reason to doubt that it was the feast referred to by the evangelist. The celebration of it, however, was not confined to Jerusalem, but

DELIILAH [the drooping or languishing one], a Philistine woman, who resided in the valley of Sorek, and gained the affections of Samson. It is not said that he took her to wife, but merely that he loved her, and had frequent and familiar intercourse with her. The impression left upon the mind by the narrative of this portion of Samson's life is that she was a person of base character, and that his connection with her was of an improper kind. Indeed, this seems evident alone from the account which the lords of the Philistines sought to make of her influence over Samson. When it became known how he frequented her house, they endeavoured by bribes to obtain through her the secret of her lover's marvellous strength—which it is scarcely conceivable they should have desired, if she had been known to be of good reputation, and had stood to him in the relation of a proper spouse. But they found in Delilah the fit instrument for their purpose. She loved their bribes greatly better than the honour, or even than the life, of Samson, and by dint of cajolery and perseverance she wrested from him the fatal secret, by disclosing which he soon found he had delivered up his strength into the hands of his enemies, and instead of their terror, had rendered himself their sport and tool. She is therefore to be regarded as an example, not of a deceitful and treacherous wife, or even of a lover, in the ordinary sense, proving false to her plighted faith, but rather of a wily and profligate seducer, in whom no confidence should have been placed, and who seeks to captivate only that she may lure and destroy. (See under Samson.)

DELUGE. The word used in the English Bible for the great catastrophe which destroyed the old world is flood; but as this term is applied also to other and comparatively common events, the word deluge has now come to be regarded as the more appropriate and fitting designation of the great event under consideration. Accordingly, with this word we shall connect the discussion of the general deluge—so far as such a discussion is admissible in a work like the present.

There are many references in Scripture to the subject, as one of the more important and prominent facts in the world's history, fraught with lessons of instruction for all times; but the historical account of the event is comprised in Genesis, chapters 6-9. In this account attention is first very pointedly drawn to the cause of the catastrophe, while it was still only an event in prospect; it was because "the wickedness of man was great in the earth," insomuch that it even required the Lord that he should smite man on the earth. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth." And again, when announcing to Noah both the purpose of destruction, and the preparation to be made against it, "God said, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher-wood." So that the coming deluge was announced in the strongest terms as a judgment on the incorrigible wickedness of the whole human race under the benignant constitution of the antediluvian world had reached a height altogether subversive of the great end of God in the creation of mankind, and of the real well-being of the world itself. Then, in regard to the extent of the calamity, it is said, "Behold I do bring a flood of waters upon the earth to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die. But with thee will I establish my covenant... And every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee." Fowls after their kind are specified, cattle, and even every creeping thing of the earth—a male and female of each; and in the case of clean creatures, those employed for purposes of worship, the two were afterwards increased to seven. And when the final order was given to take them into the ark, it was said, "I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth." Beside these tokens of ruin from above, like the opening of heaven's windows, it is afterwards stated that the fountains of the great deep were broken up, that in consequence the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, "covering all the high hills that were under the whole heaven" to the depth of fifteen cubits and upward; that all flesh died upon the earth of man, beast, fowl, and creeping thing; Noah only remained alive, and those that were with him in the ark. At the end of 150 days, we are further told, the waters abated; in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day, they had so far decreased as to admit of the ark resting on Mount Ararat; then, after waiting for a while, Noah sent forth a raven, which did not return, but went and from til the waters were dried up from off the earth, that is, it found, though with difficulty, the means of subsistence away from the ark. A dove afterwards sent forth speedily returned, indicating that the earth was not yet ripe for her gentler nature. A second trial with the dove issued in her return with a fresh olive-leaf in her mouth, bespeaking the existence both of dry land and of returning vegetation. A subsequent trial with the dove, after an additional interval, when she no longer returned, convinced Noah that the ground had become well-nigh ready for man and beast, so that ere long the entire inmates of the ark left their temporary abode, to occupy the renovated earth. The whole period they were in the ark was a year and ten days—from the 17th day of the 6th month of Noah's 600th year, to the 27th day of the 6th month of the following year.
Such briefly is the Mosaic account of the deluge; and the difficulties to which it gives rise have respect mainly to two points—the apparent universality ascribed to it and the equally apparent inadequacy of the means indicated, whether for effecting a universal deluge, or for preserving during an entire twelvemonth a complete representation, after the manner described, of the entire animate creation upon earth. The first question then which naturally calls for consideration, is whether the account is really to be understood of an absolute universality, or of a simply relative one? Undoubtedly, if read from the present advanced stage of the world's history, it would be impossible to understand the language otherwise than of an absolute universality; for now, that every region of the world is known, and known to be more or less occupied by man and beast, it must have been in the strictest sense a world embracing catastrophes, which could be described as enveloping in a watery shroud every hill under the whole heaven, and destroying every living thing that moved on the face of the earth. But here it must be remembered, the sacred narrative dates from the comparative infancy of the world, when but a limited portion of it was peopled or known; and it is always one of the most natural and rational things for a writer respecting the interpretation of such early records, that one is apt to overlook the change of circumstances, and contemplate what is written from a modern point of view. Hence the embarrassments so often felt, and the misjudgments sometimes actually pronounced, respecting those parts of Scripture which speak of the movements of the heavenly bodies in language suited to the apparent, but at variance, as has now been ascertained, with the actual phenomena. In such cases it is forgotten that the Bible was not intended to teach the trivialest of physical science, or point the way to discoveries in the merely natural sphere. Of things in these departments of knowledge it uses the language of common life. And so, whatever in the scriptural account of the deluge touches on geographical limits or matters strictly physical, ought to be taken with the qualifications inseparable from the bounded horizon of men's views and relations at the time. It population had not yet spread far from the original centre of the human family, nor covered more than a few regions of the earth, as there is good reason to believe was the case in the AYTHNIA WORLD, what would be an absolute universality, so far as the human race was concerned, might in other respects be nothing more than a relative universality—if the transactions are simply viewed and recorded in their bearing on the condition and interests of mankind.

Now, that they were so considered is evident from the whole tone and purport of the narrative. It is the sacred aspect of the matter which the sacred historian keeps prominently in view; he presents it in no other aspect than as God's judgment on the doomed and repentant race of transgressors, who had filled the earth with corruption and violence. And just as in the first transgression, so here the living creatures of the earth are represented as suffering in the catastrophe, simply from their connection with the rational beings to whom they stood in a relation of subordination. It was consequently the earth as the field of human occupancy—the earth in so far as it had become the theatre of the moral agency, and the witness of their crimes—which was in the eye of the sacred writer. And whether the catastrophe of which he wrote actually reached farther or not, the circumstances of the case did not absolutely require that it should do so; the demands of scriptural interpretation would be met if it embraced all within the sphere which man had yet made his own; for on that alone was the mind of the sacred penman concentrated.

In continuation of this as a perfectly warrantable view of the matter, we can appeal to other passages of Scripture, in which expressions, equally universal in their literal import, must still, from the very nature of things, have been meant only of a limited universality—embracing the whole, but still no more than the whole, of the totality lying within the aim and scope of the writer. Thus in the Pentateuch itself, speaking of the great inundation in the days of Joseph, it is said, “the earth was in all lands,” and “all countries came into Egypt to buy corn.” (Gen. xvi. 2.) So again in regard to Israel, when on the eve of entering the land of Canaan, “This day will I begin to put the dread of thee, and the fear of thee, upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall report of thee, and shall tremble.” (Deut. ii. 28.) “The fame of David,” it is said in later history, “went forth into all lands; and of David’s son, all the earth sought to Solomon to hear his wisdom.” (1 Kings i. 50.) Returning to New Testament scripture, we find the apostle Paul intimating to the Romans, that “their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world,” and informing the Colossians, that “the gospel which they heard was preached to every creature which is under heaven.” (Rom. x. 14; Col. i. 23.) Such modes of expression indeed are common in all writings which are addressed to the popular understanding; and they create no difficulty so long as people place themselves in the position of the writer, and think of the field of universal precept as his mind at the time.

Nothing more is necessary in respect to the account of the deluge, to render its terms compatible with a limited universality, coextensive with the bounds of the human family, yet possibly reaching to no great distance beyond.

Accordingly, there were not wanting theological writers, who, long before any geological fact, or well ascertained fact of any sort in physical science, had appeared to take men's faith in a strictly universal deluge, actually put the interpretation now suggested as consistent upon the narrative of the deluge. Thus Iseus, who flourished in the middle of the seventeenth century, says in his Synopsis on Gen. vii. 19: “It is not to be supposed that the entire globe of the earth was covered with water. Where was the need of overwhelming those regions in which there were no human beings? It would be highly unreasonable to suppose that mankind had so increased before the deluge, as to have penetrated to all the corners of the earth. It is indeed not probable that they had extended beyond the limits of Syria and Mesopotamia. It would be absurd to affirm that the effects of the punishment inflicted upon men alone applied to places in which there were no men.” Wherein he concludes, that “if not so much as the hundredth part of the globe was overspread with water, still the deluge would be universal, because the extinction took effect upon all the part of the world which was inhabited.” In like manner Stilligren, a writer of the same period, in his Origines Novae, (b. ii. c. 11) states that “he cannot see any urgent necessity from the Scripture to assert that the flood did spread over all the surface of the earth. The flood was universal as to mankind; but from this follows no necessity at all of asserting the universality of it as to the globe of the earth, unless it be sufficiently proved that the whole earth was peopled before the flood, which I despair of ever seeing proved." Indeed, this view dates much further back than the comparatively recent time when these authors lived; for while Bishop Patrick himself took the other and commoner view, we find him thus noting in his commentary on Gen. vii. 19: "There were those anciently, viz. in the earlier ages, and they have their successors now, who imagined the flood was not universal—אֲדֹمָה אֲבָל רָאוּ אֶת רְאוֹז אֶתְרוֹס חֲרִים—but only there where men themselves tell us, as the author of the Questions of Orthodoxy tells us, (Quest. 54). It is certain, therefore, that this is not a question between scientific naturalists on the one side, and men of simple faith in Scripture on the other. Apart from the cultivation or the discoveries of science, we have two classes of interpreters of Scripture, one of which finds no reason to believe in more than a restricted universality, while the other press the language to its farthest possible extent—take it, not as descriptive of God's judgment upon the earth, in so far merely as it was occupied by men, but with reference to the globe of the earth, and an event in its natural history. Which of the two modes of interpretation is to be followed? Surely, in such a case, if science has any clear and determinate light to throw upon the subject, it has a right to be heard; and it would be equally foolish to reject its testimony here, as in the parallel line of physical astronomy.

Now, in making our appeal to science, there is no need for venturing upon hypothetical ground, or travelling into regions which can yield at most but a problematical or doubtful testimony. Such, for example, is the difficulty of accounting, on scientific principles, for such a mass of water as might have been sufficient for enveloping the entire globe to the depth specified in the sacred narrative. If the relative proportions of sea and dry land were precisely as they are now—if the mountains all stood at the same elevation—and if no other resources than such as are now known to naturalists were accessible for giving the requisite direction to the waters of the earth, and furnishing them in the proper abundance—then the conclusion might be safely enough drawn that the deluge could not be absolutely universal. But it is impossible to say for certain what differences in these respects may have existed at the period of the deluge, as compared with more recent times; and such changes are known to have taken place within the periods of scientific research, as will at least leave room for the supposition, that possibly there may have been natural causes adequate to account for the submergence of all that was then dry land. The same substantially may be said in regard to the skill and resources requisite to construct a vessel capable of bearing any considerable burden, to fit it as a suitable habitation for multitudes of living creatures, and keep them all alive and afloat upon the waters for months together. Here, again, our information is too limited to admit of very definite results being arrived at, being too little acquainted with the position of matters in the antediluvian world, and the supernatural aid that may have been communicated to Noah for the occasion.

But in regard more particularly to this second point—the capacity of the ark for the preservation and support of animal life—it is one upon which our present knowledge enables us to speak with entire confidence, and in decisive rejection of the idea of a strictly universal deluge. We know from the description of the sacred historian pretty nearly what were the dimensions of the ark, and we also now know near enough for all practical purposes the number of distinct species of animals, fowls, and creeping things upon the earth; and by no conceivable possibility could the ark be made to receive the whole of these by tens and scores, after the manner specified in the text, and provide food for all sufficient to last a thousand years. The measurements of the ark are given in cubits, which as anciently employed were of somewhat variable length, though in the earliest times it is most likely the natural cubit that was commonly in use—the distance from the elbow to the point of the middle finger—and which usually amounts to about eighteen inches. But allowing that the larger measure of twenty-one inches should be understood—as is contended for by Raleigh, Shuckford, Hales, Kitto, &c.—we shall have for the length of the ark 547 feet, by 91 feet in breadth. It was made of three stories, so that the area yielding, and even the width which must be allowed to give the entire capacity of the structure, but it still does not quite amount to 150,000 square feet; and, as Hugh Miller remarks by way of comparison, must have fallen short by about 28,000 square feet of a single gallery (the northern of the Crystal Palace of 1851). Could such a space contain, even for a month, to say nothing of a year, pairs of every distinct species of the animate creation! By the writers above referred to, and many others, laborious calculations are entered into to show that the areas of the ark meet the demands of the problem in its utmost extent; but such calculations always proceed upon an immensely inadequate estimate of the numbers of extant species of living creatures. It is astonishing how these have grown upon our hands, as naturalists have pursued their investigations into different regions of the world. Raleigh thought it enough to "seek room for eighty-nine distinct species of beasts, or, lest any should be omitted, for one hundred." Those had to be multiplied by two, and allowance made for the purposes of the clean and unclean animals, so that there might be 280 in all; and all these 280 beasts might be kept in one story or room of the ark, in their several cubits; their meat in a second; the birds and their provision in a third, with a space to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessities. Such was the easy mode of stowage for the living creaturehood of the earth, and its necessary food, which presented itself to Sir Walter Raleigh. But the progress of science has made it infinitely harder work for his successors in this line of calculations. Balfour by his more extensive researches in natural history reckoned double the number of quadrupeds that Raleigh thought it necessary to make allowance for; and so far was even he beneath the reality, that instead of 280, there are known to exist upon the earth 1,658 species of animals. Such is the number given, for example, in Johnston's Physical Atlas of 1856; and later editions will probably add somewhat to these already ascertained. But supposing these to be the whole, they could not yield less, when taken by tens and by hundreds, than the animals—so far greatly have the species of ox, deer, sheep, and goat increased the clean animals which were to be preserved by severals, that upwards of 1000 individuals of that class alone would need to be reckoned. And then to the list have to be added somewhere about 6000 species of birds, not far from 100 reptiles which can not live under earth, and of insects some hundreds of thousands. When such myriads of living creatures as these came into our reckoning, it is clear, at a day, that no single structure could contain accommodation for them all, with means of support for an entire year—not though it were many times the size of Noah's ark. Nor is it simply, we must remember, the lodging-room and sustenance required for so many creatures, that has in such a case to be thought of, but the personal attendance in the ark necessary to minister to all their daily supplies of food, and keep everything in proper order. In this respect we have but the services of eight persons to take into account, and what these could avail even for a tithe of the number specified above, it is impossible to conceive.

There are other considerations of a scientific kind which come in aid of the conclusion we are obliged to arrive at. One of these is, the geographical distribution of animals in accord with the native temperaments and habits of each. In proportion as new regions of the world have been brought open to our view, they have brought us acquainted with fresh species of creatures not found elsewhere; these are to all appearance indigenous and peculiar to their respective localities, and many of them are incapable of living for any length of time in a climate materially different from that which nature has assigned them. They could not, without violence to their respective constitutions, have been kept alive in one region; nor could they, if anyhow brought and kept together, by any conceivable expedients be transported to indiscriminatory localities. Indeed it appears that throughout the whole history of animated beings, the different regions of the earth have had, to a considerable extent, their peculiar forms of organized existence. The koalas and armadillos of South America had their gigantic predecessors in the enormous megatherium and mylodon, and the strong-gilled glyptodon; the kangaroos and wombats of Australia had their extinct predecessors in a kangaroo nearly twice the size of the largest living species, and in length as large as a rhinoceros; and the ornithic inhabitants of New Zealand had their predecessors in monstrous birds, such as the dinornis, the astrapia, and the palapetrix—wingless creatures like the ostrich, that stood from six to twelve feet in height. In these several regions two generations of species of the genera peculiar to them have existed—the recent generation, by whose descendants they are still inhabited, and the extinct generation, whose remains we find blocked up in their sols and caves. But how are such facts reconcilable with the hypothesis of a universal deluge? (Miller's "On the Ark," p. 221.)

Other considerations point to the same result: the natural impossibility, for example, of obtaining or laying up flesh for the support of carnivorous animals and birds; the certain destruction that must have ensued to a very large proportion of the seeds and plants of the earth, if they had been so long under water; and to fresh-water fish, if in all regions of the globe the sea had totally and for months together overspread the dry land; but it is needless here to go farther into detail. The facts already mentioned render the notion of a universal deluge, in the literal sense, at variance with the light of reason; and of the two competing interpretations, we are, in a manner, compelled to decide in favour of that which does not place the sacred narrative in antagonism to the results of modern science. What precise area of the earth's surface might be covered by the waters of the deluge, or by what particular agencies these waters might have been let loose for their work of destruction, it may be impossible to determine with any certainty: since attempts in that direction must be in a great degree conjectural, and can never yield more than a partial degree of satisfaction. Let it be enough to adhere to the general facts—which we believe to be all that are necessarily involved in the scriptural narrative—that some where about two thousand years before the Christian era the inhabited portion of the world was totally submersed in water—that the whole existing race of mankind perished in the catastrophe, with the exception of Noah and his family, who were preserved in an immense vessel that he had been instructed beforehand to prepare—and that along with them were also preserved specimens of the living creatures belonging to the region, sufficient to propagate the several species in the new world, and minister to the wants of those who by God's mercy escaped the general destruction. Thus understood, there is not impossibly involved in the history of the deluge to render it justly liable to suspicion, but there is much also to commend it to our reasonable belief.

1. It is not apparent by any known phenomenon in the physical history or condition of the world, but, analogically at least, derives from some of them a measure of confirmation. Had it been capable of proof that the crust of the earth exhibits no appearance of having ever been subject to the operation of violent agencies, or the overflowing of mighty waters, there might have been some ground for questioning the scriptural account of the deluge. But the reverse is known to be the case. There are unembattled indications of both kinds of action—appearances in the earth's strata which can only be accounted for by the most powerful forces from beneath having wrought upwards with disturbing violence—alluvial deposits near the surface which betoken the action of great floods sweeping over the land—in some of these also the remains of animals belonging to the existing or nearly allied species. Such things, if not immediately connected with the Noachian deluge, at least bear evidence to the same kind of agencies which served instrumentally to bring it about, and of results not unlike to those in which it issued.

From one time certainly it was thought that the physical history of the world was capable of yielding a more direct and specific testimony to the scriptural account of the deluge. It was supposed by not a few cultivators of natural science that the organic remains which are found in the rocks of later formation were those of animals and plants that belonged to the antediluvian world, and had been entombed in the bowels of the earth by the catastrophe which terminated that pristine order of things. In Dr. Hales' Chronology, for instance, all such appearances, and along with them the dispositions of the earth into islands and continents, lofty mountains, rugged precipices, and deep ravines, are all thrown together as clear proofs of the universality of the deluge, and even of its general progress from north to south (vol. i. p. 235, sqq.) This phase of opinion, however, could only prevail in the infancy of geological science, or rather before geology had attained to the condition of a science, and when a few isolated appearances were hastily assumed as the basis of some precarious theory. As soon as the appearances came to be subjected to close investigation, it was perceived that those organic remains represented very different periods, and periods not only distinctly marked as earlier and later, but also as so remote in point of time that the most recent of them must be held to have been antecedent to the creation of man and the existing constitution of the world. The opinion referred to, therefore, has now to be numbered among the things that were.

The same fate has subsequently befallen another idea, which had more to commend it in the actual appearances of things, and for a time received the suffrages of men of science. It is that which ascribed the formation of diluvial or drift deposits in many parts of the earth to the Noachian deluge. This diluvium, lying near the surface of the earth, and composed of various materials—sand, pebbles, fragments of rocks, organic remains—and often laid as if it had been drifted into its present position by the action of a mass of waters flowing in a particular direction, was at first not unnaturally connected with the deluge. The Reliquia Diluviana of Dr. Buckland, published in 1825, had for one of its specific objects the establishment of this conclusion: and Professor Sedgwick gave his support to the same view of the subject. But again more careful investigations proved the idea to be destitute of any just foundation. So Professor Sedgwick admitted in a speech before the Geological Society so far back as 1831. He held it then to be "exclusively established, that the vast masses of diluvial gravel scattered almost over the surface of the earth do not belong to any violent and transitory period. It was, indeed, a most unwarranted conclusion, when we assumed the contemporaneity of all the superficial gravels on the earth. We saw the clearest traces of alluvial action, and we had in our sacred histories the record of a general deluge. On this double testimony it was that we gave a unity to a vast succession of phenomena, not one of which we perfectly comprehended, and under the name diluvium classed them all together," Dr. Buckland, in his Bridgegate Treatise, made substantially the same acknowledgment, and admitted that the phenomena in question appeared to have proceeded from "geological revolutions produced by violent eruptions of water, rather than the comparatively tranquil inundation described in the inspired narrative." In short, it appears beyond any reasonable doubt, from the component elements of those drift accumulations, and other characteristic marks, that they point to a period much anterior to the deluge of Noah, and indicate an agency greatly more violent and protracted than it is represented to have been. The crust and surface of the earth exhibit no clearly ascertainable and indelible traces of the Noachian deluge: nor, in truth, should such ever have been looked for. This was culminated maintained, even when the current of scientific belief ran strong in the contrary direction, by a man who was equally distinguished for his philosophic mind and his simple faith in divine truth—Dr. John Fleming. In Janma's Philosophical Journal, 1826, he wrote thus: "From the simple narrative of Moses, it appears that the ark had not drifted far from the spot where it was first lifted up, and that it grounded at no great distance from the same spot; that the waters rose upon the earth by degrees; that the flood exhibited no violent impetuosity, displacing neither the soil, nor the vegetable tribes which it supported, nor rendering the ground unfit for the cultivation of the vine. With this conviction in my mind," he adds, "I am not prepared to witness in the face of any amount of the catastrophe: must check my respect for the authority of revelation heightened, when I see on the present surface no memorials of the event."

At the same time, if the remains existing on the earth's surface afford no direct or specific proof of the deluge, they still bear a collateral, and by no means unimportant testimony to its credibility. For though, as Buckland has stated in his Bridgegate Treatise, "we have not yet found (nor perhaps are likely to find) the certain traces of any great diluvian catastrophe, which we can affirm to be within the human period, we can at least show that paroxysms of internal energy, accompanied by the elevation of mountain chains, and followed by mighty waters desolating whole regions of the earth, were a part of the mechanism of nature. Now, what has happened again and again, from the most ancient up to the most modern periods in the natural history of the earth, may have happened once during the four thousand years that man has been living on its surface. So that all anterior improbability is taken away from the fact of a deluge such as that of Noah." This is the fair and legitimate use to make of the evidences that appear in the earth's strata and surface of previous cataclysms and diluvial catastrophes. They conclusively establish the occurrence of facts that belong to the same order as the Noachian deluge, and are perfectly valid against such shallow reasoning as that of Voltairine, who, to get rid at any cost of the Bible account of a deluge, denied the existence of anything of a like nature in the past—could even take refuge in the wild imagination that the soil of the earth might possibly possess fossils. Such an unreasoning extreme of infidelity was well replied to by Guizot, long before Buckland directed his mind to the subject. Speaking of Voltairine in his Antithèse de la géographie, he says, "When I now learned, that to weaken the tradition of a deluge, he had denied all petrified shells, and only admitted them as bones nature, he entirely lost my confidence; for my own eyes had on the Baschberg plainly enough shown me, that I stood on the bottom of an old dried up sea, among the vase of its ancient inhabitants. These mountains had certainly been covered with waves—whether before or during the deluge did not concern me; it was enough, that the valley of the Rhine had been a monstrous lake—a bay extending beyond the reach of eyesight out of this I was not to be talked." Nor is the analogous argument altogether confounded to these convulsive movements anterior to the human period: there have been also, in the times posterior to it, partial changes, oscillations as to natural level in portions of the earth's surface, with corresponding alterations between sea and land, of a kind probably not unlike to what happened at the deluge, though greatly inferior in compass and degree. On the coast of Chili the effect of two earthquakes in 1822 and 1835 was such, that over an area of 100,000 square miles the coast has been raised in one part two feet above high-water mark, and in another to the same extent depressed. In the Bay of Baiae, near Naples, there exist the ruins of an ancient temple, that of Jupiter Serapis, with several columns standing nearly erect.

For a time these must have been submerged in the sea by the subsidence of the land, as appears from certain holes pierced in them by a class of perforating lizards, which live only in the sea; while again, by a subsequent, and as must be supposed, very gradual elevation of the ground, they have been raised and now stand above the sea-level. Who can tell how far causes of a like nature may have operated in the region which we have reason to believe was the more peculiar scene of the deluge, and contributed to its accomplishment? The depression to a certain depth of the tracts occupied by the human family below the Caspian, or any other adjacent sea, would have all the appearance, and the effect also, of opening up the fountains of the great deep. And if, within or near that particular region, there are "vast plains, white with salt, and charged with sea shells, showing that the Caspian Sea was at no distant period greatly more extensive than it is now" (testimony of the Rock, p. 230), it cannot be deemed improbable, that when a great work of judgment had to be executed, and a lesson of moral discipline administered to all coming ages, the chief means of executing it might have been found in bringing into play such elements and operations as are known to have been at work in other times and places. So that, if no tangible, conclusive evidence of the Noahian deluge can be appealed to in the physical history of the earth, there is not only nothing to discount it, but not a little in various respects to commend it to our belief.

II. Passing from the physical to the political or the national history of the world, we find nothing to militate against the scriptural account of the deluge, nothing at least that can stand the test of an impartial and search examination. The world contains no authentic records, or extant monuments, that carry any testimony of the existence of human agency and civilization so period to remote for such a catastrophe as that of the Noahian deluge. The more important nations of antiquity did undoubtedly lay claim to a continued existence, which, had it been real, would have been incompatible with such a general wreck of human life and interests as is represented to have then occurred. But all pretensions of this nature have given way before the advancing light of careful research and scientific knowledge. The old Indian, Chinese, Egyptian, and other suchlike claims to an incredible antiquity are now universally assigned to the region of fable; and the astronomical tables derived from the East, which were so artfully framed as to deceive such men as Bally and Playfair, have been found to possess no higher authority than cunning forgeries. (see Sare's Bampton Lectures.) Even later and less suspicious looking proofs of national longevity, which have been perjured by opponents of the Bible, have on closer examination been found false in regard to the point under consideration. It is not long since that the zodiacs found inscribed on the temples of Esna and Dendera, in Upper Egypt, had a kind of fabulous age ascribed to them, reaching to thousands of years, not only before the deluge, but before the creation of man, according to the Old Testament chronology. The deciphering however of the Greek portions of the inscriptions, and the partial interpretation of the hieroglyphs, have dispelled these golden dreams of a hoar antiquity. It has been ascertained that the temple at Dendera was consecrated to the Roman emperor Tiberius. "The temple of Esna, whose construction was placed as far back as 3000 years before the Christian era, has a column, whose inscription gives it the date of the tenth year of the emperor Antoninus. There is still more decisive proof, that these zodiacs have no reference either to the precession of the equinoxes, or a change of the seasons. A mummy cloth brought from Egypt has a very legible Greek inscription respecting a young man who died in the nineteenth year of the reign of Trajan. The cloth has also a zodiac painted on it, marked in a similar manner to that of Dendera, and therefore was, in all probability, a mere astrological composition respecting the individual whose body was wrapped up in it. The zodiacs in the temples are probably astrological formulas respecting the dedication of the building, or the nativity of the emperor in whose reign it was constructed." (see Sanio, King's Classics, p. 297.)

It is true that some of the more zealous of those who have given themselves to Egyptian-logical studies still presume themselves to have it in their power to establish with the remains of Egyptian architecture, the surviving witnesses of times greatly more remote than the era of the deluge. But it is also true that the data on which their conclusions rest are, to a large extent, conjectural; that the view is not concurred in by Wilkinson, and many of the more learned and judicious investigators of the subject, whose mind was substantially expressed in the words of the great chronologist Ibbetson: "The history of ancient Egypt is a labyrinth, of which chronology has lost the thread." Indeed, the view may be said to carry its own refutation along with it, as it would assert for Egypt a high position of art and civilization, when all the world besides was either unpeopled, or sunk in abysmal barbarism.

III. But while there are no historical evidences in the political history of the world against the Mosaic account of the deluge, whether written or oral, there are the simplest traditional testimonies in its favour. These are, from the remoteness of the event, the only kind of direct collateral evidence that the case properly admits of. It was one of Hume's objections against the historical verity of the Pentateuch in general, that it was not corroborated by any concurring testimony. But how could it? There is no written testimony extant, apart from what is found in the Bible (which contains the prismatic records of the human race), that comes within centuries of the time to which even the latest accounts in the Pentateuch refer. There is here, therefore, no room for concomitant testimonies, though, in respect to such an event as the deluge, at once possessing a world wide interest, and fitted to leave most memorable impressions on the minds of men, there was abundant room for testimonies of a traditional nature. And these accordingly we have; and have in such fulness and variety that there is scarcely a nation or tribe of historical significance in any part of the world which has not tradition to account of a general deluge, in which the whole human race perished, excepting a more remnant saved in a vessel, or by some other means of escape available only to themselves. Sir William Jones, in his Asiatic Researches, with reference to the event in this general aspect of it, calls it "a fact, which is admitted as true by every nation whose literature we have access, and particularly by the ancient Hindoos, who have alluded an entire Pur-am to the detail of that event, which they relate, as usual, in symbols and allegories. "It is no longer probable only," he again says, "but absolutely certain, that the whole race of mankind proceeded from Iran (the district of Asia to which Ararat belongs), as from a centre, whence they migrated at first in three great colonies; and that these three branches grew from a common stock, which had been miraculously preserved in general confusion and destruction of this globe." To the like effect Mitford, in his History of Greece: "The tradition of all nations, and appearances in every country, bear witness scarcely less explicit than the writings of Moses to that general flood, which nearly destroyed the whole human race; and those ablest Greek authors, who have attempted to trace the history of mankind to its source, all refer to such an event for the beginning of the present system of things on earth." To these may be added the later testimony of a French writer, one rather of the infidel than the believing school, M. Bonnac, whose words have been quoted by Hitchcock: "I shall be vexed to be thought stupid enough to deny that an inundation or catastrophe has taken place in the world, or rather in the region inhabited by the antediluvians. To me this seems to be as truly a fact in history as the reign of Caesar at Rome."

It was only what might be expected, in regard to an event which took place before the human family separated into distinct nationalities, that the traditions preserved of it would maintain more or less of a general agreement, but that they would also be tinged to some extent with the peculiar and distinctive features of different places and regions. This is precisely what has happened, although perhaps there is more reason to wonder at the marked agreements with the Mosaic narrative, than at the various national diversities. The traditions of the ancient Asiatic nations are in this case the most important, because they were the earliest to be put on record, and were also the accredited accounts of the descendants of those who stood nearest to the catastrophe. They have been so often given, that it is needless to do more than briefly mention them. The Chaldaean tradition, reported by Berosus, and found in Josephus (Ant. i. 10), asserts the fact of a general deluge, and the preservation of only a few persons in an ark, which rested on the mountains of Armenia. The Assyrian, preserved by Eusebius in the words of Ahylenus (Enarr. Prop, c. 1.10), is somewhat more specific, as it designates a single man, named Ni-thorus (otherwise called Xisuthrus), who being divinely forewarned, sailed in a vessel into Armenia, and presently all things became involved in a fearful inundation: by and by he sent out from his vessel several birds in succession, which from the prevalence of the waters constantly returned back stained with mud, till after the third trial they returned no more; and then he was himself taken to the celestial region, while the vessel and its contents rested in Armenia. Polyhistor, as quoted by Cyril (Adv. Jul. iii. 6), adds to the account that Nisthurus had in his vessel birds, reptiles, and beasts of burden. The Indian account, as given by Sir William Jones (Asiatic Researches, ii. 16), represents the sun-born monarch Satyavata, as immediately before the deluge addressed by the God Vishnu, in the form of a fish, in the following terms: "In seven days all creatures that have offended me shall be destroyed by a deluge; but thou shalt be preserved in a capacious vessel miraculously formed. Take therefore all kinds of medicinal herbs and succulent grains for food, and, together with the seven holy men, your respective wives, and pairs of all animals, enter the ark without fear." He did so, and was thereby saved, along with his company, from the general destruction, in a large vessel that came floating toward him on the rising waters. The traditions of Egypt upon the subject have not come down to us in any detailed form, but are referred by Josephus (Ant. ii. 11), and Plato also, in his Timaeus, to have some notice of them. The Greek traditions respecting the deluge of Dioneion differ somewhat in different writers, but the current belief was, no doubt, given with substantial correctness by Ovid. A later form appears in the treatise De Dea Syrinx, ascribed to Lucian. According to it the antediluvians were a wicked brood, men of violence, regardless of oaths and of the rights of hospitality, without mercy one toward another; on which account they were doomed to destruction. "For this purpose in many ages the gods, that there was a mighty eruption of water from the earth, accompanied with heavy showers from above, so that the rivers swelled and the sea overflowed, till the whole earth was covered with a flood, and all flesh drowned. Dioneion alone was preserved, to people the world. This mercy was shown him on account of his justice and piety. His preservation was effected thus: he put all his family, both his sons and their wives, into a vast ark which he had provided, and he then went into it himself. At the same time animals of every species—beasts, horses, lions, serpents—whoever lived upon the face of the earth, followed him by pairs—all which he received into the ark, and experienced no evil from them."

This account, which has been frequently produced among the heathen traditions of the deluge, and still also by Miller (Testimony of the Rocks, p. 292), betrays, we may say, its own prehistoric origin. It is far too close an imitation of the scriptural account, and in particular too ethical in its tone, to be a really heathen account. It belongs to that sub-apostolic age, which witnessed in so many ways a remoulding of the heathen with the Christian elements, and must, in its existing form, be regarded as a fabrication. The work from which it is taken is no longer reckoned among the genuine productions of Lucian; but even if it were, as Lucian was acquainted with the sacred books, the real character of the narrative would not be thereby altered. It should cease therefore to be mentioned in this connection. Nor should any use be made (as is still done both by Kittë and Miller) of the Aprodacan meal, which exhibits the name of Noe inscribed on a floating chest, within which a man and woman appear seated, and to which a bird on the wing is seen bearing a branch. This likewise betrays its origin; it belongs to later times, and is too clear a specimen of what was then very common in Phrygia and its neighbourhood—an indiscriminate use of heathen and biblical sources, and a consequent mixing up of the opinions proper to each, as if there were no material difference between them. It is but another form of what gave birth to the later Sybiline oracles, and the Gnostic philosophy of the first centuries. Tradition has its spurious productions as well as history; and in a case like the present, where the legitimate evidence is so full, there is the less need for calling in the aid of what is unable to stand the test of a rigid examination.

Beside the older Greek and Asiatic traditions of a

DEMONS

Deluge, traces of the same event have been found where they might least have been expected, among the tribes and races of the New World, and even among the islands in the Pacific Ocean. The traditions here also vary, though the substance remains in all much the same. The Indians of the North American lakes tell of their forerunners, with their family, and pairs of the living creatures, being preserved on a raft, which he had been warned to build, while all others were drowned. Those on Terra Firma, in the opposite direction, believe that when the deluge came, one man with his wife and children escaped in a canoe. The Mexicans had traditions and also pictorial representations of the event, in which one man and his wife escaped in the hollow trunk of a leaf-producing tree, while the water-goddess (Mactatepo) appeared pouring torrents of water upon them, and overwhealing others as they were going down.

Een Nepalese poet has scattered savage tribes in the Ganges, Humboldt found the tradition of a deluge common to them all—the Tamuames, the Maypures, the Indians of the Rio Vaccaro—but each giving their own distinctive colour to the story. The traditions, he says, "are like the tales of a vast shipwreck," and as such "are highly interesting in the philosophical study of our own species.... In the great continents, as in the smallest islands of the Pacific, it is always on the loftiest and nearest mountain that the remains of the human race have been saved; and this event appears the more recent in proportion as the nations are uncivilized, and as the knowledge they have of their own existence has no very remote date." This, we have no doubt, presents the true rationale of the subject, as to the diversity that appears in the accounts. The diversity, whether among the traditions of the Old or those of the New World, did not arise from an actual difference in the events, but from the one great event, of which they all spoke, assuming such distinctive shapes and forms as were given to it by the respective position and circumstences of each.

On the whole, therefore, there is as much confirmatory evidence of this great event as could well be expected. In vindication of the Mosaic narrative we are entitled to say, Here is a fact which in some form has impressed itself on the historical or traditional reminiscences of all nations; which is also not without analogical corroboration from physical appearances in the world's condition; and whether we can solve the incidental difficulties connected with it or not, we should shut our eyes to the strongest evidence if we were to bring into doubt the reality of the event. However little the scriptural narrative of it may enable us to answer all queries, or even to silence all objections that may be raised on the subject, yet it presents what, as far as it goes, is by much the most rational and satisfactory account of the matter, and—what is of special moment—the only one that renders an adequate reason for such a fearful catastrophe befalling the habitable world. For here, as generally in the historical accounts of Old Testament scripture, the moral element, by having the chief prominence assigned to it, distinguishes what is written from the traditional accounts of heathen antiquity. In these accounts the physical alone is brought distinctly into view; our attention is drawn merely to the singular natural phenomena, and to the remarkable incidents of danger or deliverance connected with them. But in the simple narrative of Moses, all takes its rise in the moral—on man's part, in the invertebrate corruption which had raged among the antediluvian race, and defied all remedial efforts of an ordinary kind—and on God's part, in the righteousness which could no longer allow the audacity of sin to proceed, but must substitute for abused mercy the severe inflictions of judgment. It is this which Scripture makes prominent, leaving other points in comparative obscurity: and the same prominence must be given to it still, if the sacred narrative shall be either rightly understood or properly used.

DEMAS, a professéd disciple and a friend of St. Paul—twice mentioned in his later epistles, as welling, along with others, salutations to brethren at a distance, Col. ii. 11; Phil. iv. 21—but in his last epistle presented under the mournful aspect of one who, through love of a present world, had broken the apostle's heart. It might be but a temporary falling from his steadfastness; but no later notice of his career has survived to correct the unfa- vorable impression which this naturally produces. Indeed, the tradition of subsequent times classes him among the apostates from the faith (2 Thess. iii. 12); but this probably arose from a too rigid interpretation of the words of the apostle.

DEMETRIUS, a Greek term, denoting a colony of Demeter, or Ceres, of frequent use among the Greeks, but in New Testament scripture occurring only twice. 1. The first person of the testimonial narrative in Ephesus, whose chief employment was the making of silver shrines for Diana; most probably silver models of the temple, or of its innermost chamber, with the image there deposited of the great goddess. The prospect of losing this trade by the conversions that were going on to the faith of the gospel, through the instrumentality of Paul, gave rise to a mighty commotion, which was headed by Demetrius, and which for a time placed the apostle in jeopardy, Acts xix. 23 (v. xix. 25).—2. The other Demetrius was a disciple mentioned in the epistle of John, as long well reported of by all men, and by the truth itself—that is, possessing a character so purely and transparently Christian, that it might be said to carry its own testimony along with it. 1 John 2. His place of residence is not stated; but if not at Ephesus, it must have been at some place in that part of Asia Minor.

DEMONEs. These are spoken of in all Scripture, from the Pentateuch to the Apocalypse; and under this or some equivalent name, they hold the most prominent place in the mythology of all heathen nations, both ancient and modern. "The gods of the heathen," says the psalmist, "are demons," Psa. xci. 7, 8. The heathens themselves give the same name to their religious beliefs and their sacrificial rites. The demon o baoivns is the object of their worship, bauivns, bauivns; the object of their worship itself, and bauivns, the worshipper. Thus, Favorinus, a philosopher of Adrian's time, who at different periods of his life resided in Rome and Greece, and the Lesser Asia, describes the religion of those nations indifferently as ev oivh aev oivh oivh, the fear of God or of demons. Xenophon, intending to commend the piety of Agasias, king of Sparta, says oivh oivh oivh oivh aev, he was ever a worshipper of demons. Festus, governor of Judea, as having no other idea of religion in Gentile or Jow, pronounces the nationalism of the Jews against Paul a question of their own demon-worship, πηλπίτα τῶν ἐν θρονώσιν. So also, the men of Athens, on hearing Paul preach Jesus and the resurrection, concluded that he was a setter forth of strange or foreign demons; and Paul in his turn, certainly without intention to compliment their piety, as Dr. Campbell seems to suppose, yet as certainly without thinking of saying what they could repel as false or recess as offensive, states it as his observation of them that they were δαιμονιάζοντες, not, as in the English Bible, "too superstitious"—as though it is opposed both to the etymological and the historical import—but addicted more than others to demon-worship. On this point it is only further necessary to add, that Scripture ascribes the same thing to the Israelites, in their frequent apostasies from Jehovah their God. "They sacrificed to demons and not to God, to gods whom they knew not; to new gods, that came newly up; when their fathers feared not," De. xxvii. 2; Le. xxi. 27; Ex. xvii. 2.

But now who or what were these demons whom the world worshipped? The question is not without difficulty, since, according to the spiritual and unseen world, they are not immediately objects of our knowledge, and the speculations of curious and inquiring, and the impostures of wicked and designing men, practising on the credulity of the ignorant or the imagination of the fearful, have had much to do in creating and upholding every theory or system of demonology which has prevailed. They are therefore in the main, as Scripture styles them, "a work of errors," and exhibit a mass of beliefs or opinions alike contradictory and absurd, and which it is at least as it is possible to attempt to distinguish or harmonize. Being, as we have seen, objects of worship, demons must have been believed to be, in some sense or after some sort, δεινοί. Indeed with the Greek, τό δεινόν, the divine, and τό δαιμονιω, the demonist or demonian, were synonymous terms; and of πάν, the gods, and of δαιμονίος, the demons suggested the same being. With the philosophers the name of demon (as from δαιμονίον, knowing), is used as the generic name of intelligent or spiritual beings. Thus Plato styles the maker of the world, τὸ δαιμονικὸν θεόν, the god of the gods (Timæus, Cratylus, 301), while in the same dialogue, Socrates is made to say, "every wise man that is a good man, is a demon, and rightly called a demon, whether he be alive or dead." But these men, as is also intimated in the same place, did not in this speak their own sentiments, but rather sought to accommodate their language to the belief or feelings of the vulgar; these, it may be presumed, were greatly less elevated and refined. For the most part demons were believed to hold an intermediate place between celestial gods and men, and to act as mediators, negotiating those affairs which it was deemed beneath the majesty of the greater gods to transact immediately with mortals. This is in substance the philosophy of the later Platonists, Apuleius and Plotinus, on this subject. The first of these authors, as quoted by Augustine, who treats of demons, with great learning, in his City of God, has thus described them: "In kind they are animal, in disposition passionate, in mind rational, in body aereal, in duration eternal, having the first three in common with us, the fourth peculiar to themselves, and the fifth common to them with the gods" (Augustine, Civ. Dei, liii. cap. xvi.) This, too, may be regarded as the popular creed, rather than his own, and according to it, demons are not distinguished from deceased and disembodied men. Indeed, immortality seems to have been regarded as the only distinction between gods and men. "What are men?" it is asked in a dialogue of Lucian. The answer is, "mortal gods." So πάντασαι. And again, "What are gods?" "immortal men," θεοί πάντασαι ἀθανάτοι. On these and similar grounds, it has been contended in modern times, that demons, in the idea of the heathen, were only "human ghosts," and also, were believed to be good and beneficent in their nature and agency (Sikes' Inquiry; and Farmer on Demons). It might not be worth while to advert to their views, but for the use to which they have applied them, of discrediting the Scripture doctrine of demons. Like other errors, they are true in part. Many who were worshipped as demons had been men—princes, heroes, or sages, who were deified or regarded as demons after death. The learned Joseph Mede, in treating of the identity of the saint-worship of Rome with the demon-worship of Rome pagan, shows that "the gods of the world men are after death." But he adds, that some were of higher degree, which had no beginning, nor were ever imprisoned in mortal bodies (works, p. 61). It is more likely, that instead of constituting by themselves a peculiar or distinct order, they should be supposed, on their delusion, to have been assumed into the fellowship of a higher, viz. a divine order of beings already existing. And this Farmer himself admits was, to a large extent, the view of heathen philosophers and of Christian fathers. That all demons were good and worthy men who in their deified state used their power only for good to their human kindred on earth, is not less contrary to all evidence. As the ideal representations of certain attributes and powers, of which men saw or felt the manifestation and effect, while the subjects or causes of them were invisible or unknown, how could they be otherwise conceived of than both as good and evil? Sikes says that Hesiod pronounces all the demons of the golden age to be good. But he is forced to say also, that πάντα οἱ υἱοὶ θεῶν, a certain evil demon, is as old as Homer. Indeed, Divinity itself, τὸ ἀριστερόν, is represented by Herodotus and Aristotle as ἀριστερόν τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς, virtuous and virtuous of the happiness of men (Her. 1:132); Apuleius (in Avis Cir. Dit) represents demons as subject to human views, and " eoos toutonum, haters of men; and Porphyry, a virulent enemy of Christianity, says that many of them are wicked and mischievous in the highest degree. "They commonly dwell and roam in places nearest the earth, in order to satisfy their lusts; there is no crime of which they are not capable; they do their utmost to keep us from the knowledge of the gods, and induce us to serve themselves: they assume the form of the great gods to seduce men; they make it their business to inflame their lusts, and set up themselves as great gods." And it may be asked here, how, if regarded only as good, and dispensers of good, can it be accounted for, that over ancient and modern heathen men have ever sought the aid of the real or pretended exorcist to rid them of the presence of their alleged benefactors? It is true, certainly, that from the mass of incoherent contradictions which are spoken about demons by the heathen, one may prove almost anything to have had a place in their beliefs. The philosophers, it may be allowed, had no faith in demoniacal existence; what they spoke or wrote of them was in concession to popular prejudice; and others believed anything or everything which fraud might invent, or fear might fancy. But, it is no logical consequence from this, as some have insisted, that demons are merely imaginary existences, and that nothing is true or known to be true, of them. The argument might with equal reason be alleged, to sanction the conclusion that there is no God, for all worthy ideas of his personality and attributes were overlaid and lost amid the dreams of pantheism, the follies of polytheism, and the negations of atheism. This were certainly too summary a process by which to reach so grave a result. We may for these reasons most warrantably conclude that any reliable information on these subjects, and indeed on every other relating to the world of spirits, has been lost, and in absence of revelation, could not be recovered. But, it might be maintained with some show of reason, that beliefs and practices which have spread so wide, and survived so long, had some beginning in truth— in some molder of primitive revelation, around which human deception, practising on human weakness, had gathered those superstitions accretions under which the truth had been buried. Some traces of this Scripture truth, strangely confounded and perverted, may be discovered among these superstitions beliefs. Gage (from the canon) refers to the origin of the supposed mediatory functions of demons to the constitution of the Son, as mediator between God and man; and though the common idea of their original, as the souls of men deceased, be different from that of the demons of Scripture, they closely resemble him in the ideas entertained of their subtle and curious nature, and their wicked and malignant influence.

For authoritative information on all that relates to their nature and origin, their sphere and agency, we must, in disregard alike of the ancient heathen and the modern rationalist, depend on the Word of God. And while that interpretation is frequently affirmed, we find their divinity in any proper sense denied, and the worship of them condemned and disallowed. They are spoken of as distinct from man and from God, as spiritual beings, so created originally, but now fallen from their first estate, banished in revolt against God, and using their power, under his control, both to corrupt and to deceive, to oppress and to destroy men. That there is our belief to whom this description applies, the authors before referred to, acknowledge, or at least have not deemed it prudent to deny. But they refuse to admit that demons are of the same order, or have any existence save in the superstitions imaginings of men. "There is," says Lardner, "but one devil;" and Dr. Campbell, who shows strong rationalistic leanings on this subject, says nothing can be clearer from Scripture, than that, though demons are immemorable, there is but one devil in the universe (gospel, 250). Now, every student of the Greek Testament knows, that as often as the name devils (plural) is applied in our version to spiritual beings, the original is not δαμαίον, but δαιμονία, not strictly devil, but demons. So far it is not possible to vindicate our version, but neither is it easy to justify the inference which is so dogmatically made from the original. Confessedly, the old serpent, the devil, and Satan are synonymous, Rev. xxi. 2, at least they variously describe the same being: as Satan, he is the adversary—as devil, he is the wondrous accuser—as the old serpent, he is the subtle tempter, the ſias, then under the names of Satan and Beelzebub he is called the prince of devils, Matt. xii. 24; Mark, xvi. 21, a title which our Lord concedes to him. And if this do not absolutely decide that, while the name of devil is peculiar to him, he shares the common nature of demons—seeing he is styled also the prince and god of this world and the ens of it—still it must be admitted to afford a strong presumption that it is so. There are angels, partners of his fall: there are demons, vessels of his kingdom. It may be these are distinct. Is it not more probable that they are the same in nature with one another, and also the same with their prince?

(1.) Our view is confirmed by the general testimony of Scripture, both respecting the devil and demons. If distinguished by these names respectively, they are on the other hand identified in general nature by the common name of spirits or spiritual beings. Thus the devil, the prince and god of this world, is called "the spirit which worketh in the children of disobedience," Eph. ii. 2. And demons and spirits are frequently used as convertible terms in many places of the New Testament scriptures, Acts x. 19; Acts x. 28; Acts xii. 23. That in these cases the term is applied personally, does not admit of doubt. The powers, properties, and actions of living personal agents are there ascribed to demons, not less than to the devil, and utterly baffles the theory which regards them as mere creations of the human mind. Thus it is said of demons, that "they believe and tremble," Acts xiv. 17. It is curious to see how Sykes disposes of this scripture: "It was, I suppose, from this text that the fathers said those things concerning devils which occur so frequently in their writings. Now admitting that the devil and his angels (devils then are his angels) did evil, the most that will follow is that here δασταίν is applied to evil spirits, and it will be granted that they have reason to tremble. But does it follow that, because in one of the places, δασταίν signifies devils, that evil spirits do, or are allowed to possess men and torment them with diseases?" The question for the present is, not whether they torment men, but simply what their nature is; and it is enough for us to accept the admission that δασταίν does here signify devils or evil spirits. This it is the scope of Dr. Sykes' inquiry to disprove. And indeed, he has no sooner made the fatal admission, than, faint to retract it, he says, "It may after all be interpreted of departed human spirits," which he hastes to show are, like bees, nothing in the world, but, for the occasion, must be thought after all to be capable, in the apostle's account, both of faith and fear.

(2.) Besides having in common a spiritual nature, the devil and demons have a common character. The devil is by influence—"the evil one," the imposition of wickeder, "a liar and a murderer from the beginning." Demons, again, are evil spirits, malignant spirits, lying spirits, spirits of wickedness (παραπαντικός de της ἀνοχής), Epp. vii. 12, and some are said to be "more wicked spirits" than others, Matt. xii. 24; as if there was exhibited among them every form and degree of evil.

(3.) They are league together in the prosecution of the same evil cause. The devil is Satan, the adversary of God and man; he deceiveth the whole world," he goeth about seeking whom he may destroy." Demons are called "spirits of error," "seducing spirits," 1 Ti. iv. 1, which oppress and torment men, Matt. xvi. 23, and moreover in every way seek their hurt and ruin, Rev. xi. 16; xii. 9. If it be objected that their alleged influence is not sensibly perceived, the argument holds equally against the agency of the one devil, as against that of the many demons; may, equally against the preacher and working of the Spirit of God in us. For, as Tertullian says, "neither is discovered in the act of working, which is invisible, but only in the effects of their work;" and if any will object, with Sikes, that their alleged activity in going up and down the earth in prosecution of their evil work, is contradictory to the statement that the angels which kept not their first estate are reserved in chains to the judgment of the great day, it may be answered that before this argument can have force, one would require to know what is the length of their chains.

(4.) Finally, both are spoken of as involved in the same dreadful scene; for the devil and his angels the everlasting fire is prepared. So, demons are said to tremble, as, in apprehension of coming wrath, they deprecate being sent into the abyss, the abode of darkness; and their ejection by the word of Christ and his apostles is hailed as a conquest over Satan and a forerunner of his fall. Dr. Campbell says that the utmost that can be deduced from all these things is, "that demons are malignant as under the devil, enduring perpetual torment, as the good cause, and perhaps of the number of these called his angels and made to serve as instruments." But he adds, "this is no evidence that they are the same." If not absolute proof of their generic identity, it is certainly decisive evidence of that near and strong affinity which may perhaps still leave room for some difference or inequality of original rank between them. Perhaps the words of Jesus, spoken with reference to the spirit or demon which his disciples could not cast out, i.e. in 7:18; Matt. 15:22; Luke 11:19, "their father," or race "cannot come forth by prayer," i.e., may countenance the idea that there are diverse kinds of them, as other scriptures, Rev. viii. 27; Eph. xi. 12, see, seem to intimate that among angelic natures there are gradations in order and influence. But at all events, seeing both have real personal and spiritual being, both are wicked and impure and lying spirits, both co-operating in the same work, as the tempters, and seducers, and tormentors of mankind, and both destined to fall before the power and suffer the vengeance of Christ, who came to destroy the devil and his works— their identity seems to be determined, in so far at least as their power and agency bear on the method of God's moral government, and its subjects are liable to be affected by them.

We may, however, briefly refer, in conclusion, to the words of the apostle before quoted, that the gods of the heathen are demons. In what sense is this to be understood, and how in its proper sense does it bear on the point now under consideration? Let it be admitted, as Farmer and others contend, that demons are to be considered as the spirits of the dead, how then can it be said, but with limited and partial truth, that these were the gods of the heathen? They shared their worship, but did by no means monopolize it; they worshipped also the sun, and moon, and stars, and almost every object in nature, animate and inanimate. And with whatever defective ideas of the divine nature and attributes, it must be admitted that in worshiping the work of their own hands, they professed through them to honor the one true God. This was the professed object of Jesraem's institution, as seen in 2 Chr. xii. 15.

And yet, notwithstanding, it is said that these priests were ordained, and this worship prepared for devils or demons. The worshippers intended it for the worship of God. God himself adjudged it to be for the service of demons. How should this be? If demons, like idols, be nothing, as some hold, they could not worship them in fact; it sometimes worshipped under the imagination that they were departed human spirits, they did not in these cases worship them even in fancy; and it only remains that they served them in effect, under the influence and in the service of that arch-deceiver and his deceitful allies, who turns all false worship, whether to the dead or to the living, to his own wicked and malignant ends of deception and destruction.

The doctrine of demons claims the submission of our faith in homage to the authority of Scripture. Its relations on the subject are confessedly scanty and obscure, and much variety of opinion may obtain respecting their precise meaning and amount. But to set down all that is said of demons, as many do, for "old wives' fables, a fragment of Gentile superstition, which Scripture, in imitation of the heathen sages, have preserved and perpetuated to our concession to their neglect, is certainly to impugn the authority of Scripture. After all, what difficulties attach to this subject which should urge upon us this issue? It may easily be shown that all that is taught concerning them is in harmony with rational theology. Why should we doubt the existence of other orders of intelligent and moral beings besides man? It were surely a narrow mind that would claim for him a monopoly of the rational creation. But if other such orders exist, can we, in the face of our own character and condition, hold it incredible, that among them, some should be fallen and depraved, and miserable as we are? We are naturally fain to think of these evils as limited and local, but in truth the great mystery lies less in their extent, than in their existence, at all, in the universe of God. That, possessing this evil nature, they should act in accordance with it, and use their powers as they have opportunity to spread the infection of their uncleanness and wickedness, is just what is seen in "evil men, and seducers, who wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived." It may be thought that, as belonging to another sphere of being, they have no access to us, and can have no influence upon us. But, may it not be, that the moral as well as the natural universe throughout is connected by common laws and common interests? Are not angels sent forth from God's presence to minister on earth to the heirs of salvation: is not the Spirit which God gives his people seen and known by his life-giving and blessed fruits in them, and are not, in like manner, the devil and his demon agency discovered in the strong delusions and grievous oppressions which, as we have seen, men have suffered, and do suffer, from their power? [Ref.]

DEMONIACS is the name given to men subject to the power of demons or evil spirits. These are spoken of as entering into, dwelling in, and possessing men: taking, seizing, using their bodily organs and their mental powers at their will, and subjecting them to almost every kind or form of bodily and mental malady which flesh is heir to. Thus, of the cases we read of in the gospels, one has a demon and is blind, his blindness being an effect of the demon's power; and so, another is dumb, another both deaf and dumb, another is bowed down or drawn together, and can in no way lift up herself, another is epileptic, and so on, showing their power over the senses and the whole body. Again we read of others who were frenzied, Matt. v. 15; of others who were hypochondriacs, Mar. vi. 22; and of some who were famous or indubitable, Mar. x. 15; showing further that mind as well as body, and in many instances mind and body both, were subject to this demoniacal tyranny. And again, we read of other cases in which they seem to have confused the malignant and unkind passions of their victims, as in the man who abode among the tombs, the man in the synagogue at Capernaum, Mar. 1:24; and Mary Magdalene, out of whom went seven demons. But however this be, the cases before referred to, sufficiently evince that they had power to subjugate the sensory and imaginative, and reason of men, and to be, if not directly their tempters and corrupters, their grievous tormentors and oppressors.

Which subject has been generally received as the substance of the Scripture testimony respecting the de-moniacs, who are so prominent in the gospel history.
But in these latter days some profess to have discovered that it is altogether a mistake; and hold, though without prejudice, as they profess, either to the reality of the evil which the demonized are said to have evaded, or to the marvellous power which they are said to have experienced, that the agency of demons in their sufferings is a groundless and superstition belief. Mele appears to have led the way in this direction (Westp. 29).
He was followed by Larner and Pike and Farmer, men of the School School. As Larner dogmatically pronounces that "there is but one devil," so Farmer pronounces with equal confidence that "there never was a demoniac among men," meaning by this term, what is generally understood by it, one who was really possessed and acted on by a demon. But the confidence of this assertion is by no means borne out by equal strength of evidence. The subject is confidently obscure and difficult. Demons cannot be perceived by sense; their influence, whatever it be in effect, is not distinguishable in its exercise from the operation of natural causes. And it will be admitted that the information which Scripture has given us respecting their nature and agency is not so full as to enable us to explain the difficulties, or remove the objections, psychological and moral, which it is so easy to find or make in connection with this, as with most other subjects. This however does not warrant the summary and scornful repudication of a series of recorded facts, of which, as most men have understood the Scripture, it not only fully details the phenomena, but constantly assumes and expressly assigns and declares the cause.

The explanation now proposed to be given of the case of demoniacs is, that "they are none other than such as we call madmen and lunatics. Madmen not ri morbi or of simple dotage, but by influence of malediction or malitia, from which they imagine, speak, and do things that are most absurd, and contrary to all reason, sense, and use of men; the difference between these beings, that a malediction is attended with fear, shame, silence, retirement, and the like symptoms;
malitia with rage, envy, and all manner of actions suitable." (See Mele's Works, p. 24; Sykes Inquiry, p. 28; and Farmer's Essay, sect. 4.) These forms and kinds of natural disease, they allege, cover and account for all the facts and phenomena which in the demonized, so called, have been generally ascribed to the agency of demons; this being, as Mele expresses it, "a mistake caused by the disguise of another name and notion than we conceive them by; they having been called demoniacs, as others have been called lunatics, though demons had no more influence upon the one, than the moon had upon the other.

Let us examine whether this theory is borne out by Scripture. The proof text which Mele lays as the ground and pillar of this theory is Mar. x. 24, which records the blasphemous words of the Jews, respecting Jesus, "He hath a devil, and is mad." "The latter word being" (as he holds) "an explication of the former." Try this interpretation upon Mar. iii. 22, where the same imputation is cast upon him, by substituting the one of these equivalent expressions for the other, and see how it will stand: "He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the demons casteth he out demons." Did the Jews here mean to repeat that he was mad, and to ascribe his miracles to his madness? do they not, in both instances, expressly refer the madness and the miraculous working, as effects, to the distinct cause of demoniacal agency?

In the first notice of demoniacs which occurs in the gospel history, they are named as a distinct class of suffering men: "They brought to him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with demonism (demoniacal or diabolical), and those that were lunatics, and those that had the palsy, and he healed them," Mat. x. 34. Here the demonized and the lunatic, whom the rationalistic theory will identify, are expressly distinguished. We find a case, already referred to, in which the demonized is also said to have been lunatic, Mat. xvii. 15; and another, in which he is said to have been maniac; and it is probable that such cases were frequent. But the right inference from this is, not that all lunatics or maniacs were demonized, or that they only were demonized who were subject to madness in some form; but that this was one only of many forms in which demons used their power over men. So far from being restricted to madness, as Mele and others assert, it is evident that the effects ascribed to demon influence include almost every form of disease, bodily and mental. Thus, of those who were possessed, some were blind, deaf, dumb, boiled down, a.l., without being, so far as is known, mentally disordered. Blindness and deafness could be no effect of madness or melancholy. Dumbness, or moody sullen silence at least, might possibly proceed from this cause, but in the case recorded it is expressly ascribed to organic obstruction, Mar. viii. 37. And for sight that appears, the daughter of Abraham in the synagogue, though the subject of an afflicted body, was the possessor of a sound mind, and we may hope of a devout heart.

But while, in these outward respects, demoniacs are assimilated to other sufferers, they are uniformly spoken of as specifically distinct. Thus, it is said of our Lord's miracles, that he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits, Luke vi. 23; vii. 2. So likewise, in his commission to the twelve disciples, it is said he gave them power and authority over all demons, and to cast all manner of disease, and all manner of spiritual and mental actions, under all manner of disease, Luke x. 19; Mat. x. 8; and so, in his commission to the seventy, comp. Luke x. with ver. 17-22, and again, after his resurrection, in his promise concerning his apostles, Mat. xvi. 17, and, in their discharge of their commission, they are said to have exercised their two-fold gift over these various forms of evil, Mat. xvi. 12.

The precise nature and amount of the distinction
thus marked between demoniacs and other sufferers
we may not be able altogether to ascertain, but some particular admission of being specified. The first and most obvious distinction is in the producing cause. We are now entitled to say that the passage which Mode adduces to disprove the agency of demons in these maladies is, so far as Jewish opinion goes, an express confirmation of it. "He hath a demon" that is the agent: "he is mad"—this is the effect though but one effect of many of the demon's presence and working: and this active cause is not once but constantly distinguished from the malady under which the demoniac suffers. Demons, as shown before see preceding article, are identified with evil spirits. (Compare Mat. xii. 22, 28; Luke xvi. 18, 26, 39; John xiv. 32, 37; Mark xvi. 21, 28, 20; Rev. xiv. 12-17; Rev. xv. 10, 12.) They are not therefore to be confounded with dead men, as with their ghosts: an idea which Sykes and Farmer persistently connect with everything that is said concerning them: for whatever might be the thoughts or sayings of the heathen about demons, or of Jews, like Josephus or Justin Martyr, whose views were assimilated to those of the heathen, this notion has no countenance from Scripture, and is not known to have prevailed among the Jewish people. Demons are those spoken of as personal, conscious, powerful, responsible agents, who perceive and understand, who hate and rage, who speak and act, and tremble. Our Lord always deals with them as such. Not only does he rebuke them, as he is said to rebuke the fever, or the winds and waves—which might be supposed to be in figure; but, what cannot be thus accounted for, he interrogates them as distinct from the possessed, and they reply to him through the organs of their victims;—he commands or restrains them also, as he sees occasion, and they obey him. "What is thy name?" he asks; and the unclean spirit answers, "My name is Legion, for we are many: and he, casting out all the demons, besought him," &c. There hath fallen prostrate at his feet a deaf and dumb child, and Jesus rebukes the spirit, saying, "Thou deaf and dumb spirit. I charge thee come out of him, and enter no more into him." Again, meeting from the tombs the wretched maniac whom no man could tame, Jesus, distinguishing between the man and the author or cause of his terrible malady, commands him, "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit." In all this, and much more to the same effect, our Lord does surely distinguish this one species of man's maladies from the rest, and ascribes the difference to the agency of intelligent and moral existences.

This is further confirmed by the effects which often accompanied their presence in the possessed. The first is the knowledge the demoniacs had of Jesus. We do not pry into the processes by which demons seized upon and appropriated the sensory of their victims. We have learned nothing from the philosophizing of others on this subject, and do not profess to be able to throw any light upon it ourselves. But whatever mystery be in the process, it cannot be questioned that in some way these demoniacs were in possession of knowledge not accessible to man. They knew Jesus to be the Christ, Mat. x. 34. Thus, the demoniac in the synagogue exclaimed of Jesus, "I know thee who thou art, the holy One of God;" and the Gadarene demoniac in like manner cried, "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God?" It may be said indeed that Christ's name was spread abroad, and that his works had already made him known. But his nature as the Son of God was not yet dreamed of;—his character as the holy One of God was not acknowledged. His office as the Christ was but guessed at. Much of this was spoken early in our Lord's ministry, Mat. xii. 22-24. At a much later period the people at large were still in profoundest ignorance and error concerning him. "Whom do men say that I am?" he asked his disciples long afterwards, and the answer was, "John the Baptist, but some say Elias, and others one of the prophets, Mat. xvi. 14-16. Even those who besought him for his mercy, choked after him, as "the Son of David," Mat. xvi. 13, x. 6, 15. Obviously then the demoniacs had some avenue to knowledge respecting his person as the Son of God, and of his office as the Christ, which others had not. It were preposterous to ascribe this to madness, which if it surprisingly revive and recall forgotten knowledge, certainly can impart none. Indeed, Scripture refers to it the indwelling demon, who may be reasonably presumed to have derived it from Satan their prince, who, in his encounter with Jesus in the wilderness, had discovered him to be the Son of God.

Another specialty to be noticed, which manifests the supernatural cause of this malady, is the invariable dislike and dread which the possessed had of our Lord. It was true of the demoniacs, as of the demons, that they did "believe and tremble." They do not appear ever to have come to Jesus of their own accord, but, with one exception, to have been brought to him by others. In that exceptional case, as in all the others, their antipathy and terror seem to have been extreme. "What have I to do with thee, thou Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God that thou torment me not," "Let us alone, what have we to do with thee, Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, the holy One of God," This intemperate sympathy with their oppressors, and their no less intemperate antipathy to and avoidance of their Deliverer, is something more and something worse than madness. It be-speaks the fascination of a fiendish power reposed to its utmost against its destroyer. It is indeed argued that as all this was expressed by the organs of men, it is arbitrary to ascribe it to any other agency. But men under mere natural influences could hardly be the subjects of these dispositions, and could not possibly been possessed of this supernatural knowledge. That the demoniacs so felt and spoke, is accounted for by the peculiarity of their condition, as subject to their oppressors, and subdued into sympathy with them in their views and designs.

Further, we find that Jesus has represented the casting out of demons as a necessary part of his own work. Very emphatically he sends this message to Herod, "I must cast out demons and do cures to-day and to-morrow," Luke xii. 32. He argues from his performance of this work to the truth of his mission, and the advent of God's reign: "If I by the finger of God cast out demons, then the kingdom of God is come unto you," Mat. xii. 28. And over their ejection by his disciples in his name, he rejoiced in spirit, as the beginning and earnest of the downfall of Satan's power, saying, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." 1

1 This identification of satanic and demoniacal interests is confirmed by Peter's description of our Lord's works, as "healing them that were oppressed with the devil," Acts x. 48.
How then shall all this be accounted for, if demoniacs were madmen of whatever sort? It has been said that Jesus takes no side in this question; that without participating the people's belief, he accommodated his language to it; and that as the error did not affect the end of his mission, he was not called upon to involve himself in disputes with them by opposing himself to their prejudices. But how dishonouring were all this to our Lord! as if, like the ancients, he practised the doctrine of reserve, or, like the moderates, allowed himself to use words in a non-natural sense, in order "to avoid disputes." But it is untrue in every particular. Can he be said to have taken no side, who so solemnly declared that he cast out demons by the finger and by the Spirit of God? Or can he be said to have withheld or disguised the truth, to humour the people or avoid offence, whose teaching throughout was in contradiction of the false opinions and in repose of the evil habits of men; and who, on this subject in particular, had only to repudiate the views held by the people, in order to silence their blasphemous and remove their offences. How, for example, when accused of having a demon and again, of casting out demons by the prince of demons—how could he have so factually submitted his language, if he had disseminated his opinions? His language, as by declaring openly and in terms that there was no demon in the case at all, that neither did demons, so called, suffer from their malice, nor were demons cast out by his power? It is worthy of remark further on this head, that our Lord held this language respecting the evidence and agency of demons, not to the people only, but also, from first to last, to his disciples. On sending them on his service, he gave them power and authority over all demons; and they on their return, as sharing the common belief, reported that even the devils were subject to them through his name. Now, it was given to them to know the mysteries of the kingdom; why they should have been kept and left in it, there could be no reason, even if others had been for a time kept in ignorance and error on this matter. For though it is sometimes protested that "this did not affect his mission, seeing it was no more his business to correct men's mistakes in psychology and medicine, than in astronomy," yet these men, when it suits them, hold a very different language. These beliefs, which our Lord is here allowed to have counterbalanced, or at least not to have repudiated, Farmer denominates as "in many respects of greatest prejudice to Christianity, and affecting the foundation on which the gospel is built" (Essay, chap. iii. 29, sect. 1; a statement which we of course do not admit, but which, as liable to be made, it is all the more incredible that our Lord should not have expressly condemned the errors that have leaped it to.

Farmer chooses to refer this language to our Lord's cure of the possessed in general, saying that "all the discourse was spoken of by the Jews as opposed by an evil spirit, or not opposed by demons of such there is no mention." (p. 43). But why should the apostle, in speaking to Gentiles (Acts x. 18), be supposed to have agreed according to Jewish opinions, which Farmer regards as blasphemy?—for such he pronounces the opinion that the devil has the power of disease. Is it not every more likely that the apostle intended to connect the oppression upon men, ascribed to the Jewish spirit, with that malignant and tyrannical dynasty, σατανασίας εκ τῆς ἑβαγείας, of which Scripture everywhere represents the devil as the prince and head(1 John x. 10, 20; Mark iv. 11, 15).

Various objections are made against the doctrine of demoniacal possession—some on particular, others on general grounds. Thus, (1) the case of the Gadarene, for example, is said in its details to be strange and incredible. It is acknowledged that there are difficulties, both psychological and moral. But they are obviously referrible to the imperfect knowledge we have of the relations between the spiritual and material systems; and besides, they apply in great part equally to the transaction, whether as caused by demons or by mere physical agency. This holds at least of the destruction of the swine, and of our Lord's permission given, or rather, as it must have been, if demons were not concerned, his own active agency put forth to effect it. Also, their depreciation of his command to go out into the deep, or the alab. or τὰς ἄλλας ἀγγέλους, has no conceivable reference to the theory of natural insanity, while it is in agreement with the threatened doom of demons, Matt. x. 28, with which it may be supposed they were acquainted, and if so, might well fear and depurate.

(2) An objection of a more special form is alleged against the possible truth of demoniac power over men, as underlining the evidence of miracles in general, and of all miraculous cures in particular. If demons can inflict disease, it is the interpolation of a power subservient to the system of nature; how can miracles indicate the immediate hand of God? But the answer is not difficult. They do not mark the immediate hand of God—they mark a supernatural power, but what or whence this power is, it requires something more to determine. In all these cases there was not only a contrast in the work of demons and the work of Christ the one malignant, the other beneficent; but there was, moreover, a contest and a triumph, exhibiting the power of demons as subject, and the power of Christ as supreme. The few instances in which miracles were baleful, as in the blinding of the father and the blinding of Elymas, were accompanied with circumstances which readily distinguish them in the consciences of men as the righteous infliction of divine judgment.

(3) It is stated, as a serious difficulty, that the phenomena and facts ascribed in Scripture to demoniacal possession, should have been confounded to the Jewish people, and also to the time of our Lord's sojourn among men; and still more, that notwithstanding all this, the Jews do not seem to have looked upon it as anything strange, nor has it been taken notice of in the history of other people. On these grounds, Mode (Works, i, 29) and Sykes (Preface to Inquiry) openly repudiate the "story of the gospel" as it has been generally understood. In reply we say that this must stand on its own evidence, nor may its express and positive testimony be affected by negations like these. Besides, it is far from certain that any part of these allegations are well founded. If it be meant that heathen nations had not the same theory of demons as the gospel history reveals, this is admitted. But if it is said that they had no belief, and among them was no mention of demoniac influence, it is so far from true, that Menander states it as the common belief that "A demon bestrides every man" άναγερωπότατον, in the Greeks, the ἀρχέον and ἄρχον among the Latins, alleud so many kinds of demoniacs. That Scripture is silent on the subject previous to our Lord's time, can only be affirmed by men who persist in putting meanings on words and statements different from their obvious import. We read there of "lying spirits" in prophecies, 2 Th. xiii. 21, of "seducing spirits" in kings, 2 Ch. xxxii. 21; of "the unclean spirit in the land," or among the people, Ze. xxi. 2; and of evil spirits, producing the like physical and moral delusion in their victims, which is seen in the gospel demoniacs, Jn. xxi. 23; 18. xxi. 14-26. No doubt there are attempted to be explained away. In the case of Saul, for example, it is held sufficient to exclude anything supernatural, that an evil spirit "signifies an evil temperament or disposition, and does not necessarily mean anything else here. Admitting this, and that if the case had stood alone, we might have so received it, does not the antithesis between the Spirit of the Lord departing from Saul, and the evil spirit entering into him, mark a succession of agencies rather than of dispositions? At any rate, seeing the producing power bears the same name, and its agency produces the like effects in him as in the New Testament demoniacs, is not the conclusion at least entitled to the cases are specifically the same? This is enough to show that demoniac possession existed before our Lord's time. His words distinctly imply that it should continue after him also. When he promises to give power to his disciples to cast out demons, Mk. xvi., as himself had done, it is certain there should be demons in men, against whom this power should be employed. Accordingly, in the execution of their mission, as we read, Ac. xi. 15-16, xix. 12, his apostles met with men possessed by evil spirits, and cast them out in the name of Jesus. The history of the first ages of the church is full of the memorials of abounding demoniacs, which, though blended with a world of delusion and imposture, it is not easy wholly to discredit, in face of the express and solemn testimony of the Christian fathers generally.

In our own time the evil and the remedy are alike ignored. To a great extent, the being and agency of the "one devil," "the spirit who now worketh in the children of disobedience," is disregarded and forgotten. Also may not the disregard of the one as well as of the other proceed from the same cause—the prevlance of the spirit of unbelief, which leads us to look for a natural cause of all spiritual phenomena, whether good or evil? There are undeniably many phases of human character and experience, which suggest the question whether they be not an effect of demoniac influence—a suggestion which it is much easier to deny or dilute than to confront. At all events, Scripture affirms that this power shall be at work in the last days, reproducing the like effects in men, Rev. xiv. 11; xx. 3.

It is certain, then, that the power of demons was not restricted to our Lord's time, and to the Lord's people. It is not altogether certain that it was even more prevalent then and there, than in other times and places. That more attention should have been drawn to it, may be accounted for in another way. So long as the evil was hopelessly beyond remedy, little would be said of it, more than of any other endemic visitation. But when the remedy was found—not only alleged but proved in the experience of many, and in the sight of all—it became naturally the wonder of the time. In our Lord's day exorcists swarmed, both among Jews and Gentiles, who practised their art by mystical incantations and with doubtful efficacy. But when He with authority commanded the unclean spirits and they obeyed, what wonder men should exclaim, "What a word is this!" and that the evil itself should acquire, though not a greater prevalence, yet a greater prominence in the public eye. Or if the fact were otherwise, and the victims of the spiritual tyranny, besides being more conspicuous, were also more numerous and more oppressed than before or since, why need this be deemed either improbable or unworthy? Other forms of affliction have had their day and place as well as this. If the fact were, as seems likely, that about these times men were more addicted than ordinary to sorcery and divination, Ac. xix. 19, might not this, according to the rules of divine judgment, have provoked this special visitation? Or, can it be thought unnatural, that with the knowledge that their time was short, the evil spirits should then, so far as permitted, have thus put forth their malice and activity to the uttermost? Or, as regarded our Lord and the ends of his mission, what was so fitted to confirm his claims, and to illustrate his work in the eye of a sense-bound people, as the opportunity thus afforded for the manifestation of his power over the enemy? The demoniacs recovered by his word to a sound body and a right mind, were more convincing trophies of his power, and more palpable representatives of his work, than were his own disciples, in whom the effect of his influence was chiefly inward and spiritual. Hence, as we have seen, he once and again refers to his casting out of demons, not simply as one of his other miracles, as the proof of his divine mission in general, but as special evidence of his work and errand, as manifested to destroy the works of the devil, and to establish his own kingdom of grace. We may therefore treat with contempt Farmer's sarcasm on this subject, that this view turns the era of our Lord's advent into one of more grievous oppression to men. If the oppression were greater, it had its judicial cause in the sins of men, while our Lord's immediate agency was all directed to restrain and lessen it; and the rest, if ought remain, is to be explained on the same principles which determine the unequal or varying distribution of all other evils. But the reasons of this dispensation lie to a great extent beyond our reach, and we presume not to pronounce with confidence in regard to them. Some, as Trench, would connect them with the punishment or rebuke of sin, and this may be admitted of it in the general, as of every other form of human suffering. But we are not warranted to ascribe these more than other afflictions to any special sin or sinfulness in the individual sufferers, Lu. xiii. 1-5. The case of the hunchest, whom the spirit had taken "from a child," seems to forbid us to put this construction upon them. We may not doubt, however, that like all God's ways of dealing with men, it was meant to serve the great ends of moral discipline. Although it might appear, like insanity, so to overbear the reason, and conscience, and will, as to suspend responsibility, it can be readily understood to have formed the most important exercise of the principles and dispositions of all with whom those " vexed with the devil " were related in social and family bonds, as in the beautiful and blessed example of the woman of Canaan and her daughter. And in some whatever way, or to whatever effect, all affliction, including insanity itself, subserves the great moral purpose of human life, the same end might be equally accomplished by the worst and most violent assaults of the demon's power.

DENARIUS, ten asses, rendered in the English Bible, though rather unhappily, a penny. Taking into account the difference in the value of money in the gospel age as compared with present times, a shilling would have been the nearer equivalent—although in reality its metallic worth from about the time of Augustus was only sevenpence halfpenny. Before that time it had been worth a penny more. But as it was the full day's wage for a labouring man, Matt. xix. 2, and a soldier got even somewhat less, it must ordinarily have commanded a larger supply of the necessaries of life, not only than our penny, but even than our shilling. Some have supposed that the re-bułcation in the weight and value of the denarius above noticed did not take place till the time of Nero; but this seems doubtful.

From the allusion in Matt. xxvi. 19 it is plain that the coin then bore the image and superscription of the emperor; in earlier times the symbols of the republic were impressed on it. (See Penny.)

DEPUTY is the term used in the English Bible for personal Gr. ἀριθμός, the highest local governor in those provinces which were in the hands of the Roman senate, Acts vii. 4, &c. It is once used in the plural, Acts xvi. 25, in the speech of the town-clerk of Ephesus: "There are deputies, let them impart one another the errors by which it is not to be understood, with some advocates, or persons to conduct the causes, but procurers to deliver judgment. Not that there were more than one in that part of Asia; but the work generally of such is referred to, or perhaps the assessors in judgment are included.

DERBE, a city of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor, and manifestly not far from Lystra, with which it is sometimes associated, Acts vii. 4, &c. Paul and Barnabas found protection there when driven from Pisidia, and it was the town of Cains, one of the Christian delegates to Jerusalem, Acts xvi. 1. But the exact site is unknown. Commonly it is placed south of Lystra; but this it could scarcely be, if, as Strabo states, it was almost within Cappadocia (viii. 500). Three different sites have been suggested by modern travellers; one of them on the lake ἴλος, which Wieseler adopts. But there is as yet no certainty. (See Lystra.)

DESERT is scarcely distinguished in ordinary language from wilderness, although the latter may be regarded as the stronger term, importing either a more extensive or a more intense form of the drought and desolation involved in the idea. In the English Bible, however, the terms are used indiscriminately, and sometimes the one, sometimes the other, is given as the rendering of wadyir (סִינָר), which is the word most commonly employed in the original. The word is derived from a root that signifies to lead to pasture (ἄδημος), and hence the primary meaning of wadyir is pasture-land, a tract fit for the feeding of flocks. This in the East is very commonly an extensive plain or steppe, which, during the drought and heat of summer, becomes utterly parched and bare; so that the transition from pasture-land to desert was, in such regions, quite easy and natural. That the word comprehends both the meanings now mentioned—the former as well as the latter—may be perceived even by an English reader from such passages as Ps. lxx. 13, "They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness," (wildir); and Joel ii. 22, "The pastures of the wilderness do spring." In other passages the desert is spoken of as rejoicing, and again as being dried up, Isaiah xxv. 10. But in many, and indeed the greater number of passages, the idea of sterility is the prominent one, especially where what is emphatically the desert or wilderness, the great wilderness, is spoken of, Deut. iv. 20; Ps. lx. 13, &c. And the term is used in comparisons with exclusive reference to this import: as in Job, vi. 31, "Have I been a wilderness to Israel?" Hos. ii. 3, "Make her as a wilderness, and set her like a dry land.

Another term in the original, wadyir (סִינָר), is also rendered by desert or wilderness. This term primarily meant ἄδημος, but not plain in the sense of pasture, rather that of hollow or level ground, and specially the level into which the valley of the Jordan runs near Jericho, an immense plain extending all the way to the Red Sea. This was the wadyir, of which the word is very often specifically used (Ps. i. 11, Job xii. 11), hence also "sea of the wadyir or desert," Jer. iv. 26, viz. the Dead Sea, Acts i. But the word also signifies desert generally, as in Ps. xxxii. 3, Jer. x. 12, &c.; for the same reason as in the former case, because plains in such countries as Arabia and Palæstine are sure to become for a considerable part of the year arid heaths, and also because what went more particularly by the name of the wadyir was of a singularly bare and sterile character.

DEUTERONOMY, THE BOOK OF. 1. Name and Contents.—The fifth and concluding book of the Pentateuch is in Hebrew named from the words with which it opens: צִיוֹן צִיוֹן (Zion haddorim), "these are the words," but by the LXX. ἀκαρπίαν, "the second," or rather, "the repeated law," to which corresponds the rabbinical name שָׁמַיִם (Mishnah), or more fully שָׁמַיִם וְנַעֲצִית (Michael Huttendorf), "repetition," or "repetition of the law." The book consists principally of a series of discourses addressed by Moses to Israel, when they had reached the confines of the Promised Land, Deut. i.—iii.

Amid various divisions that might be taken of the discourses, we present the following:

1. Four parting addresses of Moses to the assembled Israelites in the plains of Moab, ch. xxxiv. vii.—

(1.) An address, wherein he recapitulates the history of the wanderings through the wilderness, as an encouragement for obedience to the law, and a warning against apostasy, ch. i. ch. i.

To this is added a notice of the three cities of refuge which Moses had set apart on the east side of Jordan, and of Israel's possessions there, ch. iv. 40.

2.) A second address, wherein he notices the giving of the law, and adds many earnest and paternal cautions to obedience, ch. v.—viii.
DEUTERONOMY

(3.) In the third discourse he introduces various modifications and more specific directions with respect to several previous ordinances and encomiums, and some altogether new, ch. xxiii.-xxx.

(4.) In the last he lays down the advantages as well as the duty of observing the law, by presenting to the people the blessing and the curse, preparatory to their renewing the covenant with Jehovah, ch. xxxiv.-xxxv.

2. Then follows a notice of the committal of the book of the law to the keeping of the priests, with the lawyer's charge to them, and his song, ch. xxiii.-xxviii, xix., to which are added.

3. Three appendices: (1.) Announcement to Moses of his approaching death, ch. xxiii. 48-52; (2.) his blessing on the tribes of Israel, ch. xxiv.; and (3.) an account of his death, ch. xxviii.

Deuteronomy is thus seen to be a recapitulation both of the history and the laws of the middle books of the Pentateuch, in the form of paternal exhortations, rather than with legislative authority, urging a willing and unresisted obedience to all the precepts and commandments of Jehovah, and a faithful adherence to his covenant. A circumstance which must have greatly added to the solemnity of the occasion was the full consciousness of the speaker, that his own death must precede the enterprise to which, in the first instance, he encouraged his hearers, viz. their taking possession of the land, ch. iii. 24-27. He, in fact, contemplated his own departure as an event near at hand, ch. xxxi. 2, an anticipation which the close of the narrative shows to have been steadily realized. The admonitions now addressed to Israel took generally a twofold direction: First, a warning against idolatry, ch. xi. 14-18; xvii. 7-13; and secondly, against a spirit of self-righteousness, ch. xix. 21-22; dispositions to which, as their subsequent history but too plainly shows, the Israelites as a people were most prone. This twofold character of his parting exhortations accordingly furnishes a clear proof how intimately the lawyer was acquainted with the peculiar predispositions of his people, ch. xxvii. 20-29, and an indication of the prophetic spirit with which he spoke.

II. Its Relation to the preceding Books.—The connection between Deuteronomy and the other books of the Pentateuch is very apparent. The contents, historical and legislative, of the three books which immediately precede it are recognized throughout, and in fact constitute its great theme. Yet there are important variations and additions, from which rationalists and others take occasion to deny the identity of its authorship with that of the other books, even when they agree that these could not have been the productions of Moses. The additions and variations found in Deuteronomy, so far, however, from constituting contradictions in respect of the earlier books, or in any way yielding support to the conclusions of the "document" criticism, admit of satisfactory explanation from the special and distinct aim of the author, as apparent from the work itself, and from the altered position of Israel at the time of its composition at the close of their wilderness life.

Variations, of which there are numerous instances, in respect to the order and the fulness of historical matters, can be accounted for from the hortatory style, and the object of the writer when recording his discourses. The circumstances were such as called only for a general reference to some transactions, the character and relations of which might be safely assumed as already well known to the parties addressed and so admitted of the clashing together of incidents having a common character, without much regard to strict chronological order. Thus the rebellions of Israel against Jehovah at Taberah, Massah, and Kibroth-hattaavah, are mentioned in connection with the idolatry at Sinai, ch. ix. 22-28, but without in the least warranting the conclusion that the author considered these events as nearly contemporaneous, or as following in the order in which they are here enumerated. But even in instances of this kind the departures from the chronological order is often more apparent than real. It is objected, for example, that the command to remove the encomium precedes the appointment of the captains, ch. i. 13. De Wette says verses 6-8 are put too early; and this appointment of captains, it is also alleged, the writer of Deuteronomy contended, ver 16, with the institution of the seventy elders, Nu. xi. But the order for the removal of the camp and its fulfilment are clearly distinguished; and not less so are the appointments of the captains and the judges, both of which took place prior to the departure from Sinai, Ex. xiii. Sometimes, indeed, variations of this kind serve to throw light on particulars incidentally touched on in the more specific accounts of the preceding books. Thus the command, De. ii. 24, 27, not to disturb the Amorites, but to pass by their border, so far from contradicting the notice that "the border of the children of Ammon was strong," Nu. xiii. 24, rather explains this peculiar reference. The separation of the Levites to their sacred offices at first sight would seem to be transferred to a time subsequent to the death of Aaron, ch. xi. 11; but a closer investigation at once removes such a misapprehension. The expression "at that time" refers to the time when Moses deposited the tables of the law in the ark, ver. 5. The reference to the time of the aube at Sinai pervades the whole section, and is only departed from parenthetically as regards Aaron's death.

The additions of an historical nature consist partly in the greater prominence which the writer gives to matters which in the earlier books were omitted as self-evident, and partly in the appending of particulars, which, while necessary for the purpose of the writer, exhibit the most minute acquaintance with the Mosaic times and history (Kel, Einleitung, p. 111). Additions of the first kind are the command to break up from Horæb, De. i. 4, 7, comp. Nu. xi. 11; the notice "Ye abide in Kadesh many days," ch. i. 46; the repetition of Israel, ch. i. 45, of which no mention is made in Nu. xiv.; Moses' intercession for Aaron, ch. ix. 28, of which there is no notice in Ex. xxxii.-xxxvii. Additions of the second kind are: the command not to distress the Moabites or war with them, ch. ii. 3, 19; not to meddle with the Edomites, but when passing through their territories to purchase bread and water, ch. ii. 14; the historical notices of the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir, and of the countries at the Mosaic period in possession of the Moabites and Ammonites, ch. ii. 10-12, 25-27; notice of the sixty fortified cities in Bashan, ch. iii. 4, 6; the different names of Horem, ch. iii. 5; more specific details of the attack of the Amalekites, ch. xxv. 17, 18, than in the narrative in Ex. xiii. 18.

The more important variations and additions belong, however, to the legislative sections. Some particulars of this character are entirely new—as the appointment of the three trans-Jordanic cities of refuge, ch. iv. 43-44, directions concerning which had been given in Nu. xxxv. 11, while the command to set apart three cities on the other side is only repeated, De xxv.8. So also the law as to the appointed place of public worship, whither all sacrifices, offerings, and tithes must be brought, ch xxv.2, with the repeal of the law which required that animals destined for food should be slaughtered nowhere but at the sanctuary, Ex xxvi.33; laws with respect to the tithes appointed for sacrificial seasons, Ex xii.11; xv.2; xxv, false prophets, enticers of the people to idolatry, and such as might be so enticed, ch xiii; on royal functions, ch xiii.11, the functions and authority of the prophetic order, ch xviii.13,46, on war and military service, ch xxi, on the mode of expiating murder, the perpetrator of which was unknown; on female divinities, the right of a first-born son; the punishment of disobedient and obstinate sons, and the hanging or exposure of the bodies of criminals after execution, ch xxvi; on uncleanness and the rap in of a virgin, ch xxvii.2; on divorce, ch xxix.1,4; various minor laws, ch xxx.3-4, xxvi.18; the form of thanksgiving to be used on presenting the first-fruits and tithes, ch xxvii. While in general the laws of the preceding books are only partially repeated and pressed anew, there are some, as for instance that regarding Hebrew slaves, Ex xv.1-2; comp with Ex xx.24, which are extended. For certain cases of war, the authority of Moses is given over ten commandments in Deut. v.6-21, as compared with Ex xx.1-17, see under Deuteronomy.

None of these variations and additions, whether historical or legislative, is, however, of a kind to warrant the assertions of De Wette and Delitzsch, that "the Mosaic history seems to be more remote from the author of this book than it would be from one who wrote down an historical narrative," and that "the laws are new, not only in respect to the time in which they are alleged to have been given, but in respect to their more modern character." On the contrary, the particulars just referred to afford the clearest evidence of personal acquaintance with all the facts of the Mosaic history, and of an authority to make such additions to and modifications in the Mosaic laws as the altered circumstances required. The references which De Wette detects in these laws to later times and institutions originate either in his misinterpretation of the passage, as when he discovers, in ch xiii, xvi.1-7 and xix.23-29, the parallels to the Mosaic code, in his dogmatic preconceptions with respect to the canon of prophecy, on which ground he objects too, ch xiv.14-20; xviii.9-22.

2. The legislation of Deuteronomy as related to that of the earlier books requires some additional consideration. As the historical notices of this book presuppose the transactions detailed at length in the preceding history, so also its legal institutions give evidence of prior enactments. The Israelites are here introduced as already in the possession of laws and ordinances of a civil and religious character. That God through Moses had given them special commandments at Sinai in regard to the various matters of duty, ch i.16, is the fundamental idea of the whole of these Mosaic discourses. But it is of importance to notice the particular aspect in which the law is here presented. As remarked by Havermick, "instead of the letter with its legal obligation adverse to all development, which finds in itself the ground of its higher necessity, reflection upon the law here prevails, and even the letter is in this way brought home more to the heart as it were to the conscience, or as in Deut. x.19. To love God is in particular represented as the end and fulfillment of the law, ch vi.15; x.12. This, as an element recognized even in the deadene itself, where it is made the true ground of obedience, Ex xx.10, assumes in Deuteronomy its right place. In other particulars also there is a marked prominence given to the spirit of the law as contrasted with the mere letter—a circumstance which has caused this book to be quoted more largely by the prophets than any other portion of the Pentateuch. The prophetic discourses of Jeremiah and Ezechiel in particular are formed very much upon the model of the addresses and exhortations of Moses to Israel in the plains of Moab. So great indeed is the resemblance between Deuteronomy and the writings of Jeremiah, that it has furnished grounds to the impugners of its genuineness to ascribe its composition to that prophet. Further, as shown under the preceding head, various laws contained in the former books are partly repeated and enlarged anew, partly modified, rephrased, or enlarged, and even repealed along with, the view of suitting them to the changes in Israel's circumstances, and the new aspect of affairs arising from the approaching settlement of the people in their new homes, and the creation of a migratory life with its encumbrances. Compare for instance De. xv.17, with Ex. xxi, 7, and De. xii. with De. xvii. These modifications entirely accord with the spirit and object of the law; but while they are a very strong proof of the credulity of the whole history of the Pentateuch, and particularly of the truthfulness of the wilderness sojourn, they are such as required the authority of the lawgiver himself; for there is a strict prohibition in the book itself against adding to or taking away from the law, ch iv.21. No subsequent writer of Scripture assumes the authority of making such modifications in the law as is done by the writer of Deuteronomy. Still this is not a new legislation, or even a continuation of the preceding; it is the Sinaitic legislation enforced anew, and where necessary adapted to the changes which had emerged at the close of the forty years' wandering."

III. Its Prophetic Announcements. The prophetic character of Deuteronomy is distinctly marked. Moses was fully conscious of his own prophetic standing; for he designates himself as a prophet, and the representative of the great Prophet that should in due time be raised up to comfort his people. All the prophetic endowments of the speaker are apparent throughout his discourses, which show much fuller references to the future than any other portion of the Pentateuch. The intimations regarding Israel's future, with which the book of Leviticus closed, are here more largely developed, comp De xxviii with Le xxvii. In both these passages expression is given to the twofold aspect of Israel's future, which presented itself to the eye of the seer, and the precise character of which was, as they were distinctly warned, dependent on their relation to the law. The description of the curse, the consequence of disobedience, is much more copious in De. xxviii.15-69 than in the closing address on the Sinaitic legislation — a circumstance probably owing to the discoveries made in the interval of Israel's proneness to apostasy. However this may be, it is evident to the seer that all these threatenings and admonitions shall prove insufficient for securing obedience, and that the result will be a dispersion of his people among the nations of the earth, ver 23, 37, and at a subsequent period, after a restoration from dispersion and exile, their subjection..."

to a close and severe siege within their gates by a nation brought "from far, from the end of the earth," ver. 10-12, followed again by their being "plucked from off the land" given them for a possession, and their dispersion among all people, ver. 36, 61. Yet in the midst of all these threatened calamities, the continued existence of Israel is not only assumed, but is thus prophetically secured; and in the preservation of the people is involved the possibility of the removal of the curse itself, by a new constitution opposed to the character of the law, or in some way satisfying its requirements; for though the curses of the law on the disobedient cannot cease of themselves, but remain "for ever," ver. 16, yet they may be removed by some countervailing power. The concluding intimation of this solemn exhortation, "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way wherethrough I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again," ver. 16, is of similar import with the sentence passed upon man after the fall, commanding him to return to the dust out of which he was taken, Gen. ii. 15. This return to Egypt was an intimation of the cessation and destruction of the development and the history of Israel as a nation, which commenced with their redemption from Egypt, see De. xviii. 18, and has no reference whatever to any literal return to that land (see Baumgarten, Theolog. Comm. ii. 322).

These predictions by the lawgiver of the future of his nation, so remarkably verified, as all must admit, in their history, are continued in ch. xxx. and xxxii., accompanied with the assurance that when in their state of dispersion they return to the Lord, He "will return to his captivity" (ס筼 ע"ש ש Codable, as Hengstenberg (Authent. i. 201-206) renders it, and will gather them, ch. xxx. 1-5, perfecting their salvation by changing their disposition, ver. 6, 10. There is here plainly expressed what was hitherto only a matter of inference from the fact of the purposed preservation of this people. The prophet further discoursed in the blessings awaiting Israel the accomplishment of a purpose of old, shadowed forth in the partition of the countries of the earth among the sons of Adam—an arrangement which had a special reference to the Israelitish people, De. xxxii. 8. Finally, the conclusion of Moses' prophetic song may be regarded as a summary of the whole law and prophecy: " Rejoice, O ye nations with his people; for he (Jehovah) will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be meriful to his land and his people," xxxii. 11. This, which was in a manner, the dying testimony of the lawgiver, is abridged by St. Paul, Rom. xiv. 19, as a proof of the participation of the Gentiles in the blessings of the covenant-people, and an interest in all that affects their prosperity. Such a testimony, while corresponding with the promises made to the patriarchs, and with what had been proclaimed respecting the purposes of the theocracy, Ex. xxii. 6, evinced the unity of spirit which characterizes the Pentateuch, and is the more important, as concluding the Mosaic legislation, and proving that, in the estimate of the lawgiver himself, it had not that exclusive character which a mere external acquaintance with it is sometimes ready to assume.

But while Deuteronomy thus distinctly points to the future, it supplies proofs of the fulfilment of earlier prophecies. Thus, for instance, in the notice of the "terebinth of Moreh," ch. xi. 29, to which Moses points as the termination of Israel's journeyings, there is a remarkable, because tacit, reference to Ge. xii. 6, from a comparison with which it appears that at length Israel will be conducted to the very place where Abraham first set himself down in Canaan; thus intimating also that the time of wandering and banishment foretold to the patriarch, Ge. xv. 13-16, as appointed for his posterity, was now exhausted.

IV. Its Genuineness and Credibility—Deuteronomy furnishes less room than any other book of the Bible for the application of that criticism which, under the name of the "document" or "fragment hypothesis" (see Genesis), would reduce the Mosaic writings to a congeries of the works of different authors and ages. Even the most sceptical of these critics allow that, with the exception of some unimportant interpolations, as they term them—according to De Wette, ch. iv. 41-43, x. 6-9, xxxii. 1—Deuteronomy is the production of one author; while not a few, as Delitzsch, Davidson, and others, who strenuously dispute the Mosaic origin of the other books of the Pentateuch, admit that Moses may have written this book. Indeed, so plainly and repeatedly does the work itself set forth its Mosaic authorship, ch. i. 17; xxxii. 5; xxxii. 19, that, with the exception of course of the section which records the lawgiver's death, or as Hengstenberg supposes, all after ch. xxxii. 23, which, although part of it was written by Moses, as the song, ch. xxxiii., and probably the blessing on the tribes, xxxii., seems to have been appended by the continuator—that it must so received, or its testimony both on this and all other matters rejected altogether, for in such a case as this the question of the authenticity of the work is completely involved in that of its genuineness. These direct testimonies respecting the author are fully borne out by the character of the composition, which manifests throughout, as Moses Stuart remarks, after Eichhorn and Herder, "the earnest outpourings and admissions of a heart which felt the deepest interest in the welfare of the Jewish nation, and which realized that it must soon bid farewell to them" (O. T. Canon, p. 16, Lect. 119). The modifications of the earlier laws could, as already remarked, have proceeded only from the hand of Moses himself, and in these again are indisputable proofs of the authenticity of the work, but particularly in the fact that it was committed to the keeping of the priests as a sacred deposit of the nation, with an injunction that it should be publicly read at their solemn convocations, ch. xxxii. 9-12.

Even some of the contradictions and anachronisms which the opponents of the genuineness allege with respect to this book, furnish, when carefully examined, important testimony in favour of its Mosaic authorship, as also and more especially of its historical credibility. It has been already shown how some additions to, and variations from, the accounts of the preceding books—which, by De Wette and others, are designated contradictions—serve to supplement, and so to clear up, statements presenting some obscurity in the earlier books. The same is also found to be the case in various other instances. Thus, with respect to the mission of the spies, which proved such a source of temptation to Israel, manifesting indeed in its conception the greatest distrust in their divine leader, it appears from ch. i. 22 that the proposal originated with the people themselves, while in Nu. xiii. 2 the thing, as may at first appear very strange, is stated to have been commanded by Jehovah. There is, however, not only no contradiction between the two statements; but, on the contrary, the one obviates a difficulty which, from the very nature of the proposal, is presented by the other. The proposition proceeded from the people; in their minds they brought upon themselves this temptation; but without Jehovah's consent Moses would not have acceded to it. This was given, and moreover Jehovah specified what persons should be sent, Nu. xiii. 1-3, but of this Deuteronomy makes no mention.

Further, the promise to the Israelites of the land of Sihon, Deu. ii. 32, is represented as being at variance with Nu. xxvi. 21, which states that Moses required a passable passage through his territories. But as Hengstenberg observes, "the notion of a contradiction is founded on the assumption that the enquirer could have no other object than to bring Jehovah to grant the request, Deu. ii. 30, whereas it was intended to afford him an opportunity of manifesting that hostile determination, which was to effect his ruin." Again, as regards the circumstance that throughout Deuteronomy, except only in ch. xxviii. 2, where Sinner occurs, the place of the giving of the law is called Horb, whereas in the three preceding books Sinai is the usual designation, Horb being used only in Ex. iii. 1; iv. 28; xviii. 6; xviii. 5; xxiii. 6; it is to be observed that Horb was the general name of the narrow range of that district, as appears from Ex. xviii. 6, according to which a Rephidim was situated in Horb, while Sinai, on the other hand, was the name of the particular peak from which the law was given (Robinson, Biblical Researches, 25 et seq. p. 295, 300). The latter name accordingly would appear most prominent in connection with the giving of the law, and while the Israelites continued in the neighbourhood of that scene, disappearing however in the general and well-known name Horb when they receded from the locality; and when especially, in the border districts, the name Sinai is contracted with that "in the land of Moab," Deu. i. 29, xxx. 36. This view is further confirmed by the fact that previously to the Israelites' arrival at Sinai, Ex. xix. 2, Horb only is used—indeed, thus viewed, these peculiarities are examples of those undesigned coincidences which so largely distinguish the sacred narratives, and afford some of the most inimitable tokens of their truthfulness. Further, the apparent contradiction between Nu. xxxii. 39 and verse 29 is explained by a reference to De. iii. 12, 13, and Jos. xix. 29-31. And finally, with respect to the number of cities assigned to a province of Bashan in De. iii. 4, comp. Ex. xiii. 13, this is a statement which modern seeptries receive with incredulity, a recent explorer remarks: "Though the country is waste, and almost deserted, its cities with their walls and gates, crumbling but not fallen, still remain, the living monuments of its former greatness, and the irresistible proofs of the immutable accuracy and truthfulness of God's Word" (J. L. Peter, Journ. Sac. 1st. July, 1864, p. 210). Leaving, however, the alleged contradictions, which a practitioner would certainly not have allowed to escape him, and referring to the article PENTATEUCH for a fuller examination of the genuineness and authenticity as well as of this as of the other books of that great work, it may be well, before concluding this section, to indicate briefly some of the views as to the author and age of Deuteronomy held by those critics who deny that it is the production of Moses. A simple statement of facts will at once show how contradictory these views are, and how arbitrary must be the grounds from which such conclusions are deduced.

Thus, according to Stohelin, the author of Deuteronomy is the Jehovah-writer of the other books of the Pentateuch—a view at one time espoused in by Bleek, who afterwards, however, adopted so far the theory of De Wette, that he held with that critic that he was a distinct person, though they still differed as to the date of the composition— Bleek (Handb. p. 223, 224) assigning it to the interval between Hezekiah and Josiah, while De Wette placed it in the reign of the latter, having abandoned his earlier opinion, which brought it down to the period of the exile. Ewald, again, holds that Deuteronomy to be the work of a Jew living in Egypt during the latter half of the reign of Manasseh (Roscher, p. 173) a view which, so far as regards the date, is followed by Rich mond, on grounds which Bleek considers altogether untenable. Others, as Von Eichard, Gesenius, and Hartmann, would, as already remarked, assign the authorship to the prophet Jeremiah.

Not less contradictory and mutually subservient are the views as to the sources to which these critics would assign certain portions of the work. Thus, to take only one instance, the blessing of Moses (ch. xxiii.), which Perch regards as proceeding from the Elohist, the oldest writer of the Pentateuch (Roscher, p. 239) a view in which he is followed by De Wette, is held by Bleek to have originated in the time of Uzziah, though he formerly considered it as the composition of Moses himself. It is the same also with respect to other passages; but this must suffice; nor is it necessary to examine the arguments (some of which have been already adduced) adduced in support of these conflicting and even fluctuating conclusions, all of which are diametrically opposed to the entire character and bearing of the work itself, and to its testimony regarding its origin, author, and nature. Here we are driven direct and explicit than in any of the other portions of the Mosaic writings.

V. Its Chronology. The period of time comprised in Deuteronomy is not stated in the book itself. It can however be approximately determined from ch. i. 3, 4, comp. with Jos. iv. 19; v. 19. According to the first of these passages, Moses began the discourses which constitute Deuteronomy on the first day of the seventh month of the fourth year of the wanderings. According to Jos. v. 18 the Israelites under Joshua encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month of the following year, having four days previously, or on the tenth, crossed the Jordan, Jos. vi. 15. Before this three days had been occupied in preparations, and in waiting for the return of the spies, ch. i. 11; ii. 22: a circumstance which brings the encampment at Shittim, ch. ii. 1, to the seventh day of the same month. Now, as the Israelites mourned for Moses thirty days in the plains of Moab, de. xxxi. 3, this would assign his death to the seventh day of the twelfth month (Carmen, Introduction, vol. i. p. 111, Laps. 1572).

[Bleek Dissertation] In addition to works on Deuteronomy comprised in exposition of the whole Pentateuch, the following are separate treatises on this book or parts thereof: Luther, Deuteronomii Mis. et Elia provvisi ex ministrantibus, Witteb. 1721; Calvin, Sacrae scripturae Deuteronomii, ad partem de Ministerii et sacris in Deutero- nomio, translated by A. Golding, Lond. 1651; Lortius (Sac. Soc.), Commentarius in Deuterom. Leid. 1651; Masius, Annotationes in Deut. cap. xxii, xxiii, et xxiv, Parisii, 1631; Alting, J., Commentarioe pleniori DEVL. This is the proper English equivalent for the Greek ἅβασαλσ, when applied to the great adversary of God and man; indeed, it is that word itself in an English form; but neither is the Greek term always so applied, nor is the English term altogether appropriated to it; it is employed as the rendering of other expressions in the original, which are not quite equivalent with the archetypal term. Its primary meaning the Greek word signifies κακούργητος or ἄφθοος accuser; and so it is sometime used in New Testament scripture of persons who are given to evil-speaking or slanderous discourse. Thus, in 1 Tim. iii. 11, it is enjoined respecting the wives of demons that they "be grave, not slanderers, chafers, and to the like effect in Tit. ii. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 3. The transference of this epithet to one who, in the world of spirits, is the chief adversary of all good, so as to designate him emphatically the devil, arose quite naturally from the part he bore to that malignant spirit toward the people of God as their accuser, always suspecting evil against them, and often distinctly charging it, John v. 7, 12; Zec. iii. 1, 2; Rev. xii. 9, 10. On this account the Hebrew epithet Satan, the adversary, had been applied to him, as a proper name, and this the Greek translators rendered by ἅβασαλσ, devil. It is derived, like most epithets which become proper names, from a prominent characteristic; and, if respect be had to its appellative import, it requires to be supplemented by others in order to bring out the full idea of Satan's character and relation to the people of God. For he is their tempter as well as their accuser, and bears also the name of Apollyon, the destroyer. But as Satan, or devil, expresses generally the antagonistic, malicious, and thoroughly perverse nature of this evil spirit, it has become his usual and received designation. In New Testament scripture it appears often as a designation of other personalities than the one arch-spirit of evil now referred to; for we read of persons being possessed of evil by one instance even of a legion of devils being in one unhappy victim, Matt. xii. 27; Mark vi. 28. But in such cases the word used in the original is different: it is διαβολή, which, among the Greeks, was a word of indifferent meaning; that is, it denoted higher spiritual existences generally, good as well as bad, though, by the sacred writers, it is used only of the bad—the subordinates of the great spirit of evil, and his active coadjutors in the work of mischief. (See under Demons and Demonsiacs.) In one passage, child or son of the devil is applied to a human being as a strong expression, indicating the extent to which he had surrendered himself to the power of evil, and the tortuous courses to which he had consequently betaken, Acts xi. 18. And in still another passage the term itself, ἅβασαλσ, devil, is applied by our Lord to the traitor, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you a devil?" Some among others Dr. Campbell have objected to the expression here "a devil," on the ground more especially that, as the term in its application to the arch-enemy, always denotes one individual, it is not acceptable to scriptural usage to say a devil, there being strictly but one to whom the designation applies as a proper name, and so they would regard the word, when applied to Judas, as an epithet, translating thus—one of you is an accuser, or malicious informer. But this gives a taut and inadequate sense, and it also overlooks the peculiar usage of this evangelist. It is the tendency of John, more than of the other evangelists, to see the invisible imaged in the visible, in particular to connect human actors and instruments with potencies of a supernatural kind. In his gospel Christ himself is spoken of as being in the Father, and the Father in him; believers also are in Christ, and Christ in them. So, on the other side, the unbelieving Jews are of their father, the devil; they do his works; and when Judas was on the eve of consummating the great deed of apostasy, Satan is represented as entering into him, ch. xix. 2. Therefore, to apply to Judas the distinctive name of the great apostate and adversary, and to say "he is a devil," was only to give a somewhat more distinct and pointed expression to the close relationship, the virtual identity between the seen and the unseen actor in the drama. The one was in the little company of Christ's disciples what the other is in the rational creation of God. And if Scripture can say of such an one, He is a god—though there be but one who properly bears the name—why may it not, in certain circumstances, say of another, He is a devil? The figurative element that is in such a mode of expression can mislead no unfaithful reader of the Bible. These, however, are but occasional free applications of a term which, in the ordinary language of Scripture, denotes a being who, in some sense, stands alone, having many indeed associated with him in evil, but none equal to him in rank or power. Hence we read of "the devil and his angels," Matt. xxv. 41, standing in a sort of rivalry and antagonism to "God and the angels," so that, as God presides over the spirits of light, there is a world of darkness, the powers of which are presided over by the devil, as "the prince of the darkness of this world." From the influence he exerts over mankind, and the interest he has acquired in things here below, he is styled "the god of this world," "the prince of the power of the air," "the ruler of the darkness of this world," &c., and from the part he acted at the beginning, "the old serpent." The existence of such a being and of such an instance of evil in the universe of an infinitely good and powerful God, is undoubtedly a profound mystery, and raises questions of various kinds, which the human intellect is altogether incompetent to solve. That it is a doctrine of Scripture no one can deny, except by a method of interpretation which might be applied to explain away the most specific revelations of divine truth. And if, on account of the difficulties in which the subject is involved to our finite comprehension, we begin to suspend our belief regarding it, where shall we stop? Shall we not, on the same ground, withhold our belief from what is written of the nature of God himself, of the incarnation and work of his Son, of both the origin and the extinction of evil in his kingdom? Such things are all inwrept in mystery to our view, though intelligible and plain enough as regards their relation to us, and their bearing at once on our present condition and our coming destinies. How the devil should have become what he now is—how he should be allowed to prosecute his aims to the extent he does, and with the means of success which seem to be accorded to him—or what can be the prompting impulse to such uncewarded activity in evil, in a mind capable of so much intelligence, and consciences of so much misery—and matters too high for us to understand. With its usual reserve in respect to things that belong rather to the region of speculation than of practice. Scripture furnishes us with no definite insight into them, and by its very silence inculcates upon all in respect to them the humility and wisdom of the human. But there are points of practical moment which it does teach, and which it is well for all sound believers rightly to apprehend and believe.

The first of these has respect to the derivation of this antagonistic spirit of evil, which, according to Scripture, led its commencement in time, and arose from a culpable perversion of the good. The doctrine of Scripture here differs essentially from the Maimonic principle of an independent self-existing spirit of evil—a principle which, from comparatively early times, insinuated itself into the philosophy of the East. God alone is represented in the Bible as possessed of absolute existence; he is the one I AM, and all besides that belongs to the universe of being is the offspring of his hand, it is of the things that have been created and made by him. But as he is not more absolutely existent than purely and essentially good, whatever proceeded from his hands necessarily partook, in its original state, of his own blessed nature; in its proper place, and for the ends of its creation, it was good. Such, beyond all question, is the teaching of Scripture; and consequently the devil and his associates were not originally what they now are; they have become such by the wilful abuse and deception of what their Creator conformed on them. The precise occasion and mode of this departure into evil, as already noticed, is nowhere indicated in Scripture; and the fact itself is implied rather than distinctly asserted in those parts of Scripture which compose the Old Testament. We infer it from the character there ascribed to God, as in himself altogether good, and from the relation which Satan always appears to occupy toward him as that of a limited and dependent creature, who therefore must have derived his being from God, but could not by possibility derive the malice and guile by which it is now punctured; this he could only have of himself. What we can thus infer, however, from Old Testament scripture, is explicitly taught in the New. There Satan and his angels are declared to be fallen spirits, suffering under the just condignation of God, and reserved to a yet further execution of judgment. The everlasting fire, in which the wicked generally are to have their final doom, is that which has been primarily prepared for the devil and his angels—prepared for them as the leaders of apostasy; and they are hence described as "the angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation" or, as it is again said, "the angels who sinned," and who in consequence were "cast down to hell, and delivered into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment," Mat. xxv. 41, 42. This sinning should have come about we are not told, for there is no foundation for the opinion of some that it only took shape in the temptation presented to our first parents. On the contrary, the part acted by the head of the rebel host on that occasion, since he proved himself even then to be a liar and a murderer, Is. xiv. 12-15, is proof, at the same time, that the angelic fall must have been prior to the human. Yet the priority, in all probability, was not great, if the creation of angels belongs to the same era with that of man. We cannot say for certain that it was, nor on the relative period of their transgression have we any clear analogy to guide us; only, from all we are able to know of the original condition of angelic beings, and what was likely to be the effect of that upon their spirits, we can more easily conceive of their having fallen under the power of sin near the commencement of their career, than after they had long lived in the fellowship and enjoyment of God.

Another point, on which the information of Scripture bears unequivocal testimony, is the limited and subordinate nature of the devil's agency. As he has no independent existence, so he has no sovereign dominion; his sphere of operations is on every hand bounded, in subordination to the purposes of the divine government; he can work only where God permits him, and in no way can he be made subservient to the accomplishment of the purposes of Heaven. Hence, in the paradoxical representation of the book of Job, ch. 1, the limits are prescribed within which the adversary is allowed to work a definite course is marked out to him. Hence, also, the things done through his instrumentality are ascribed to God, as in the numbering of Israel by David, which, originating in a spirit of proud self-reliance, was directly prompted by Satan, and yet had its ordination of God, 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. And thus, in the case of Paul's thorn in the flesh, which was at once God's check upon his vanity, and the messenger of Satan to buffet him, 2 Cor. xii. 7. Whatever temptations, therefore, believers may on this account be exposed to, they can be subject to no violence; a restraint is laid upon the movements of the adversary, and if they resist him he must flee from them.

In respect again to the mode of that pernicious agency which is carried on by the devil and his angels, it falls in, like that of angelic agency generally, with the operation of second causes. It is only by giving a higher potency to these, not by any direct or separate action, that the power of the wicked one makes itself felt. That potency may sometimes, as in the possessions of the gospels, assume the appearance of something like miraculous power, yet it is always within the line of the moral and physical laws which are established in the world. It can somehow intensify the evil which the natural operation of these might be fitted to effect, but it has no power to bring into play anything absolutely new. Even that moral hardening, or blind insensibility in the way to destruction, which comes from Satan's entering as it is said into men, or gaining a sort of personal mastery over them, always appears as the result of a previous course of wickedness, and shows itself in but a more thorough abandonment to the lusts of the flesh and the mind. Examples of this are to be found in Saul under the Old Testament, and under the New in Judas, Ananias and Sapphira, and the subjects of Antichrist. In its worst forms, therefore, it is always to be regarded as the punishment of antecedent guilt and perversity; and it in no respect interferes with the responsibility, or lessens the guilt, of those who yield to it.

Finally, little as we know otherwise respecting the nature and condition of the devil and his angels, we can yet, with perfect confidence, predicate of them utter depravity and intense misery. Their character and aims are in direct opposition to those of God; as the kingdom of the one rises, then so, to destroy the works of the devil was the very purpose for which the Son of God was manifested, 1 John iii. 8. Whatever tends, therefore, to injure and destroy; falsehood, deceit, guile, malice, hatred of the good, restless and insatiate striving after dominion—these are the elements of satanic thought and influence. Missing often, by the very fulness and complexity of evil they embody, the ends they aim at, because necessarily involving an incompetency to enter into the views and feelings of those who love and follow what is good. In the case of such they ever misconceive the forces they have to contend against, and hence appear often acting a part of maddest folly, or blindly subserving the interests they seek to overthrow. As the result of such depraved aims and such heedless working, devils are necessarily miserable. "Turn house," to use the words of Tertullian: "from the universal centre of life, without being able to find it in themselves,—by the feeling of inward void ever driven to the outward world, and yet in irreplaceable hostility to it and themselves—eternally slumbering and never escaping the presence of God—always endeavouring to destroy, and always compelled to promote his purposes—instead of joy in the beatific vision of the divine glory, having a never-satisfied longing for an end they never reach,—instead of hope, the unceasing oscillation between fear and despair—instead of love, an impotent hatred of God, their fellows, and themselves.—can the fearful condemnation of the last judgment, the thrusting down into the bottomless pit of destruction, be xx. xx. to add anything to the anguish of such a condition, excepting that they shall there see the kingdom of God for ever delivered from their assaults, their vain presumption that they can destroy or impede it scattered to the winds, leaving to them only the ever-growing despair of an inward rage, which cannot spend itself on anything without, and is therefore for ever undeceived as to its impotence!"

The subject, even within such limits as are cognizable by our minds, has much in it that is dark and mournful. But there is much also of the same in the condition and history of wicked men. The blindness and perversity that is seen to grow upon them, even amid circumstances fitted to operate beneficially upon their minds, the moral impotence and incapacity that ultimately settles upon them in regard to the pure and good, the present evil and misery they are permitted to bring upon others, and the destiny of irrecoverable ruin to which they are themselves manifestly hastening, are, one and all, subjects deeply mysterious and incomprehensibly sad. The difference between them, and those which concern the devil and his angels, is one only of degree, not of kind; and what we see and know of the one may serve as a stepping-stone to help our believing conceptions respecting the other. The unbelief which staggers at the higher line of revelations will never stop without also infringing seriously upon the lower; and it will invariably be found that the deniers of satanic existence and agency but partially receive what is written of the depths of human depravity and the woes of human perturbation.

DEW. The allusions of Scripture to this natural production are of considerable frequency and variety; but referring, as they do, to what is generally known and understood, they hardly require the aid of explanatory remark. When God says of the goodness he had in store for his repenting people, "I will be as the dew unto Israel," Is. vi. 3, or when Job said of the days of his years, "The dew hay all day on my branch. Job xxxi. 23, every one perceives that it is the refreshing and fructifying power of dew which is the ground of the comparison. "The dew of his youth," which is said to rest on the Messiah in Ps. ex. 3, is evidently, in other words, the freshness, as of youthful energy, or of life's buoyant and hopeful morn. In other passages respect is had to the gentle and benign manner in which it diffuses itself, the more perceptible and the more grateful that it comes to allay the heats and repair the waste of a parching day, as when Moses represents his speech "decelling like the dew," De. xxxiii. 2, and the Lord himself is compared, on account of his gracious manifestations, to "a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest," Is. xix. 1; so also the benign influence of brotherly love is likened to "the dew of Hermon, [the dew] that descends upon the mountains of Zion," Is. xxxiii. 2. In still other passages reference is made to its chilling effect on the bosky frame when exposed after a hot day to its invigorating power—"My head is filled with dew, and my cheeks with the drops of the night," cf. vii. 1; "they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven," vii. 1. Viewed simply in respect to its natural effects on the herbage of the ground, the falls of dew, especially in early summer, and again in autumn, when they chiefly prevail, were of great service in such a country as Palestine, where periodical seasons of rain are succeeded by a hot sun and continuous drought. Hence to have the heavens stayed from dew, Is. xxi. 1, and the dew must have been a serious calamity; and for a mountain to be cut off from supplies of this species of moisture, as David poetically bestowed in regard to Gibeah, 2Sa. i. 23, was virtually to be consigned to barrenness and sterility.

DIADEM, as used in Scripture, can scarcely be said to have the distinctive meaning which has been assigned to it as the more peculiar badge of absolute power or imperial dignity. It occurs early in four passages, and as the rendering of words which might equally have been translated "mitre, diadem, tiara, or turban (יָדוֹד תֵּאָרָם)." Derived from the root which signifies to roll together or around, it was applied by way of eminence to the ornate drapery or wrappings about the head customary in the East, in particular to the costly turbans of fashionable women, in iii. 2, the turbaned cap of the high-priest, and the costly head-dress of soyphrines. Speaking of the insignia of royalty, which by a divine judgment were to be taken from the representative of David's house, Ezekiel says, "Remove the diadem, take off the crown," Eze. xxi. 26—not the diadem, therefore, in the more peculiar oriental sense, since it is coupled with crown; and the two are not likely to have been worn together. Isaiah speaks of converted Israel being as a diadem of royalty—an ornate head-band, such as might befit kings—in the land of the Lord, ch. xvi. 3. In a similar poetical style Job speaks of his judgment having been to him "as a robe and a diadem"—like costly attire for the body and the head. And again in Is. xlviii. 5, Jehovah is represented, on account of the peculiar manifestations of favour and blessing he was going to bestow on his people, as serving to them for "a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty"—throwing around them, as it were, the rich and costly attire of a king. These are all the passages in which the expression is to be met with in the English Bible, and in the last the word in the original is different. (תֵּאָרָם), nor is it elsewhere used of distinctively royal apparel. So far as the testimony of Scripture is concerned, it must remain doubtful whether the kings of Jewish or Israel were wont to exchange the diadem with the crown as emblematic of royalty, or whether the terms referred to were not employed somewhat generally of the highly adored and often richly gemmed head-dresses, which were worn by persons in positions of honour, and more especially by kings and priests.

It is proper to add, however, that the diadem, strictly so called, rather than the crown, was the more peculiar badge of absolute sovereigns in eastern countries. It usually consisted of a band or fillet, about two inches broad, tied behind, made of silk, and inlaid with gold and gems of the rarer kinds. The earlier emperors of Rome did not venture to wear it, on account of its offensiveness to the Roman people; their principal distinction was the imperial or military robe of purple; but Diocletian, in whose hands the imitation of eastern manners became more decided, assumed also the diadem. "It was no more," says Gibbon, "than a broad white fillet set with pearls, which encircled the emperor's head." But other things corresponded; for "the sumptuous robes of Diocletian and his successors were of silk and gold, and even their shoes were studded with the most precious gems."

DIAL. This word occurs only once in our English Bibles, and it is matter of some doubt whether even that once is not too much. It is in the account given of the miraculous sign which was granted to Hezekiah regarding his recovery from an apparently hopeless disease, when the sun's shadow, it is said, went "ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz," 2 Ki. vii. 13. The word here rendered dial, is the same that is translated degrees in the earlier part of the verse; and its usual meaning is beyond doubt degree or step. But what precisely were the degrees or steps of Ahaz, it is impossible with any exactness to determine. That they must have been somehow adapted for marking, by the incidence of a shadow, the progression of the sun's daily course, is evident from the connection; but not less evident, that as the shadow might be made to exhibit either a progress or a regress of ten degrees, the instrument could not have been constructed after the fashion of an ordinary dial for indicating the twelve hours of the day. The more ancient authorities—the Septuagint and Syriac translators, also Josephus (Ant. xiii. 11)—understood it of certain steps of a stair connected with the palace of Ahaz, which it is easy to conceive, might be so constructed as, by means of the shadow of an obelisk or some other object, to represent the successive divisions of the day in hours, half hours, and perhaps still smaller portions. It is possible, however, that there may have been an instrument or structure with a proper dial-plate, to which the name degrees was applied; and it is again supposed, by some, that an obelisk-like pillar might have served the purpose, set up in an open elevated place, with encircling steps on which the shadow fell (אנהב). Various other conjectures have been made in regard to the form, but they are attended with no certainty. Nor has anything been discovered among the monuments of Egypt or Assyria to guide to more definite conclusions; no dials of any sort have been found. It is known, however, that the Babylonians had a sun-dial so early as the year 4000 B.C., which is called the hemicycle, and ascribed to the astronomer Berosus. It was of a very simple construction, consisting of a concave hemisphere, shaped like the vault of heaven, divided into twelve parts, on which, by means of a globe in the centre, the sun's daily progress was marked under so many divisions or hours. Herodotus informs us that the "pole (κτόλω), and the sun-dial (θρασμος), and the division of the day into twelve parts, were learned from the Babylonians by the Greeks" (v. 100); and by the pole is there supposed to be meant the concave dial, which has just been referred to. So that as inventions of this description appear to have originated with the Babylonians, and are known to have existed at a period not very remote from the time of Ahaz, it is quite conceivable that this king, who was only too fond of borrowing in other things from his heathen neighbours to the north, and keeping up a connection with them, E.vi. vii. 74, may have derived from that quarter some instrument, for which the Hebrews had no other name than the general one of degrees or steps, from its marking the successive stages of the sun's diurnal course.

In regard to the sign performed upon the instrument in question, there can be no doubt it was in the strict sense of the term miraculous; only by being so could it have served the purpose for which it was given. But as the representation is made in popular language, and according to the apparent phenomena, we have no reason to suppose that there was any change in the real motion of the heavenly bodies; the shadow was made to move backwards ten degrees, as if the sun itself had so far retrograded; but the effect was no doubt produced by some divine operation of a merely local nature; since the effect could not otherwise have been confined to a particular instrument or structure belonging to the palace in Jerusalem.

DIAMOND, sometimes diamond, Hebrew שיב (shabir), Ar. sci; Ez. xxi. 17; Deu. xvii. 12, the hardest and the most precious of all gems. In the English Bible it occurs also at Ex. xxxvii. 15, among the precious stones composing the sacred breastplate of the high priest; but the word is there different in the original (phaladion), and by the Septuagint and Josephus is regarded as the onyx. It is not at all likely that there should have been two terms quite disconnected and unlike to express one gem; and if, as is generally agreed, shabir was the name for diamond, then this gem could not have had a place in the sacred breastplate. It was probably not known to the Israelites at the period of the exodüs, or if known, they may not have been acquainted with the art of polishing it, which was difficult of accomplishment on account of its extreme hardness. In these passages, cited above, which do not mention of the diamond, it is simply reformation of hardness that is made account of: the prophet Ezekiel speaks of making his forehead like a diamond (or adamant), to confront the opposition he had to meet with; and Israel, as represented by the other two prophets, hardened their hearts in sin, so as to become inexpressible like the diamond. Pline describes the gem as of such indestructible hardness, that it was proof against all heat, obliquity inmoralibilities, and useful in various natural operations. Modern art has somewhat modified this representation; for while it remains the hardest of minerals, so far from being superior to any power of heat, there is a process by which a heat can be raised so intense as totally to consume it. When subjected to such a process it turns out to be a composition of pure carbon. Its peculiar worth arises from its hardness and transparency; and when found in great perfection and considerable bulk, it rises to almost fabulous value. A single diamond has been sold for £50,000, and others of much higher worth are known to exist—in particular one set in the sword of the Emperor of Russia, weighing 779 carats, and another, immensely greater still, belonging to the King of Portugal, weighing as much as 1880 carats. But, as already noticed, the hardness of the mineral is noticed in Scripture.

DIANA. See Ephesus.

DIBLATIM [two sides], the name of the father of one of the women Honan was instructed in vision to take to wife, 1 Chr. 3. (See Hosea.)

DIBON, a town on the northern bank of the Arnon, originally belonging to Moab, Jos. xiii. 17. It was rebuilt by the tribe of Gad, and hence was called Dibon-Gad, Nu. xxxii. 31; xxxiii. 43. In later times it reverted to the Moabites, and is mentioned among the Moabish cities against which the divine judgments are pronounced: Isaiah calls it Dimon, Is. xv. 9; Je. xxxii. 18, 22. A place named Dibon has been discovered by modern travellers in the same region, and is supposed to be the representative of the ancient city. The ruins are of some extent. There was another Dibon in the tribe of Judah, Nu. xi. 25; but nothing is known of it.

DIDRACHMA. two drachmaa, or a half shekel, the customary contribution to the tabernacle or temple; but see under TITHES.

DIDYMUS (δίδυμοι), a surname of the apostle Thomas, and meaning twin. If translated, as it might have been, the designation would be "Thomas the twin."

DEMON. See DEBON.

DINAH ( Judges or acquit ted), the daughter of Jacob by Leah. Her history is a kind of brief tragedy. When her father's test was pitched in the neighborhood of Shechem, shortly after his return from Mesopotamia, she went out, as it is said, to see the daughters of the land, &c. xxii. 1, that is, mingled with them in free and familiar intercourse. Considering the dissoluteness of manners which prevailed at the time, this was a wrong course for her to pursue, and wrong also for her parents to allow. The consequence was, that she fell a victim to the seductive arts of the place, and was delivered by Shechem the son of Hamor. It is said, however, that he sincerely loved her, and some time after his misconduct made proposals of marriage to her father. This, it would appear, was not done till the son of Jacob had been brought from the east, where they were at the time pasturing their flocks, and were consulting with their father how the dishonour was to be met. They were all full of grief and indignation, because "fully had been wrought in Israel," yet on the proposal of marriage being formally made on the part of Shechem by his father, they agreed to it—but only on condition that the Shechemites should circumcise themselves and become one people with the family of Jacob. The Hivite party submitted to this condition—so sensible were they of the wrong that had been done, and so afraid of the consequences to which it might lead. But there was a want of mutual sincerity in the matter: worldly policy prevailed both in the proposal of marriage on the one side, and the acceding to it on the other. "Jacob's sons we are told answered deceitfully"—that is, probably, the two of them who took the leading part in the negotiations—Simon and Levi, two of Dinah's full brothers. And when the men of the place were labouring under the disability caused by the act of circumcision, these brethren in deceit and cruelty took an unnecessarily advantage of their position, and cut them all off with the edge of the sword. Jacob had no sympathy with his sons in this foul deed, and both at the time, and on his death-bed, expressed his strong disapprobation of it. But undoubtedly considerable blame must be attributed to Jacob for the state into which he had allowed his family at the time to fall; it was evidently a period of remissness and backsliding: and he seems himself to have neglected to pay to God the vow he had originally made at Bethel. Hence, immediately after the mournful transactions connected with Dinah's fall, the Lord appeared to him, and directed him to go to Bethel and renew his covenant-engagement with God. He took this as an admonition, and called upon his family to put away from them the strange gods they had brought in amongst them, and to purify themselves, 46 xxxv. 3. The evil thus proved the occasion of a revival of earnestness and a temporary purifying in the family.

DINNER, at least what was commonly called such among the orientals and the ancients generally, was an early meal, and corresponded nearly to our breakfast or lunch. It was usually taken about eleven. The Greek word for it (ἀπρασία) comes from a root that signifies early, and by its very etymology denoted the early meal. Their chief meal was the dinner or supper, which was taken late in the day, when the ordinary labours being over, families and neighbours could leisurely assemble to partake of a friendly meal. Sometimes, however, the word is employed of a large and formal entertainment: as at Mat. xxii. 4, where in a parabolical representation the kingdom of God is likened to the marriage-dinner of a king's son; and, in another passage, t. xiv. 12, the alternative of dinner or supper is put in respect to a feast. This usage may be regarded as somewhat exceptional; and, having respect to the common manners of the East, it is with the dinner that a feast is most fitly associated, and under which the customs connected with formal entertainments may be best treated. (See Supper.)

DIONYSIUS, designated the Areopagite, that is, member of the supreme court of the Areopagus, is DIOTREPHES, a name of heathen origin, meaning "Jew-hater," but occurring in the third epistle of St. John, as the name of a person in one of the churches of Asia Minor, who professed Christianity, but was of an ambitious spirit, and even set himself up against apostolic authority. "He loveth to have preeminence, and receiveth us not," with the apostle: "and not content there with, neither doth he himself receive the converts, but casteth them out of the church."

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS is mentioned in 1 Co. xii. 19 as one of the supernatural gifts which were conferred by the Holy Spirit in apostolic times. It seems to have been a sort of spiritual intuition, enabling its possessors, as with the eye of Heaven, to read the character of those who professed to have divine revelations, and determine whether they were of God or not.

DISPERSIONS. S. captivity. DIVINATION, DIVINER. In the ordinary acceptance of the term, divination differs from prophecy, in that the one is a human device, while the other is a divine gift; the one an unwarranted fancying into the future by means of magical arts, superstitious incantations, or natural signs, arbitrarily interpreted; the other a partially disclosed insight into the future, by the supernatural aid of Him who sees the end from the beginning. Among the heathen, who were destitute of the true knowledge of God, and had no authorized interpreters of his will, the distinction was drawn was necessarily unknown; divination and prophecy differed only as the particular from the general; and the diviner, though in a somewhat inferior line, and with less of certainty in his prognostications, was also a prophet. Hence the work of Cioe, which treats generally of men's insight into the future, and the real or pretended means of obtaining it, is entitled De Divinatione. He only so far distinguishes as to divide between those who sought to get this insight into the future by artful methods, such as omen and auguries, and those who were thought to obtain prophecies of the future in a more natural way, through a certain exaltation of mind, or by means of presaging dreams. But in Scripture language the diviners were false prophets, and divination was allied to witchcraft and idolatry, as seen in 10:14, 16; Zec. vii. 20, 25, xxi. 9, 28. The word most commonly used for divination, הָבִ֖ו (habōn), and the corresponding verb הָבִ֣ו (habōnā, to consult, to appease the gods), are used of false prophets and soothsayers, as in the passages just referred to; of necromancers, who professed to invoke the dead, 18:18; of heathen augurs and enchanters, 18:18; 2 Ki. xiii. 19, Zec. x. 2; of making prognostications by means of arrows, inspection of entrails, etc., Zec. xii. 6. Another word (ארקָּה, arakkāh) is occasionally used, though only in two or three passages, De xiv. 15; 2 Ki. xx. 25; 22 xiii. 21, xv. 1; and always with reference merely to auguries, or to the arts and incantations by which they were usually taken. But beside these more general terms, various others of a specific kind are used, having reference to particular modes of divination, such as charmers, enchanters, witches, wizards, etc. We shall briefly glance at the different kinds, taking them in historical order.

1. The earliest mention of the practice of divination was that of the cup. To magnify the value of Joseph's silver cup, and aggravate the guilt of parceling it, Joseph's steward was ordered to say to the sons of...
DIVINATION

Jacob, "is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he dieth?" (Gen. xvi.) The charge, we know, was a feigned one, made for the purpose of trying what was in the hearts of the men toward Benjamin, and the special aggravation in the charge, as to the cup being applied to purposes of divination, we may reasonably suppose was of the same character. The high religious position maintained by Joseph in the most critical periods of his career, renders it every way improbable he should in a matter of this sort have identified himself with the corruptions of heathenism. But the allusion made in his name (though under a feigned pretext) to divination by the cup, as an existing and well-known practice, shows how early it must have got a footing in Egypt. Nothing is indicated there, however, or in any other part of Scripture, as to the mode in which the cup was used for the purpose in question. It is reported that the cup—the cup as used for sacred purposes—was a symbol of the Nile, which was called "the cup of Egypt," and by the varying aspects of its contents, it was thought to mirror the forms of all things (Havernick, Introd. to Pent. on Gen. xvi. 1, and authorities there cited). But the discovery of cups or bowls among the Babylonian ruins with supposed magical inscriptions in them (see under Bowls), has led to the supposition that this possibly may have been the mode also in Egypt of divining by them. It is certain that cups or bowls are frequently used still in various parts of the East in cases of dangers, maladies, which having charms written inside by magicians, and water afterwards put into them, this water is expected to work as a cure (Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 311). Such a practice, however, differs somewhat from the art of divination. But as to the act of divining by cups in ancient Egypt, there can be no doubt. It is mentioned by labilités in his book on Egyptian mysteries (p. n. sect. 15). And that the superstitious descended to comparatively modern times, appears from a circumstance recorded in Norden's travels published in 1570. When he and his party were at Derri, on the confines between Egypt and Nubia, and in circumstances of great danger, they sent a threatening message to a malicious and powerful Arab. He replied, "I know what sort of people you are. I have consulted my cup, and have found by it that you are the people of whom one of our prophets has said, that Franks should come in disguise, and spy out the land; that they would afterwards bring a great number of their countrymen, conquer the land, and exterminate all" (Lamarck's observations, vol. iv. p. 246).

Adam Clarke, in his note on the passage, supposes that the Arab referred to the famous divining cup of Jezneshed, celebrated in eastern romances as a mirror that represented the whole world, and all that was passing in it. Whether he may have done so or not, the evidence his speech affords of the ancient custom of cup-divination is equally manifest.

2. Under the names of sorcerers, wizards, witches, classes of persons are mentioned in the Pentateuch, who, from the import of their names, may be presumed to have dealt in divinations; but their profession only, not the particular methods of carrying it on, is indicated. The sorcerers in Ex. vii. 11 should perhaps rather have been designated sorcières, as the word is, indeed, rendered in De. xviii. 10— McKashep (םכשְּפָה). one who uses incantations, whether with the design of creating a delusion respecting the present, or begetting false expectations of the future. It is the same word, only with a female termination, which is translated witch in Ex. xxviii. 18, denoting a character so offensive to sound religion and morality, that none professing it were to be suffered to live. The wizards in Le. xix. 31; xx. 6; De. xviii. 11, &c.— yaddeiwn (יָדוּדָיִם), from the root to know, hence the knowing ones by way of unience, the wise beyond others—were those who professed to see into the coming issues of providence, and to have the power, probably by certain forms of incantation, to reveal the secrets of Heaven. But for anything that either this or the other names import, the parties spoken of might resort in turn to any of the modes by which diviners sought to obtain credit for their supernatural insight.

3. The name last noticed is very commonly coupled with another, which does point to a specific mode of trying to elicit the secrets of Providence—having or consulting with familiar spirits—both (לְהָדַע), as such persons are called in Le. xix. 31. But this seems to be an elliptical expression for those who had an ob'; and the characters in question are more fully described in Le. xx. 27, as those who, "whether man or woman, had ob' in them"—i.e., a spirit of pythom or divination. The witch of Endor belonged to this class; she is called a "mistress of ob'" (so the word literally is in 1 Sa. xxviii. 7); and Saul asked her to divine to him by the ob'—in the Eng. Bible, "by the familiar spirit." It seems to have been but another mode of designating a necromancer, one who professed to have familiar converse with the souls of the dead, and to derive thence information not accessible to others respecting the designs of Providence and the issues of life. The responses that were given to the questions which such necromancers undertook to answer, were pronounced as from the bloodless and ghastly frame of an apparition, and hence were usually uttered in a shrill, squeakish voice. This is alluded to by Isaiah, when, speaking of Jerusalem in her coming state of prostration and ruin, he represents her speech as like "the voice of an ob' out of the earth" (Ex. xxii. 6) — the voice of one more dead than alive, peeping or chirping. The necromantic art naturally grew, in the hands of designing and fraudulent men, out of the superstitious notions prevalent among the heathen respecting the spirits or names of the departed. These were supposed to enter on a semi-divine state after death, and in that state to keep up an occasional connection with certain places and persons on earth, especially the spots where their ashes reposed, and the persons who paid them peculiar honour and regard. It was only what might be expected, that crafty persons would work upon this superstitious belief, and turn it to purposes of fraud and imposture. How readily both the belief, and the delusive practices associated with it, obtained a footing among the covenant-people, the many prohibitions given respecting them in the Pentateuch sufficiently manifest; and the references to them, in the later historical books and the prophetical writings, show that they still held their ground, though solemnly denounced and forbidden, to the very close of the Old Testament canon. But they were far from ceasing then, or with the ancient economy itself; for the rise of saint and relic worship in the Christian church laid the foundation of a fresh development of the necromantic art, which in process of time furnished materials for some of the darkest and most discreditab old chapters in modern history.
DIVINATION

4. Apparently another and distinct class of diviners is indicated by a word, which, in the English Bible, is usually rendered diviners or soothsayers, Isa. vi. 17; 1 Ki. xi. 20; 2 Ch. xxxii. 6; Jer. xxv. 12, alphabeters or soothsayers. The word is maqomim (מְקוֹמִים), and is of uncertain etymology—possibly connecting it with maqom (מַקֹּם), an eye, others withḏâha (דַּחַה), a cloud, and some again withḏàwîn (דַּוִּין), to cover. Hence, a considerable variety of meanings has been attached to it, though all are agreed that it denotes persons addicted to some sort of divination. The connection alone puts this beyond a doubt. In the Pentateuch, the Vulgate had rendered the word obserbantia, and in the three prophetic passages, by taking auguries or divinations. Our translators substantially followed it in the latter, but adopted in the historical passages the explanation of some of the rabbins—observing, or observation of times. It was applied to such as said, Today it is auspicious to set out, tomarrow to make preparation; thus observing times and appointing seasons. No doubt soothsaying has often, in ancient as well as modern times, taken this direction; but whether it is indicated in the form of expression now under consideration must remain altogether doubtful. And if possible still more doubtful is the reference which some perceive in it to the evil eye. This would ally it to spells and fascinations; and the remark of Gezerim, in his Thor, seems to be well grounded, that the word relates to divining and soothsaying rather than to these. It may have had respect to observations taken from the appearances and motions of the clouds, but just as probably (as Gezerim supposes) to the occult and magic arts by which soothsayers often pretended to divine the approaching future.

5. Balaamite, or divining by means of arrows, is expressly mentioned as a mode of divination, in use at least among the Chaldeans. The king of Babylon, says Ezekiel, ch. xix. 2, "stood at the parting, at the head of the two ways, to use divination; he skewes the arrows," &c. The action is represented as preceding at the moment; the king with his war-equipment is on his way southward, and when he reaches the point where the roads diverge, the one toward Roblah of Ammon, the other toward Jerusalem, he pauses for a little, to inquire by augury in which of the two directions fortune was awaiting him. Three several forms of divination are brought into play, and of these the first is by means of some action with arrows; no further described here but with respect to the shaking of them, which seems to have formed a prominent part of the ceremony. Jerome, in his comment on the passage, says of it, that what the king did was "to put a certain number of arrows into a quiver, each having a particular name inscribed on it, and then mixed them together, that he might see whose arrow should come out, and which city he should first attack. And this (he adds) the Greeks call balamantia or balamantinysis, the account is probably correct, and, at all events, no researches of later times have added anything to it. Pictures have been found on the Assyrian tablets, which are supposed to represent the king in a divining chamber, with arrows as well as other instruments of divination in his presence; but this is by no means certain (Bononiis Nuweh, p. 209-210). Some authorities, however, speak of sacred arrows being kept at Mecca, and used by the Arabs for similar purposes, though contrary to the spirit and precepts of the Koran, (see Preface by Sir I.) 6. In addition to the arrows, the king of Babylon is described by the prophet Ezekiel, in the passages referred to above, as also consulting or inquiring at the temenoth—in other words, and not generally idols, as in the English Bible. For these, see under Terephim. It is enough to say at present, that they appear to have been a kind of household idols used for helping to divination, and for direction in perplexities; and, far from being confined to heathen worshippers, traces of them are found among the covenant people, both in earlier and later times, (2 Ki. xx. 19, xxii. 20, xxv. 9, Jer. xix. 3-5.)

7. Forming prognostications from the inspection of entrails, and in particular of the livers of newly slain animals, may also be noticed, although there is no evidence of its having been practised among the Jews. The only instance that occurs of it in Scripture is found in the passage of Ezekiel already referred to, where the king of Babylon completes his series of auguries by inspecting the liver. No more in this case than in the employment of the arrows, is any indication given as to the mode adopted for reading out of the liver the signs of coming good or evil. But we know from other sources, that it was by applying certain rules to the colour and appearances presented by the liver; and according to the data furnished by these, favourable or adverse results were anticipated.

In addition to the preceding special forms of divination, there were others of a more general kind, which is it enough to mention; consulting oracles, not unknown among the Israelites in the more corrupt periods of their history, 2 Ki. xxi. 2, seeking to false prophets or dreamers of marvellous dreams; listening to the prognostications of star-gazers or astrologers. In later times this last class had a great name, and were frequently resorted to, not only in their native seat in Chaldea, but in many other countries also, over which they spread themselves in quest of gain. The superstitions at Rome are represented by Juvenal as hunting generally after fortune-tellers, but preferring Chaldean astrologers to all other professors of the art; "Chaldei sed major critica licet; quidquid divinit astrologi, credunt a fante relatum Homeri."

Our Casts will be placed in the Chaldeans; whatever an astrologer utters, they will believe to proceed from the oracle of Ammon. And, notwithstanding the strong and frequent denunciation in the law and the prophets of all sorts of divination, there can be no doubt, that in the times prior and subsequent to the gospel era, the baser part of the Jewish people were grievously addicted to the arts of soothsaying and magic. Evidence of this are wanting in New Testament scripture, Acts xiv. 13; and the sarcastic allusions of Juvenal furnish additional and striking illustrations (iii. 53, iv. 54, &c.) It could only be, however, the more depraved and reprobate portion of the Jews who gave themselves to such arts; the men of enlightened minds and good consciences must have stood entirely aloof from them, and even decried them as of demonical character and origin. A good example of the anti-divining spirit of this better portion is given, out of Hebræans, by Josephus, in the case of a man who put to shame the pretensions of a soothsayer, by shooting with his arrow the bird, on which the soothsayer was beginning to announce his auguries respecting the good or ill fortune of the journey which the Jew and his party were pursuing. "How, and the sagacious Jew, "could that poor wretched creature pretend to foresee so our fortune, that knew nothing of its own? If it could have foretold good or evil to come, it would not have come to this place, but would have been afraid lest Mosambian the Jew would shoot at it and kill it" (comp. Ap. i. 27). We cannot wonder at the stringent laws enacted in Scripture against divination, and its repudiation in every form. In its very nature it implies distrust in the providence of God, and a desire to obtain knowledge untied to one's circumstances in life—knowledge, which might partly enable some to get undue advantages over others, and partly divert the movements of Providence out of their proper channels. Such knowledge is wisely withheld; it cannot be obtained by legitimate means; and, as a necessary consequence, the attempt to import it must always proceed on false grounds; it is a pretension based on hypocrisy and deceit. However, therefore, is but another word for deceivers; and dupe of fraud and imposture must be all who listen to their divinations. Hence the art so readily allied itself to idolatry; rejected by the true religion, it became a fitting accompaniment and handmaid of the false; and has ever shown the same tendency to hang on the progress of a corrupt Christianity, that it did to associate itself with the corruptions of Judaism.

DIVORCE. By this is understood a legal separation between man and wife, by means of a formal process of some sort, on the one side or the other. The subject is very briefly treated in Scripture—being there regarded as an abnormal thing, a deviation from rectitude, which should have no place among those who know God; but the treatment being somewhat diverse in the New as compared with the Old Testament scriptures, has given rise to some difference of opinion among commentators, and even to charges of inconsistency in respect to the pure morality of the Bible. Down to the period of the Mosaic legislation there is no authoritative prescription on the married relation beyond that connected with its original institution, in which there was the distinct recognition of one man and one woman, as constituting the parties proper to be united together, and then the concomitant of the great principle, that by the union they became, out of two persons, one flesh, one complex humanity; so that, in order to its establishment, a man should need to leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife (c. i. 22). As the sacred history proceeds it notes occasional deviations from this divinely established order, and obviously with the view of marking them as improper deviations, which could not fail to bring along with them, as a just rebuke from Heaven, various social and domestic evils, (Gen. xvii. 21, xxxii. 13, xxxvi. 5-2, xxxix. 21, xxxii; &c.) but it was simply in the way of adding (nay the part of the husband) fresh matrimonial connections to the primary and proper one, not by repudiating such as already existed. It was impossible, however, long to keep the one form of evil apart from the other; the matrimonial bond was necessarily weakened by polygamy, which, in proportion as it prevailed, obscured the fundamental principle of marriage constituting two of different sexes into one flesh, and gave to the female member the aspect, not of the other half, or converse side of the male, but of his property, which he might multiply at his pleasure or convenience, or again diminish. In such a state of things the relation of the wife naturally sunk very much to the position of a concubine, and according to the facility practised in forming the connection a like facility in dissolving it was sure to creep in. Hence, in the only part of the Mosaic legislation which distinctly refers to the subject of divorce, it is plainly enough implied that the practice was already a prevailing one, such as might confidently be expected to arise among the covenant people; and could only be restrained within certain limits, but could not be totally prevented. The lawyer might do something to check an extreme license or arbitrary freakishness in the matter: he could not venture on altogether cancelling the supposed right. The prescription is as follows: "When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass, that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some unkindness in her literally, a matter of uncleanness; then let him write her a bill of divorcement literally, a scroll of cutting off or separation, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house. And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement, and giveth it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house: or if the latter husband die, which took her to be his wife, her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife, after that she is defiled; for that is abomination before the Lord, and shall not cause the hand to sin, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance." (De. xxiv. 1-4.) This piece of ancient legislation, which probably was found definite enough at the time, has proved somewhat ambiguous, as regards the proper grounds of divorce, from the different meanings that have come to be attached to the phrase "found some uncleanness in her"—strictly, matter of nakedness or shame. In later times, it is well known, two very different interpretations among the Jews prevailed regarding it—a more stringent one maintained by the school of Shammai, and one of great laxity patronized by the school of Hillel. The former held the uncleanness meant in the law to be that simply of adultery; and many, not formally belonging to the school of Shammai, allowed this in regard to the first wife, but not in regard to those which a man might take over and above. Indeed, the views of such were founded less upon the passage in Deuteronomy, than upon what is said in Mal. ii. 15 respecting the wife of one's youth, by which they understood the first wife. But the school of Hillel allowed the slightest occasions of offence to come within the scope of the law of divorce. They even said, "If the wife cook her husband's food badly by over-salting or over-seasoning it, she is to be put away." Yea, "If by any stroke from the hand of God she become dumb or softish." (Rabbi Jeshua and Simeon at Mat. v. 32.) Both schools, apparently, went to an extreme in opposite directions respecting the real import of the expression of Moses. That more than unfaithfulness to the marriage vow must have been comprehended in the matter of nakedness or shame, which a man might find in his wife, is evident from what our Lord said concerning it, when, being interrogated by the Pharisees upon the subject, he admitted that a certain liberty of divorce was granted by Moses on account of the hardness of the people's hearts. This liberty was therefore, extending beyond occasions of actual unfaithfulness, because this was sanctioned by our Lord himself as a legitimate ground of divorce, Mat. xix. 9, 10. It is necessary, therefore, to understand by the phrase in question something beside actual adultery—something perhaps tending in that direction, something fitted to raise not unreasonable jealousy or disgust in the mind of the husband, and does not the prospect of true conjugal affection and harmony between him and his wife. Still, a good deal was left to the discretion, and it might be the foolish caprice, of the husband; and so far from justifying it, on abstract principles of restraint, our Lord rather admitted its imperfection, and threw upon the defective moral condition of the people the blame of a legislation so unsatisfactory in itself, and so evidently liable to abuse. But was not this to bend the nail to the merely conventional? Was it not to make the prescriptions of God's will dependent, in a measure, on the state and inclinations of men? Can we justly say, that he, who conceded such an accommodation to the will of man, was guided by the inspiration of Heaven?

In reply to such questions, it should, in the first instance, be borne in mind what precisely was the issue at question. It was not, as the Pharisees put it to our Lord, whether they had by the law of Moses a right or liberty to give at pleasure a bill of divorce, and put away their wives; for, as a tolerance, rather than a right. Moses did not command, he merely suffered them as Jesus said to put away their wives; and commanded, if they did so, that they should give a regularly executed deed of separation: he interposed this obstacle against the impunity of temper, or the lawlessness of caprices feeling in the matter only he carried it no further; for all besides he threw the responsibility on the parties immediately concerned. It is clear, however, that the enforced writing of a bill of divorce was of the nature of an obstacle interposed. It obliged the man to go somewhat which he feared about the business; to bring his procedure into the court of reason, if not of conscience; to make others cognizant of his intentions, and of the grounds on which he was proceeding; and to take his fellow-men to witness in respect to the course he had deemed it proper to adopt. So far as it went, this was plainly a judicial restraint in the right direction, and could scarcely fail to work upon thoughtful minds an impression of the solemnity of the marriage relationship, and a conviction that only grave faults should be enough to interfere with its claims. That the matter was not carried further arose from the provisionary nature of the old dispensation, and the lower level, as to spiritual attainments, on which its members stood, as compared with gospel times. A greater degree of stringency in the legal code might have led to an aggravation of the evil, especially to harsher treatment of the female sex—to lesser behaviour with them as unmarried, or when married, to the infliction of more frequent acts of violence to get rid of them. So that the limited restriction imposed by the law, and the consequent defective moral rule it tolerated, virtually resolves itself into the larger question, which respects the imperfect nature generally of the old economy. Being confessedly of such a nature, the discipline sanctioned and enforced by law necessarily corresponded in character. Both were marred with imperfections when brought into comparison with the higher order of things introduced by the gospel; as this again, doubtless, bears in many respects imperfections in form, and faults in administration, which shall have no place in the future kingdom of glory. But that no one in former times might think himself entitled to take advantage of what appeared legally imperfect in the prescriptions laid down respecting the marriage relationship, the proper ideal was set up before all in the record of its original institution. They saw there, if they had but a mind to look for it, what God from the first designed and aimed at by the institution; and were distinctly taught to regard everything at variance with the life union of a married pair, as a declension from the right path, a violation of the happy order and constitution appointed by God. Thus, properly considered, the difference between the old and the new here is substantially that which it is in other things— a difference in degree only, not in kind. Both pointed attention to one and the same standard of matrimonial unity, as the bound that should be maintained; that sovereignty on the part of the wife upon her burden consists in pressing a closer practical conformity to the standard, and, as a matter of course, divorcing all grounds of divorce but such as involve an actual violation of the marriage-vow.

The Roman church has sought to carry the matter a stage farther on the side of Christianity. Converting the marriage-ceremony, as celebrated between baptized parties, into a sacrament of the church, it stumps the union then formed as indissoluble, even after the ground of divorce is atoned for by special dispensation through the proper ecclesiastical authorities. This is an apparent rigour, which is well known to have led, in practice, to the greatest laxity, and to a disgraceful prostitution of the authority of the church in the interest of the rich and powerful. As regards scriptural grounds, it rests chiefly on the dignity attributed to Christian marriage as being an emblem of the union—the perpetual union—between Christ and his church, Eph. v. 22, and on the omission of any exception, even of the most plausible, as a valid ground for the dissolution of the union, in the report given of our Lord's words in Matt. v. 31-32; where it is simply stated, in explanation of the original design of marriage as instituted at the beginning, that the parties are no more to be put one flesh, than one flesh, nor to be put one flesh by man, since they have been joined by God, and that whosoever putteth away his wife and marrieth another committeth adultery against her. In such passages, however, there is nothing to justify the views of the Romanists. The passages make no distinction between marriage as celebrated between parties within, and parties without, the pale of the Christian church; it is uniformly treated in Scripture as an ordinance of a natural kind, instituted not only before the existence of the Christian church, but before the introduction either of sin or of grace into the world; and what it is declared to be for the Christian is expressly based on what it was for the primæval man. The union it establishes should indeed be held indissoluble for life by the contracting parties—on God's part it is meant to be so; but as facts are stronger than words, practical nothingness of all moral force, as the absolute connection of either with a third party must be taken from a virtual dissolution of the marriage-bond—a matter of fact separation from the proper spouse by becoming one flesh with another. So the matter is distinctly explained by the apostle, 1 Cor. xiii. 3, 4; and once and again our Lord, in delivering his mind upon the subject, expressly allows adultery in either of the parties to be a valid ground of divorce, Matt. xv. 2, 19. To understand by this divorce separation merely from bed and board, is entirely arbitrary; a separation of that sort was quite unknown alike to Jewish law and practice. The omission of the exception in question in Matt. x. 5–12, as also in Luke xvi. 18, is to be explained from the obviously abbreviated form of the statements there made, coupled with the consideration, that from the very nature of the marriage union it might be understood of itself, that an adulterous connection was a virtual reading of it as usual. The spouse who voluntarily becomes one flesh with a third party cannot, in any proper sense, remain one flesh with the party espoused in the conjugal bond; and in reason as well as law, it must be competent for the one who has been denounced and injured by the sinful act to take whatever steps may be needed for the formal dissolution of the union. Completum, yet not necessary; for the execution of a divorce in the circumstances supposed is conceded by our Lord as a right, but by no means enjoined as a duty. In many cases the right may, and perhaps ought to, be waived.

DODANIM are mentioned as the descendants of the fourth son of Javan, Genesis ii. 5. Their future settlement is not yet been definitely ascertained. As the letters g and v were frequently interchanged, traces of the name have been supposed by some to be found in the river Rhodanus; by some again in Rhodes; and some also have thought of Dodona in Epirus. There is no certainty; but the probability is that the tribe took a western direction, and formed part of the stock out of which the Greek races sprung.

DOO [belonging to love or friendship]. 1. A man of Bethlehem, father of one of David’s thirty captains.
2. Another, called Dodo the Aholite, father of Eleazar, the son of Caleb and mighty men of David, 1 Chronicles xiii. 21.
3. A man of Issachar, and grandfather of Tola the judge, Judges i. 7.

DOG (ζυγων), an Edomite herdsman of Saul, who has acquired a bad notoriety from the part he acted in respect to Ahimelech and the priests of Nob. When David in his hasty escape from Saul presented himself there, and obtained from Ahimelech, under false pretences, the showbread and Goliath’s sword, Dog was present and “detained,” it is said, “before the Lord,” 1 Samuel xi. 11. The expression is peculiar, and it is matter of doubt what sort of detention it might be that kept such a man there. The word properly means shut up or kindeled, but as there could be nothing like forcible restraint or imprisonment at such a place as the tabernacle, the expression must be understood in the milder sense of detained, on account of some vow or religious service he had to perform. Having seen, while thus detained, the reception which David met with from Ahimelech, he was able, and apparently as willing as able, to minister to the morbid jealousy of Saul, by giving information of the circumstances. When Saul, acting upon this specific information, charged Ahimelech and the priests of Nob with being accomplices in David’s rebellion, and ordered their summary execution, while the members of his body-guard with a feeling of sacred awe shrank from putting the horrible decree in force, Dog with hearty good-will supplied their lack of service. At Saul’s order, “he turned and fell upon the priests, and slew on that day fourscore and five persons that did wear a linen ephod.” That he was known to be quite capable of such truculent service to his master, is evident from the exclamation of David, when he heard of what had taken place, “O know it,” said he, “that day, when Dog the Edomite was there.” The stress laid each time that his name is mentioned on his being an Edomite, shows that he was regarded as still retaining the Edomite spirit of envious and bitter spite, even though he outwardly conformed to the customs and service of Israel. There is no reason, however, for supposing that he took generally an active part in the persecution against David, or held more than a subordinate place in the reign of Saul. And Psalm li., which was composed by David in reference to the occasion of Dog’s informing Saul of what happened at Nob, must be understood as speaking of Saul rather than Dog, under the mighty hero who devised mischief, loved lies, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. Saul was the real prophet of the evil, and it is of him especially the psalmist thinks when thus writing. Although he doubtless regarded Dog as the fitting accomplice of such a man, it still was Saul’s spirit and Saul’s cause which were chiefly characterized and denounced.

DOG (ζυγων, kbd). Frequent allusions to the dog occur in the sacred Scriptures, from which we gather that, though it was domesticated in very early times, and employed, as now, in the care of flocks, Job xxx. 1, and as the guardian of the house, Isaiah x. 32, it was generally held in little estimation, its meanness, clamour, voracity, and blood-thirstiness, being the points of its character most prominently noticed, so that “dog” became a term of contempt, involving an intensity of abhorrence which an European who has not travelled can scarcely apprehend, but which he finds still attached to it with undiminished force in the East.

The condition of things in which the dog was the humble friend and servant of man, recognized by Job when he speaks of the dogs of his flock, existed in Egypt at a period coeval with or anterior to the exodus. We still see depicted on the monuments numerous graphic representations of dogs of various breeds, several of which can with ease be identified with those of present times. Some of these are hounds similar to our harrier or fox-hound, evidently of cultivated breed and high blood; and these are repeatedly depicted as engaged in the chase, sometimes pursuing the herds of antelopes and other game, sometimes led in leash, as the hunter carries home his quarry. Greyhounds were also used in coursing, of form much purer and more resembling our own than those which are now used for the chase in Arabia Petraea. Besides these there are several races of curs, and one curiously like our turnspit, with very short legs.

The Israelites, however, appear to have carried little of this kindly association of the dog with man into Canaan. The allusion to “the price of a dog,” Deuteronomy xii, in the law—Solomon's preference of a living dog to a dead lion, Ex xii. 4 (this, however, may mean, not that the living dog is more valuable to man, but that he is better in himself and for himself—there is more power in him, or he is better off)— and the prophet Isaiah's comparison of the vile rulers of Israel to dumb and greedy dogs, Is ii. 21, are few and remote examples of appreciation of this animal's value. The esteem in which it was held appears to have been much the same as that which attaches to it in the same country to this day. The Moslems do use dogs in hunting, and the express words of Mahomet permit them to eat without scruple the prey which the hounds have killed, provided that they had not devoured any portion of it (see Ex xxii. 29). The words of the Lord to the Syrophoenician woman, and her answer, Mar. xx. 25, certainly imply a domestication and domestication of dogs; but simple toleration of their presence is all that can be gathered. They lived on what they could get. Among the Moors of North Africa a similar position of the dog is occasionally seen. They "grant him, indeed, a corner of their tent, but this is all; they never carry him, never throw him anything to eat." (Tomain's Barbs, i. 220).

For the most part, however, the dog is ownless in the East. Inhabiting every town in vast numbers, they constitute a separate and independent community, tolerating man and tolerated by him to a certain extent, but ever ready to assert their prescriptive rights, and to defend them in concert; living in the streets, they quarter the towns among themselves, and maintain with jealous pertinacity the rights of residence. A dog intruding into a street to which he does not belong, except for the purpose of joining his fellows against a common enemy, would be instantly attacked and driven back by the united force of the dogs whose region he had invaded.

As these street dogs have no masters, they are compelled to prove itself for its sustenance, feeding on carrion, and even on the dead bodies from the burying-places. Byron's vivid and horrid picture of the dogs at the siege of Corinth is drawn from the life:

"He saw the bare dogs, nor their teeth, nor his hands, nor his arms of slain—we knew them not to pieces and scattered about the streets, being denied burial. I was miserable, and almost driven to despair, at seeing and chasing the street-dogs, twice lost by the carelessness of my servants, bringing into the courtyard the heads and arms of slaughtered men, and which I could not prevent but by the destruction of the dogs themselves." (Travels, p. 20.)

During the night, which is the season of their activity, the dogs howl around the towns and in the streets in the most dismal manner. This hideous noise is generally heard with aversion, but in the East this feeling amounts to positive horror, for, common as it is, it is popularly believed to be ominous of death. In

Paracelsus it is written: "Our rubbishes of blessed memory have said, that when the dogs do howl then cometh the angel of death into the city; and I have seen it written by one of the disciples of Rabb Judah the just, that upon a time a dog did howl, and clapped his tail between his legs, and went aside for fear of the angel of death; but somehow coming and kicking the dog to the place from which he had fled, the dog presently died." What part the kicking may have played in the dog's death, the writer does not seem to have inferred. The prevalence of the animal habit, and the revulsion with which it is held, bring to remembrance David's words when the assassins of Saul watched his house to kill him—"They return at evening: they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city, let them wander up and down for meat, and growl if they be not satisfied." Ps. lx, 13, 14.

[303] Eastmen Street or Baraaq Deyr—Lambah's Syria.

In Ps. xxiii, in which "the Spirit of Christ which was in" David, "testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow," allusions to the ferocity of the dog occur. For dogs have composed me; deliver my darling from the power of the dog, ver 15. A passage in Demon will illustrate this—"It was eleven at night when I came on shore, and I was half a league from my quarters. I was obliged to go through a city taken only that morning by storm, and in which I did not know a street. No reward could induce a man to quit his boat and accompany me. I undertook the journey alone, and went over the burying ground in spite of the mutter, as I was best acquainted with this road. At the first habitations of the living I was attacked by whole troops of furious dogs, who made their attacks from the doors, from the streets, and the roads; and the barking resounded from house to house, from one family to another. I soon, however, observed that the war declared against me was not grounded on any condition, for as soon as I had quitted the territory of the attackers they were driven away by the others, who received me on their frontiers. The darkness was only lightened by the stars, and by the constant glimmer of the nights in this climate. Not to lose this advantage, to avoid the barking of the dogs, and to take a road which I knew I could not lead me astray, I left the streets, and resolved to go along the beach; but walls and limeyards, which extended to the road, blocked up the way. After having waded through the water to escape from the dogs, and climbed over the walls where the sea was too deep, exhausted by anxiety and fatigue, and quite wet, I reached one of our sentinels about midnight, in the conviction that the dog is the most dreadful among the Egyptian plagues" (Travels in Egypt, 28).
DOVE

Although, by the Mosaic law, no greater degree of uncleanness was ascribed to the dog than to any other animal whose flesh might not be eaten, since it was not expressed by name at all, yet conventionally it seems, conjointly with the swine of which the same may be predicated, to have concentrated in itself the sense of abomination among the Jews. The caudal, the horse, and the ass were ceremonially unclean in the very same degree, yet no revulsion of feeling accompanied the presence of these animals. So it is with the Moslems still. The touch of the caudal and of the horse involves no defilement, but so hateful is the contact of the hyena that the animals have become perfectly aware that it would in no wise be tolerated. "They know that they are not to come in contact with the clothes of persons in the street, and the careful attention with which they avoid doing this, even in the most crowded streets, is truly admirable. Through this mutual avoidance the dolfing contact occurs too rarely to occasion much annoyance to the inhabitants from the abounding presence in their streets of animals which they consider unclean." (Kitto's Phys. Hist. facts. note.)

DOOR. See Entrance.

DOOR-KEEPER is once mentioned in our English Bibles as an humble officer connected with the house of God: "I would rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than dwell in tents of wickedness," Psa. xxxvi. 10. Mr. Roberts, in his Oriental Illustrations of Scripture, in proof that this could not be the correct meaning of the original, drew attention to the fact that in ancient temples the door-keepers usually were persons of great honour and dignity, and that the office could not convey the idea of that humble and lowly attitude which the psalmist seemed to have in view. The correct translation is certainly somewhat different; it is, "I would rather be at the threshold of my God," rather take the attitude of a Lazarus at the door of the rich man—in other words, occupy the meanest place in the divine kingdom, than have a dwelling in the tents of wickedness; so that the post or office of door-keeper, in the modern sense, does not strictly come into consideration here.

DOR (Dorathedon), an ancient town on the Mediterranean, one of the royal cities of the ancient Canaanites, Josh. xi. 2, and a part of the heritage assigned to Manasseh, Josh. xiii. 3. It was situated, according to Jerome, about nine miles to the north of Cesarea, on the road to Tyre. Josephus refers to it under the name Dora (Ant. v. 13). A place still exists about the same spot bearing the name Tortuna, which is supposed to be the modern representative of the ancient town. It is a poor village, containing about four or five hundred inhabitants.

DORCAS. See Tabitha.

DOTHAN [dot'ath'an]. Greek Θεπεία, the name of a region not very exactly defined, but lying somewhere on the north of Samaria, not far from Shechem, and in the line of the caravan-track from Northern Syria to Egypt. It was there that the sons of Jacob were depasturing their flocks when Joseph was sent to visit them; and the well-pit, into which he was put before they sold him to the Ishmaelites, was probably one of those from which the district derived its name, Ge. xxxvii. 17. It was there also, at a much later time, that the Syrians were smitten with blindness at the word of Elias. 2 Ki. vi. 12.

DOVE (τενετζα, πιερτζη). Two species of Columbia find a conspicuous place in the Levitical law—the turtle-dove (τενετζα), and the pigeon. Both of these were appointed to be offered in the burnt-offering, Le. i. 11, the trespass-offering, ver. 7, and the sin-offering, ch. vi. 6, 8. These (or a choice of them) were the alternative permitted to these worshippers who were so poor as to be unable to present a more costly sacrifice; and it is one proof of the humiliation of our adorable Lord, that his incarnation was in circumstances of poverty so great that his mother, unable to affaid a lamb at her purification, was compelled to avail herself of this substitute. To meet the constant occurrence of similar cases, the flexible righteousness of the scriptures—flexible in everything in which the honour of God and not their own was concerned—had permitted the sellers of doves to hold their market in the temple: a provocation which edified the holy indignation of the Lord Jesus, and his consuming zeal for his Father's house. Isa. ii. 17.

The dove is the divine symbol of peace. When the waves of the flood had thoroughly done their work of judgment upon sin, the dove with an olive-leaf plucked off was the announcement of a cleansed world and a new dispensation, Ge. vi. 11, and when the waters of Jordan had flowed over Israel confessing sin, and over Jesus, the Holy Ghost descending upon him in bodily shape like a dove, and abiding upon him, Isa. xl. 22, was the sign of God's satisfaction in the work of his beloved Son, who was come to be our peace, putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

It is observable that, like as the lamb, which represents the Lord Jesus, is endowed with what may be termed several qualities, harmlessness, holiness, and meekness, which fit it to be a symbol of him who was "meek and lowly," "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners," so the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of grace and the comforter, is represented by a bird of remarkable gentleness, tenderness, purity, and love. The dove is the frequent and favourite emblem of the bride in the Song of Songs, and the praise: "Thou hast done eyes," will be appreciated by every one who has marked the gentle expression, the soft, full, liquid beauty of the eye of the dove. The voice of the dove has a tender, mournful cadence—which heard in solitude and sadness, cannot fail to be heard with sympathy—as if it were the expression of real sorrow. "We mourn sore doves," is Isa. xi. 11; Es. vii. 16; Na. ii. 7.

There is no doubt that the particular species so often mentioned under the title of dove or pigeon is the one which is known to us by the same appellation, the rock-dove (Columba livia). It is recognized both in its wild and domesticated state. The bride, in the Song of Songs, ch. ii. ii, is addressed as, "My dove, that art in the coverts of the rock;" and the prophet Jeremiah exhorts the dwellers in Moab to "dwell in the rock, like the dove that made her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth," ch. xlix. 22. These are the habits of the wild dove, which is found nesting in the cliffs and caves of the inaccessible seaward precipices that guard our islands. In the rocks and promontories of the west of England and Wales, of the Hebrides, of the Orkneys and Shetlands, this pretty dove is numerous, breeding in the crevices of the rocks and in the sides of the caverns the mouths of which are open to the sea. In the east of the Mediterranean, wherever the coast is rocky, the rock-dove abounds, and manifeats the same habitat; as also in the isles of Greece, the cliffs of the Tyrian coast, the bold headland of Carmel, and the abrupt precipices, hollowed in a thousand caves, that stretch on either side of Joppa.

But from immemorial and pre-historical antiquity

the dove has been maintained by the orientals in the dome-stituated condition, and has been used for the conveyance of letters, the sender taking advantage of the known habit of the bird to fly in a direct line to its home from incredible distances, and with great rapidity. It is on record that a carrier pigeon will carry a letter from Babylon to Aleppo, an ordinary thirty days' journey, in forty-eight hours. In Europe it has been known to accomplish a flight of several miles in little more than two hours. "The carrier-birds are represented in Egyptian bas-reliefs, where priests are shown letting them fly on a message."

The prophet Isaiah alludes to the numbers and rapid flight of these birds to their nests, in describing the final restoration of Israel after their long exile: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" ch. lx. v. Morier illustrates this comparison from what he observed in Persia. "In the environs of the city, to the westward, near the Zeinerved, are many pigeon-houses, erected at a distance from habitations, for the sole purpose of collecting pigeons' dung for manure. They are long round towers, rather broader at the bottom than the top, and crowned by conical spindles, through which the pigeons descend. Their interior resembles a honey-comb, pierced with a thousand holes, each of which forms a snug retreat for a nest. More care appears to have been bestowed upon their outside than upon that of the generality of the dwelling-houses, for they are pointed and ornamented. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which I have seen alight upon one of these buildings afford, perhaps, a good illustration of that passage in Is. lx. 8. Their great numbers, and the compactness of their mass, literally look like a cloud at a distance, and obscure the sun in their passage" (Second Journey through Persia, 141.)

Dove's Dung, occurring in 2 Ki. vi. 2, has caused some trouble to commentators. The intensity of the famine during the siege of Samaria by Benhadad is thus described—"Behold, they besieged it until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cubit of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." Two or three interpretations are given of the phrase. Some have supposed that the actual excrement of the bird was eaten, or that it was used for fuel, or that salt was extracted from it. The latter two suppositions are irrelevant to the famine; the first is simply absurd. Others, receiving, with the rabbinical writers, the same sense of the word, explain it by the value set upon this substance as manure. Thus, Porter and Morier both assures as it is used in Persia. According to the latter, "the dung of pigeons is the dearest manure that the Persians use; and as they apply it almost entirely for the rearing of melons, it is probably on that account that the melons of Isphahan are so much finer than those of other cities. The revenue of a pigeon-house is about a hundred thousand per annum" (Second Journey, 141.) Porter says "two hundred thousand" (Travels, i. 12.)

Now, though the orientals consume an enormous quantity of these fruits, the doves' dung in the text could hardly have been used thus. The want of food was imminent, and we cannot conceive either of doves being still kept in the city to yield manure (for surely if they were there, they would have been themselves eaten, or of people cooly setting to work to cultivate melons, as if they had plenty of time before them.

Another supposition has been that the crew of the pigeon, filled with incriminated partly digested grain or pulse, is intended. This is plausible: for the birds might easily have flown over the investing army, and fed daily in the country beyond, returning to their homes in the besieged city. But the same objection lies against this supposition. Whatever tame pigeons had been in the city, must have been killed long before the famine reached its utmost extremity; nor would any fortunate possessor of such birds have allowed them to fly at liberty through a starving garrison. Moreover, as the quantity mentioned was an English pint (the cab being about half a gallon), a number of doves must have been killed to furnish this amount of half-digested food, which would imply plenty rather than scarcity. Whence came the doves? This interpretation, therefore, is manifestly untenable.

It has, however, been shown from certain ancient authorities, that there was some inferior kind of grain or pulse, called, perhaps in contempt, or perhaps from some fancied resemblance in form or colour, "dove's dung." Bochart identifies this with the seeds of the chick-vetch, great quantities of which are dried, parched, and stored in magazines at Cairo and Damascus, for use on long journeys. If this is correct, we may well understand how secret stores of this poor grain may have been turns to advantage in the famine. Linnaeus, and Sprungd following him, have identified the Orthoptera umbilatuma, or common star-of-Bethlehem, as the doves' dung of Scripture. The latter says—"Among the Hebrews there was a plant called doves' dung on account of the colour of the flowers—white mixed with greenish, a mixture which is observed in the dung of many herbivorous birds. For this is the Orthoptera umbilatuma which occurs throughout the East, and has catesful bulbs, though they are sought for only by the poor" (Helv. i. 92). If it be objected that the be-sieged could not get out into the fields to search for these roots, we might remind the objector that in many oriental cities there is a large portion of the land not built upon, sometimes amounting to one fourth, or even one-third of the entire area inclosed, but forming fields and gardens. In these spots, in the angles of the walls and under the houses, a supply of such roots might still afford the uncommon search of a starving people.

The name of the prophet Jonah is identical with that of the dove.

DOWRY, in its general acceptance, is the money which is settled, or given, in connection with a marriage contract, on behalf of one of the parties. According to the customs of modern civilized communities the dowry is settled upon the female, and is given or promised by her father, or contracting spouse. But in Old Testament scripture, and in the usage generally of the East, the dowry is what the husband pays to the father in order to obtain his daughter for wife—a sort of purchase-money, which he gives in lieu of her. Thus Jacob gave his seven years' service as dowry for his wife; Shechem offered to give to the family of Jacob "never so much dowry and gift," if he might be permitted to retain Dinah as his wife; and David, in like manner, instead of dowry, was allowed to win his title to Saul's daughter by an hundred foreskins of the Philistines. See also Ho. iii. 2, where the common practice in this respect is taken for granted, as the basis of the prophetic representation. The practice undoubtedly in-dicated an imperfect civilization, and never can exist where woman occupies the place she does in European society.

DRAGON (ἱππόν, tannob, ἱππον, tannimus, tannin, tannin; ἱππος). These words seem always to have reference to some animal of serpentine character and large size, an object of mystic terror, inhabiting desolate places, and having also aquatic habits. Perhaps no known species of animal could be named to which all the characters attributed to the scriptural ἱππος belong.

The word in its various forms was probably used with a certain measure of vagueness, especially when the creature alluded to is presented to us as an element in a general description, or as a symbol of some other being, human or spiritual.

In the former of these categories may be included all such passages as those in which Babylon, Is. xiii., Edom, Is. xxxiv. 13, Jerusalem, Isa. iv., Habor, Jer. xxxii. 35, &c., are described as "a habitation of dragons," and such employ the word as a simile of desolation, as Job xxx. 29; Ps. xiv. 6; Mi. i. 8, &c. In the latter sense we find it as the symbol of Pharaoh, Ex. xvii. 3; xxvii. 2; Ps. lxxxix. 13, Is. ii. 19, and apparently of Satan, as the master-spirit of Rome, in Is. xxvii. 1; Re. xii. et seq. passion, and in his own personality in Re. xx. 2.

It is in these images that we shall find whatever of zoological incongruity attaches to the appellation dragon. In some of the passages wherein the word is used to represent the Egyptian despot, a huge monster, with feet and scales, inhabiting the Nile, is depicted, which can leave us no doubt that the crocodile is intended. In those in which Satan is represented, the word used is interchangeable with serpent; and a form decidedly ophiom, though with mystical adjuncts, is presented to the mind. It is therefore the serpents—some of which are fatally venomous ("the poison of dragons," Ps. cxix. 13)—for ruined and desolate places will account for the employment of the image in the first-named sense. The ruins of ancient cities swarm with venomous snakes to such a degree that it is necessary to use the utmost caution in exploring them.

Sometimes an actual creature is intended by the word, as when the rod of Moses and those of the magi-cians were changed into serpents (tanninim). As these must have been of no more than a few feet in length, they may afford us some light by which to judge of the more indefinite use of the word. Perhaps it has been too hastily assumed that great constricting serpents, as the pythons, are always intended. The tannin of ruined cities are in general of comparatively small size: the pythons do not, so far as we are aware, frequent such situations, nor are any species now found in Western Asia or North Africa. Abundant evidence, however, exists, that great constricting serpents were familiar to the ancients. Figures of such, of enormous size, are depicted on the Egyptian monuments. The picture so elegantly drawn by Theocritus (idyl xxvii.) of the serpents which were strangled by the infant Hercules, and the well-known story of Laocoon, undoubtedly refer to reptiles of this nature. Moreover, in sober narrative, Aristotle tells (vii. 29) of serpents of monstrous size on the coast of Libya, and relates that certain voyagers were pursued by some of them so large that their weight overset one of the galleys. And the Roman historians (Val. Max. ii. 3, etc.) have perpetuated, not without admiration, the memory of a serpent skin by Regulus near Carthage, the skin of which, preserved at Rome till the Muslim war, measured, on the authority of the writers themselves who declare that they had seen it, 120 feet. Perhaps the length was exaggerated, and the skin was doubtless much stretched; but after making every allowance, we cannot refuse assent to the fact that a serpent of enormous size had been so exhibited. Modern Niclius mentions a serpent which was captured, not without loss of human life, in Egypt, and which was taken to Alexandria; it measured 39 cubits, or about 45 feet in length. And Suetonius says that one was exhibited in front of the Capitol at Rome which was 50 cubits, or 75 feet in length (in Oct. xii). Colonel Hamilton Smith refers (Cyclop. Fab. i. 12. art. Dragon) to the skeleton of a serpent above 100 feet in length, found recently in India, but gives no other particulars, which, considering the great interest of the subject, is remarkable.

The word ἱππός (tannin) is occasionally rendered chaos in the English Bible, as in Ge. i. 21 and Job vii. 12. On one occasion, i.e. iv. 3, our translators have given sea-monsters in the text, and put sea-calfes, as an optional rendering, in the margin. As in this last passage the animals are said to "draw out the breast and give suck to their young ones," the usual signification of serpent, or crocodile, or any other reptile, is perfectly inapplicable, since none of these suckle their young. The rendering "whale" may probably be the correct one here, either signifying some of the large cetaceae which occasionally penetrate both the Mediterranean and Red Sea, or that species of dugong (Halichoerus), one of the aquatic pachydermata, called cow-whales, which inhabits the latter Gulf. Several of the passages in which the word hath received its more ordinary rendering, have more or less obvious allusion to the sea as the habitat of the monster in question; and when Jehovah, personating Jerusalem, says of the king of Babylon, "He hath swallowed me up like a dragon,... he hath cast me out," there may be a reference to the swallowing and resurrection of Jonah by the "great fish." The snuffing up of the wind, Is. xvi. 6, and the wailing of dragons, Mat. xiii. 27, are inapplicable as referring to any of the animals we have mentioned.

DREAMS. Considered simply as natural phenomena, dreams have much the same character ascribed to them in Scripture as they are wont to bear in common life. They are the result of the inattention of their momentary occupants, coming and going without any control of the will or reason, and as in wild and freakish humour confounding together the true and the false, the real and the fictitious, they are the natural antithesis of what is solid and lasting; the fit emblems of a fleeting, unstable, fleeting existence. Hence the wicked are spoken of as flying away like a dream, Jer. iv. 4, disappearing after a short season like an unsubstantial fabric; or, as it is again, they are as a dream when a man wake, no sooner searched for than gone, Isa. xvii. 20. To have multitudes of dreams is represented as having also to do with vanity, Eccl. v. 17; and to score one with dreams is all one with conjuring up and attempting to frighten one with imaginary fears and menaced dangers, Job iii. 6.

One can easily understand, however, that the state of mind which gives rise to the phenomena of dreaming night with peculiar facility be rendered sub-relevant to the purpose of divine communications. For, it has this in common with states of rapt thought or spiritual elevation, that through the perfect repose of the bodily senses direct intercourse with the external world is suspended; the soul is withdrawn within itself, and is susceptible only of the influences which affect the inner organs of thought and emotional feeling. Such influences may come in all ordinary cases of dreaming, for they do come from the play of nervous excitation, stirring into exercise the memory, the fancy, and the affections; and so to a large extent they take the hue of the natural temper and the experience of everyday life. But they may also come from a higher source—from the Father of spirits, seeking to convey impressions of his mind and will to men. Then, the two points in which dreams differ most characteristically from one's waking thoughts—its ideal character, and their independence of the will of him that is conscious of them—are points of assimilation between the subject of dreams and the recipient of a divine communication; both alike may be said to be borne out of themselves, and to have thoughts presented to their minds, or visions spread before their mental eye, which they have not themselves hidden into existence, and are incapable of controlling. There is thus a certain natural affinity between the state and operations of the soul in dreaming, and its state and operations when acted on by the impulse of a higher power, so as to be made to hear the words and see the vision of the Almighty. Hence, we may account for the readiness which has ever appeared among men to ascribe their dreams to God, whenever these have been of a more remarkable character than usual, and have left a deep impression upon their minds. It has seemed to them, in such cases, as if they had been in the hands of a supernatural agency, bringing them into immediate contact with things lying beyond the reach of human discernment, and most commonly causing events of weight or woe to enter their shadow before. In ancient times the traces of this belief were both of early origin and widely diffused. That a dream also is of Jesus, appears in Homer as an accredited maxim (νατύ νυμφίνι καὶ ἁλός δοσὶ σέαν, ἡμίονον καὶ σέαν)." Hence "En minimat e mnemum, cum qua Di nostri loquuntur" (v. 60). See Westcott on Mat. x. 29.

But what the ignorant and superstitious in heathendom only imagined, was often found to be a reality where the knowledge of God prevailed. Among the Egyptians, the diviners, in which "in which from ancient times God made known his mind to men, dreams had a recognized place, and played frequently an important part. It is a remarkable fact, however, that they were not confined to prophets strictly so called, but were occasionally given to persons who came only into incidental contact with the covenant people; and sometimes so given, that not so much the dream itself, as the capacity of interpreting the dream, was what bespoke the intervention of Heaven, and the possession of a supernatural insight. On this account, the Bible distinguishes between heaven-born dreams and prophetic visions, and even between one kind of dreams and another, calling some "true" dreams only, and other "prophetic" dreams. So Maimonides in his Mish. Nevi. p. i. iv. 29, "When it is said in holy Writ that God came to such a man in a dream of the night, that cannot be called a prophecy, nor such a man a prophet; for the meaning is no more than this, that some admonition or instruction was given by God to such a man, and that it was in a dream." Of this sort were reckoned the dreams given to Abimelech, Laban, Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, which we are either of a simply admonitory nature, or required the aid of a strictly inspired man to turn them to account, and render them predictions of the approaching future. How early, and how commonly also, in regard to such dreams the belief had established itself, that they were of divine origin and of prophetic import, appears both from the recent regard paid to them, when they were distinctly understood, as in the cases of Abimelech and Laban, Gen. xx. 13; xxx. 24, and from the ancient practice, carried on apparently by a professional class, of interpreting dreams. When Pharaoh awoke from the dream respecting the fat and the lean kine, the plump and the thin ears of corn, and was pressed with anxiety about its meaning, he sent for the magicians and wise men of Egypt, as if he had a right to expect from them a solution of the mystery that would relieve him of his trouble, Gen. iv. The same thing, indeed, had substantially come out previously in the case of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh, who, after having had their respective dreams, bewailed their condition, that they were where they could have no access to an interpreter of dreams, Gen. i. So that even at that early period the interpretation of dreams must have existed in Egypt as a kind of recognized profession; and in later times the ancients (as they were called), interpreters of dreams, formed a sort of regular guild among the learned of Egypt, or certain of these cultivated the art as a distinct department of their mystic lore (Warburton's 'Lectures on Moses,' b. 1, s. 6). And that it was not otherwise at Babylon is evident from the imperative demand made by Nebuchadnezzar of the wise men of his court to interpret his dreams, and even communicate to him the nature of his dreams, Neb. xii. 4, 5. How vain the art was in such hands, and how utterly ineffective it proved in real emergencies, the Lord took occasion to show by means of the transactions which occurred in the histories of Joseph and Daniel. But that dreams of the higher class—dreams of a strictly prophetic character, and given to prophetic men—were among the regular modes of divine revelation in ancient times, appears alone from what may be regarded as the fundamental passage regarding prophetic agency in Israel, Ex. xii. 4. In that passage the Lord intimated, that he would raise up prophets, through whom he would make divine communications and actions of his will, and that when he did so he would "make himself known to them in a vision, and speak to them in a dream." Here also the Jewish doctors were wont to distinguish, and to assert for the mode of revelation by vision a higher place than belonged to the dream. But there seems no proper ground for the distinction, more especially for saying, that the one (vision) usually seized the prophet while he was awake, but that he was susceptible of the other only when asleep. In reality they seem to have been generally combined together—as in the case of Jacob on the plains of Bethel, when in a sleep that was emboldened, if any other was, with prophetic elevation, he at once saw the vision and in a dream heard the words of God. The dream, it is to be understood, as well as the vision, in all cases of real intercourse with Heaven, had marked peculiarities, which stamped it upon the prophet's own mind as the effect of a strictly divine agency. And the Jewish writers seem to have judged rightly in supposing, that while the imaginative faculty was set forth as a stage, on which certain appearances and images were represented to the understandings of the prophets, as they are in ordinary dreams, yet in divine dreams the understanding was always kept awake, and strongly acted on by God in the midst of those apparitions, that it might discern the intelligible mysteries in them (Smith's 'Cyclopedia of Prophecy,' c. 2). In this undeniably was implied an ecstatic elevation of spirit—the being, as it is sometimes called, in a trance—and a remarkable distinctness in the objects presented to the internal eye and ear of the prophet, such as other men had not, nor the prophet himself in his ordinary state. Yet it was an imperfect mode of revelation, and was accompanied with a measure of darkness in regard to the substance of the divine communications, which was wanting in the highest mode of revelation. In this respect it is expressly distinguished from that given to Moses in the Old Testament, with whom God spake not by dream or vision, but face to face, Ex. xiii. 7. And in New Testament times (with one exception in the case of Peter, Ac. x., one in Paul's, 2 Co. xii. 1, and again in the Apocalyptic communications of John) the mode of revelation by dream or vision was superseded by the open and direct announcements of our Lord and his apostolic delegates. When it was spoken by God of these things, then through the copious outpouring of God's Spirit, even "young men should see visions, and old men should dream visions," it is to be understood as uttered from the Old Testament point of view, when such were the distinctive modes of the Spirit's more peculiar working among men: and hence it is applied by the apostle Peter to the manifestations of spiritual agency on the day of Pentecost, when there were indeed marvellous displays of the Spirit's power, such as amply realized the prophetic anticipation, and not the less, relative to the more, that they were without the ancient accompaniments of vision or dream. The men of God now became directly conversant with divine realities, and in their waking state could both receive and give forth their impressions of them. It only remains to notice, that during the periods when revelation by dream or vision was the ordinary mode of conveying special communications to men, there were not wanting counterfeit appearances of this description, especially in the meaner classes of society, arising to possess, the character of the true. Such especially was the case amid the troubles and excitaments that prevailed toward the close of the theocracy in its regal form. "I have heard," says Jeremiah, ch. xiii. 25, "what the prophets said that prophesy lies in my name, I have dreamed, I have dreamed"—implying, in the very form of their announcement, what was the usual mode of receiving prophetic revelations, but betraying at the same time the hypocritical or deluded spirit under which they laboured. To the like effect also he speaks in other passages—Jer. xxii. 16; xxiii. 2; also Ez. xiii. 2, 7, where false visions, rather than false dreams, are ascribed to them. These lying pretences doubtless began in hypocrisy, but maintained, as they were, in the face of so much danger, and with such strange persistence, it would seem that the persons making claim to them had become to a large extent the victims of their own delusions.

DRESS. The notices we have of the clothing of the covenant-people, whether in Old or New Testament times, are chiefly on incidental kind, and could not of themselves suffice for anything like a minute or even definite description of them. But in Palestine, and in eastern countries generally, the dress of the people, like their common usages, continues from age to age with little change: foreign immigrants or invaders, such as the Turks, have brought along with them a certain amount of foreign costume; but the people who may be regarded as the more proper representatives of the region appear to have preserved, with no material deviation, the kinds and modes of apparel which were in use thousands of years ago. In giving a brief outline of the information that is accessible upon the subject, we shall treat first of the kinds of garments worn, and then of the materials and arts employed in the fabrication of them.

I. In regard to the garments themselves, those worn on the person were formerly, as they still are, of a loose and flowing description. Hence, they did not admit of that sharp and easily recognized distinction between male and female attire, which prevails in the civilized countries of the West. There still were, however, characteristic differences, which the law, for obvious reasons of propriety and decorum, ordered to be main-
DRESS

The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the LORD, saith the Lord (Ex. xxiii. 24). The difference appears chiefly in the use of veils by the women, and the covering generally of the head, together with articles of ornament, which were reckoned proper for the one sex, but not for the other. (1) There was, first of all, and common to both sexes, the covering by way of eminence, the under-garment, which protected the body from utter nudity. It was named in Heb. kutoneth, from an obsolete root to cover, and in Greek παραπλευρία. The rendering of κοφτή, which is that commonly adopted for both the Hebrew and the Greek terms in the English Scriptures, is fitted to suggest a wrong idea of its nature; for it was not a closely fitted garment, though closer than what was worn above it, reaching to the knees or under, and with sleeves to the elbow, sometimes even to the wrists. It came nearer, therefore, to an ordinary shirt or nightgown than any other garment we are accustomed to wear. And when our Lord, on first sending out his disciples, told them not to take two tunics with them, Mat. x. 10, it came much to the same thing as saying, in plain English, that they should take but one shirt with them. This article of dress was most probably very similar to one worn in Egypt at the present day, and shown in the illustration.

reaching to near the ankles, but without sleeves. It was worn by women, also by the priests, Ex. xxiii. 24, and by persons in the higher ranks of life, 1 Sam. xiv. 7; xvii. 4. It is commonly rendered παραπλευρία or κοφτή in the English version. The veil appears to be indicated in the engraving No. 297, from an Assyrian bas-relief in the British Museum, from Kouyunjik, showing Sennacherib before the town of Lachish; the figures are intended for Jewish captives, the men wearing the sleeveless meil, the women having a veil, probably the mitpahath, over the former article of dress.

In the second illustration (No. 298) from same bas-relief, there are other Jewish captives wearing very short garments, perhaps intended to represent the kutenath, but confined round the waist by a broad girdle with a fringed end; or else it is to show the kutenath and drawers worn under it. The turban-like head-dresses of these figures are very remarkable; and similarly dressed men occur in another bas-relief, where several files of men are empleted in dragging a colossal sculpture, a man-headed bull, belts destined sites, and these doubtless are meant for Jewish captives working under their Assyrian oppressors. (3) Then there was the mantle, properly so called, frequently termed cloth in our version, the chitone of the Greeks, and the salīma or, as it more commonly is, shalah, of the Hebrews. This was simply a piece of square cloth

a sort of large blanket or plaid, which is now, and probably was also in former times, thrown around the shoulders, or to leave the right arm free — the one end of the garment being put a little over the left shoulder, whence it is taken behind under the right arm, and after being drawn across the chest, is thrown again over the left side, and hung down behind. The figures in woodcut No. 289, representing two Syrians and an Egyptian gentleman, show the article and the mode of wearing it. The modern Bedouins (No. 210) use instead of this a sort of square cloth, with an opening in front, and slits in the sides to let out the arms; but it may be doubted if this form of the garment was in use among the covenant people. For we read of their

sometimes drawing their cloak or mantle over their heads, which agrees better with the other form. 2 Sa. xx. 18. And so also does the circumstance that the poor are known to have used it as a blanket by night. Hence the merciful prescription in Ex. xxiii. 25, "If thou at all take thy neighbour’s raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that sun goeth down: for that is his covering only; it is his raiment for his skin; wherein shall he sleep?" It is apparently the same sort of garment which is occasionally called milāṣatha (משלת), which Ruth, for example, had about her when she lay down on the barn-floor of Boaz, and which was so spacious and firm of texture that it could contain six measures of barley, [210a] Thun. Though called a veil in our version, it was manifestly a sort of blanket or sheet, which during the day had been laid over the head and shoulders, and at night was probably thrown as a covering around the person. This large veil is well illustrated by one worn by Egyptian women at the present day, called the meilāb, as the annexed figure shows (No. 211); and the similarity of this to the veil indicated in the Assyrian sculpture already referred to is very striking — although it is necessary to make some allowance for the archaic style of the sculpture. It does not seem to have been properly a different garment, but the same in a more expanded and imposing form, which was called milāṣath, literally, wide or expanded — the name given to Elijah’s mantle, 1 K. xix. 13, 15; 2 K. ii. 11, and to the Babylonish garment which attracted the covetousness of Achan, Jos. vii. 21. That the name could be applied to two pieces of raiment so different in point of quality, shows that it had reference to the form and use of the article, not to the kind of cloth from which it was prepared; and the derivation of the word clearly points to the amplitude of the article as its distinguishing characteristic. (4) The loose and cumbersome nature of these garments, especially of the longer tunic or milād, naturally led to the use of another article — the girdle or belt around the waist, necessary for the purpose of drawing the garments close to the person, and tucking them up when one was going about any active employment. To put on one’s girdle, or gird one’s self up, was simply to prepare for action, as to undo it was to give way to repose. It was also, however, used as a convenient part of the dress for placing the daggers in, and such things as the purse, scep, handkerchief, or other small appendages. The sword was more commonly suspended from a belt passing over the right shoulder, and the weapon hung on the left side in a nearly horizontal position, as in the figure from an Assyrian bas-relief in the British Museum (No. 212). The incident described in 2 Sa. xxv, 8, could thus easily have occurred, from the sword having somehow been put out of its slightly pendant position.

The were the principal and ordinary parts of the dress worn upon the person by the Israelites; certain things besides, such as drawers and an ephod, which were appointed to be worn by the priests, appear to have been confined to them, though it is possible short drawers reaching to the middle of the thigh may have been commonly worn in ancient times, as they are now. Various figurative modes of expression were derived from these articles of dress by the sacred writers, but from none so much as from the girdle. With reference to its use in fitting the body for active service, we have, in 1 Pe. i. 13, the allusion to "gird up the loins of our mind." Its adhesive property, not only itself clinging to the person, but bringing the other garments also into closer contact with it, supplies the prophet Jeremiah with an image of the binding attachment of the converted Israel to God: "As the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man, so have I caused to cleave unto me the whole house of Israel," etc. And not very different is the mode of it by Isaiah, when, pointing to the coming Messiah, he said, "And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins," etc. meaning that these qualifications should have that kind of controlling and binding influence over all his purposes and actions which the girdle has in respect to the bodily attire. The completeness of the covering afforded by the midr or outer garment is referred to by the same prophet, when he speaks of the Lord clothing himself with zeal as with a cloak, etc. in it, having his being, as it were, all enwrapped in this fiery element. In another aspect of the same thing, it is taken as a symbol of the covering or protections which transgressors seek to obtain from the charge of sin, such as, "having no cloak for their sin," or "using liberty for a cloak of maliciousness," Is. xxi. 19, etc. But as the midr formed the most conspicuous part of the attire, and in persons of quality was doubtless made of fine material and variously ornamented, so it is sometimes employed as the peculiar emblem of what is graceful and becoming in appearance; as when Job speaks of his judgment being like a robe in midr and a diadem, and the Messiah himself is prophetically represented as being covered with a robe of righteousness, Is. xi. 11, etc. In later times it would appear that significance was attached to the amplitude of this outer garment, since the scribes are charged by our Lord with loving to walk in long robes, 6 xix. 13, manifestly for the purpose of presenting before men a majestic and imposing appearance. It was this part of the dress also which, in times of grief and mourning, was rent at the bottom; whence the reading of the garments was regarded as a common symbol of mourning, Jer. viii. 21.

In addition to the more essential and common dresses already mentioned, a great many articles are known to have been used of an ornamental kind, chiefly by women of gay and luxurious manners. The full and most elaborate specification of these on record is that given by the prophet Isaiah in ch. iii. 17-25, when speaking of the outward raiment that was going to be belted them, and the decoration and scarlet that were soon to take the place of all their finery. There is some doubt about the precise meaning of some of the words employed in the description, and little comparatively can now be known of the exact shape and form of several of the things mentioned; but we shall give the description itself, accompanied with the explanations that are now commonly adopted respecting them. "In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet; and the eardrums, and the violet, and the ornaments; and the crescents for the head; the chains (ear-rings, pendants, and the bracelets for the arm or neck), and are very fine. The "round tires like the moon," probably similar to an article of head-dress of the modern Egyptians, the "dromedaries," or moon represented by No. 211, and made of thin plates of gold. The head-bands exhibited (No. 215), are all, excepting one, from Egyptian paintings, and probably indicate jewelled dresses for the head; and it is the head-band of the queen of Sardanapalus III., from a bas-relief found at Kouyunjik. In the group of necklaces (No. 216), is a necklace of Egyptian, and are fine examples of goldsmiths' work; the necklace of Sardanapalus III., from the bas-relief just referred to, and appears there hanging to the couch, on which the monarch sits, while feasting with his queen. The necklaces at are also from the Assyrian sculptures. But these under are Egyptian, and are fine examples of goldsmiths' work;

presents the necklace of Sardanapalus III., from the bas-relief just referred to, and appears there hanging to the couch, on which the monarch sits, while feasting with his queen. The necklaces at are also from the Assyrian sculptures. But these under are Egyptian, and are fine examples of goldsmiths' work; they belong to an early period, and are now in the British Museum. The beads are of gold, and the pendants are richly enamelled.

The common attire for the foot was sandals, not shoes in the ordinary sense of the term; but as this was connected with customs and allusions peculiar to itself, we reserve it for separate consideration under SANDALS. Many of the other articles also, incidentally noticed, such as rings, nose-jewels, anklets, veils, fringes or girdles, will be found treated separately under their own names.

II. In regard now to the preparation of the different articles of clothing, with the mode and materials employed in their manufacture, it is clear from various allusions in Scripture that the matter was very much in the hands of females. This was inevitable from the Israelites being chiefly an agricultural and pastoral people, on which account arts and manufactures of a public description were scarcely known, and their place, so far as domestic fabrics were concerned, was chiefly supplied by the skill and industry of the women. The spinning of the yarn was one of their principal employments, so that the prudent housewife is celebrated for taking hold of the distaff, and laying her hands to the spindle, Ex. xxii. 19. The weaving, too, in all probability was chiefly conducted by females, as in early times it was among the Greeks, and still is among the Arabs, with whom, to use the words of Birkhard, "the loom is placed before the kitchen or women's apartment, and worked by the mother and her daughters." The woollen No. 217, representing two female weavers at work, is taken from the Egyptian monuments, The garments being of a kind that required little skill in shaping, they would naturally be fashioned and sewed by the female domestics of each dwelling. For workmanship of the higher kinds, such as was required for the more ornamental dresses and articles of embroidery, regularly trained and skilled craftsmen must have been required—to which class belonged, at the period of the exodus, Bezaleel and Aholiab, and others with them, of whom it is said that the Lord "had filled them with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, and in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver," Ex. xxxv. 35. It is probable that after the children of Israel were settled in Canaan the greater part of the articles which they got of this sort and more ornate description, were purchased from the travelling merchants, who carried on the inland trade between Palestine and the rich manufacturing or importing districts of Egypt, Babylon, Tyre, and Sidon.

The Babylonish garment found by Achan at the plunder of Jericho is a proof how early this trade had extended itself through the region afterwards occupied by the Israelites. (See Embroidery.)

As to the making of the garments, there are only two specifications given in Scripture, leaving it to be inferred that in other respects the people might conform to the customs prevalent around them. One of these was that they were not to wear a garment of divers sorts, of woollen and linen together, Deut. xxii. This instruction comes in along with some others, forbidding similar unnatural combinations—sowing a vineyard with diverse seeds, ploughing with an ox and an ass together. The object aimed at was undoubtedly of a moral kind, because deficiency is mentioned as the consequence of using such intermixture; and the direction must therefore proceed on the same principle as that on which the regulations about food were based—the principle of making the outward and ordinary transactions of life serve as the reflex of what they were called to be and do in the things of God. The Jehovah whom Israel was pledged in covenant to serve was the God of nature as well as of holiness; he had appointed certain distinctions in the one, and these he would have to be observed, not only on their own account, but also because they were fitted to remind his people of like distinctions in the other, which it was their special calling as his people to preserve. And so, the wearing of garments free from the mixing of diverse kinds, perpetually admonished them that their God was the God of order. It is, order even in the lower concerns of the material world, and how much more in the all-important interests of truth and righteousness. Here, above all, they must keep to the eternal landmarks which he has fixed. Of course the prohibition, like all others of a like kind, ceased with the introduction of a stated thing, to teach men to discover modes of instruction and discipline. The other permission had respect to the putting of fringes of blue upon the four wings or corners of their mantles. Nu. vii. 12. The particular part of the ramment on which these blue fringes were to be fixed is not stated; but as they were intended to catch the eye of the wearer, they must have been put upon the mitz or the simlah, the outer tunic or the mantle, naturally, indeed, upon the latter, which was also the only one that had four distinct corners. And the object of this, like the former peculiarities, was entirely moral; it was to serve the purpose of a sacred memorial, that when they looked upon the sky blue on their garments they might lift their souls heavenwards. "And remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them, and might not seek after their own heart and their own eyes." It may seem to us a very artificial mode of conveying such an admonition; but it would appear quite otherwise to the covenant people, who were taught by the whole character of their institutions to see the spiritual and heavenly in all those earthly relations they tilled, and the external service supplied at their hand. — See Fussler.

There can be no doubt that a large proportion of the garments anciently worn by the descendants of Abraham were of woollen material, as still is the case with the mass of the people in and around Palestine. The familiar allusion of our Lord in his parable respecting the old garment and the new patch, the one not only agreeing with the other, and certain also to make the worst worse, is alone a proof of this. For he speaks of a garment generally; and yet, what he says strictly holds only of woollen garments, the old dingies, and such things, the new mottled, and rarely, when exposed to the atmosphere, to contract and tear the flacker portions next it. Cotton and linen however were also in use, if, as is now generally supposed, what was called mesh or fop, and is always rendered linen in our version, comprised cotton as well. In this article great skill was displayed from very early times in regard to the fineness of the fabric and the workmanship; and in this respect alone abundance of scope would be afforded for those who sought to distinguish themselves by the expense and prosperity of their attire. The richness and variety of the colours employed, to which reference is often made in Scripture, afforded other opportunities for gaiety and expense.

Hence, in our Lord's graphic portraiture of the rich and luxurious worldling, we find both these marks of superiority in dress distinctly indicated—"clothed in purple and fine linen," Lu. xvi. 19; and the coat of many colours which Jacob gave to his son Joseph shows how early the taste in this direction had begun to manifest itself. Along with the fineness of the quality, and the richness of the colours employed, there was also from early times a disposition to indulge in varieties of scales of apparel, as appears alone from the five changes of ramment which Joseph gave to his brother Benjamin, Ge. xlv. 22. In after times indications frequently discovery themselves of the same tendency, Is. x. 29; xlv. 6; Ze. xii. 3; and the richer families seem to have prided themselves on having a store of fine dresses for any occasion that might arise, Is. xvi. 2, xlv. 10, xlv. 22.

It is quite uncertain how far the ancient heathen were acquainted with silk as an article of dress, or, if they were, when it was introduced. The word is occasionally used in our English Bibles, but the corresponding word in the original is not always the same, nor is it certain whether the terms were applied to what is strictly called silk, or to a soft and fine texture of linen or cotton stuff. — See Silk.

BRUSILLA, the youngest daughter of that Herod who is mentioned in Acts xii. She was celebrated for her beauty, but was of loose character, having been married to the king of Lusus (Azazus), and afterwards abandoned him in order to live with the procurator Felix. Ac. xxiv. 19. She bore a son to this worthless paramour, who was named Agrippa, and both mother and son perished in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which took place in the days of Titus Cesar (Jos. Act. xvii. 5.)

Duke, a title applied in Ge. xxviii. to the heads or leaders of the different families of the Edomites. The word in the original שַׂעַר, sāhār, from the root to lead or guide, exactly corresponds to our duke in its primary import, which is from the Latin dux, leader, and this again from dōnus, lord. This primary import, however, has been very much lost sight of, in consequence of the application of the term to the highest class of our nobility; and it had been better if the simple rendered at leader or prince had been adopted for the heads of the Edomite families.

DUMAH [Doomah]. 1. The name of Edom's sixth son, Ge. xvi. 31; and probably on this account the name above a district, with its inhabitants, in the commarion of Syria and Arabia. The Arabs still call a place in that region by the name of Dommel-al-Dheib, i.e., the rocky Dumah. As an inhabited district it is the subject of a very enthusiastic prophecy in Isaiah, xliii. 11, and is there viewed in connection with Sich. —2. There was another Dumah, a town belonging to the tribe of Judah, Is. xxvi. 22; but of which nothing is known except that it is placed by Eusebius at the distance of 17 miles from Beuthopolis, in Phœnicia.

Dura, a Babylonian plain, in which Nebuchadnezzar set up his golden image, and assembled people from the greatest distances to worship it to. In certain traces have been found of its precise locality, but it is with probability supposed to have been either the plain in which Babylon itself stood, or some other at no great distance from it.

Dust is often used figuratively in Scripture as an image of what is low, mean, and impure. Hence Abishai call himself but "dust and ashes," 2 Sa. xx. 3, and the preceding custom in the East from the earliest times has been, in seasons of grief and distress, to sit down in the dust, and even to cover the person with it. Many allusions to this custom appear in Scripture. (So sūār 'mawrānā.) Throwing dust on one has also in all ages been a mode of showing indignation and contempt; thus Shimei, among other acts of outrageous behaviour, cast dust at David, and the Jews, when enraged at Paul, threw dust in the air. — 2 Sa. xvi. 13; Acts Dust, a merely natural phenomenon, often plays a part in the East to which the inhabitants of colder and mosaic climates are comparative strangers. It was one of the threatenings uttered by Moses in respect to the contemplated apostasy and rebelliousness of the people.

"The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, till thou be destroyed," De. xxxii. 21.

The deserts which lie partly within the territory of Judea and partly in its vicinity, contain an accumulation of dust or fine sand, which, when agitated and raised by the wind, sometimes assume the aspect of a cloud, and is fraught with annoyance and danger. In seasons of drought it is capable of spreading sterility and desolation to a degree that could scarcely be imagined; and in its more violent forms it involves those who come within its sweep in an atmosphere of suffocation. The crusaders occasionally suffered considerable from this cause, as is reported by their ancient historian Yirmi'ah, quoted by Harmer (Observations, iv. 191). "Journeying, they were thrown into great perturbation by the air's being thickened with dust, as well as by the heat of the season. It is rather, however, beyond the confines of Palestine, and in the more strictly desert regions, that this evil reaches its most formidable height. Travellers in these regions have frequently given accounts of them, of which the following from Buckingham may be taken as a specimen. The morning, he says, had been fine, but the "light airs from the south soon increased into a gale; the sun became obscure; and as every hour brought us into a lower sand, it flew around us in such whirlwinds with the suffocating heat that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted therefore for an hour, and took shelter under the lee of our boats, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered in their wailings but a melancholy symphony. I knew," he continues, "whether it was the novelty of the situation that gave it additional horrors, or whether the habit of maligning evil to which we are unconscionably, had increased its effect, but certain it is, that fifty gales of wind at once appear to me more easy to be encountered than one amongst the sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete; we could see neither sun, earth, nor sky; the plain in ten paces' distance was absolutely imperceptible; our hearts, as well as our souls, were so centered as to render breathing very difficult; they hid their faces in the ground, and we could only unmask our own for a moment to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait impatiently for its abatement." Such scenes, however, as we have said, belong rather to other regions of the East than to Palestine; it is too variagated by hill and dale, and too limited in extent, even in the portion that may be called desert, to admit of dust-storms of so severe and protracted a kind.

EAGLE (αρετσ, nester, Chald. אֵשֶׁר, nesher, Aram. אֶשֶּר). The magnificent birds of prey included under this generic title are spread over the whole world. Several species occur in Palestine and the surrounding regions, as the imperial eagle (Aquila imperialis), the golden eagle (A. chrysaetos), the spotted eagle (A. nipalensis), and probably the white-tailed eagle (H. albicilla). Perhaps the term, as is often the case, may be understood generically, without any minute discrimination of species; and certainly in one passage where the "nesher" is mentioned, a vulture, and not an eagle, is intended.

"Make thee full, ... enlarge thy baldness as the nesher," Mi. i. 16. No true eagle is bold, whereas this is a conspicuous characteristic of all the Vulturidae, and specially of the griffon-vulture (Vaulta fulvus), which has much of the aspect and habits of the eagle.

Both the imperial and golden eagles are sufficiently common in Western Asia; and as these are both noble birds, of commanding size and power, with habits almost quite identical, we shall take for granted that both of these species are included in the "nesher."

Many points in the history and economy of the eagle are used allusively in holy Scripture. It was forbidden as food, in common with other carnivorous fowls, Is. xi. 8; De. xiv, 12. A fine description, embracing in few words the leading characters of the tribe, occurs in Joel's appeal to Job, ch. xxviii. 23: "Both the eagle mounted up at thy command, and made her nest on high! She decketh and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place. From hence she sendeth the prey, and her eyes behold afar off. Her young ones also suck up blood, and where the slain are, there is she."

The overbearing power and fierce rapacity of this bird make it a fit emblem of those scourges of mankind called "great" conquerors; and hence the eagle has been the favourite standard of nations in all ages; witness Russia, Prussia, Austria, France, and the United States in our own time. In that wondrously minute prophecy, wherein Moses depicts the history of Israel through thousands of years, xxiii., the Roman invasion and siege are alluded to under their national emblem in "nation from the end of the earth, as the eagle flithest." The Chaldean armies are repeatedly compared to the eagle for their swiftness and rapacious cruelty, Jere. ii. 15; xxiv. 9, 10; xliv. 22; Isa. i. 18; Ho. i. 10; Hab. ii. 1. and the kings of Babylon and of Egypt are both, in the same parable, likened to "great eagles, with great wings, long-winged, full of feathers." Kier. xiv. 37.

The rock-dwelling habits of the Eleonites are finely compared to those of the eagle, which "maketh her nest on high," Jer. xiv. 18; 66. 4; and they are reminded that the impenetrable and inaccessible heights to which they resort will be no defence against Jehovah, though they set their nest among the stars.

The words used by the Lord Jesus, “Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together,” Matt. xii. 40, have been by some commentators referred to the vulture, on the assumed ground that the eagle never feeds on carrion, but confines itself to that prey which it has killed by its own prowess. This, however, is a mistake: no such chivalrous feeling exists in either eagle or lion, both will feed indiscriminately on a body bound dead. Any of our readers may see in the Zoological gardens that the habit imputed to at least not invariable. Apquila histrionica, or India, was shot by Col. Sykes at the carcass of a tiger, and J. capite, of South Africa, is “frequently one of the first birds that approaches a dead animal.”

Some miraculous power has been attributed to this bird of becoming young again. Modern-like when old, founded on such passages as these: “The youth is renewed like the eagle’s,” Ps. cvii. 19.; “They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength,” Is. lviii. 18. But these cannot be understood otherwise than as poetical allusions, founded doubtless on the great longevity of this bird, and its power, in common with other birds, of moulding its plumage periodically. An eagle that died at Vienna had been kept in captivity upwards of a hundred years. The eagle has a vast power of wing, the whole structure being adapted for strong and rapid flight. It soars to an immense height in the air, remains on the wing with unwearied energy, and swoops on its prey like the falling of a thunderbolt.

In most countries the eagle’s singleness of sight has become proverbial. “Her eyes behold afar off.” Mr. Yarrell observes that “the power of vision in birds is very extraordinary, and in none it is more conspicuous than in the eagle.” “Their destination, elevating themselves, as they do, into the highest regions, and the power required of perceiving objects at very different distances, as well as the rapidity of their flight, seem to render such a provision necessary.” It has been stated that probably, in the whole range of anatomical structure, no more perfect or more conclusive proofs of design could be adduced, than are to be found in the numerous and beautiful modifications in the form of various parts of the eyes of different animals, destined to exercise vision in media of various degrees of transparency as well as density.” The eyes of birds are much larger in proportion than those of quadrupeds, and exhibit also other peculiarities, one of which a kind of loop of bony plates appears to be intended to compress in various degrees the lens of the eye, and thus adapt it for sight at various distances; the proportions of the lens itself are made auxiliary to the same requirements.

But the most interesting allusion to the eagle in the holy Writ are those in which Jehovah sets forth his paternal care and tenderness over Israel. “I have you on eagles’ wings, and brought you yourself,” Ex xxi. 4. “As an eagle stretch up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings; so the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him,” Deut. xxxii. 12. Of the fact that the raptorial birds do thus support their young in their first essays at flight, the writer of this article takes the liberty of quoting some evidence from one of his own works on natural history. The bird alluded to is the red-tailed hawk, which is very closely allied to the eagles. “I have never met with the nest of this hawk, but a young friend, very conversant with natural history [and who was at all likely to have ever heard of these texts, or of the popular notions on the subject], informs me that he knew of one near the top of an immense cotton-tree. At length he witnessed the emergence of two young ones, and their first essay at flight. He guarded me, diligently saw the parent bird, after the first young one had flown a little way, and was beginning to flutter downward he saw the mother, for the mother surely it was, fly beneath it, and present her back and wings for its support. He cannot say that the young actually rested on or even touched the parent; perhaps its confidence returned on seeing support so near, so that it managed to reach a dry tree, when the other little one, invited by the parent, tried its infant wings in like manner.” (Birds of Indiana, p. 14.

EARNEST, like the preceding, while derived from an Anglo-Saxon word, earnest, or earnest, to earnest, to earnest, to earnest, stands in close affinity with a word of Hebrew origin, עיון. Gr. ἀβέβαιος; Lat. ambigii, contr. ambigue; Fr. ambigu; Eng. unclear or uncertain. The expression, to give or pay earnest, seems to be merely to give or pay as a pledge or proof of being in earnest of seriously intending to fulfill or perform the bargain or promise; to put down a gage or payment beforehand.” (Richardson.) It is used thus by the apostle Paul of the gift of the Holy Spirit to believers. In 2 Cor. i. 22.; in v. 5. he employs the expression, "the earnest of the Spirit," and more fully in Ep. i. 14, the sealing with the Spirit is designated "the earnest of our inheritance." The expression indicates that the indwelling grace and working of the Spirit is a fulfillment in part of the promise, which contains the assurance to believers of an eternal heritage of all life and blessing. It is the beginning of that which is to be perfected in glory, and so brings with it the assurance that all shall in due time be made good.

EARRING. This word is somewhat too precise for the corresponding term in the Hebrew, possibly "ear-rings." Derived from a root which signifies to pierce or bore, it denotes properly a pendent ring, such as orientals have been wont to wear alike from the nose and the ears by means of a hole bored through the parts, and sometimes also suspended from the forehead, so as to fall down upon the face. The servant of Abraham presented Rebekah with an article of this sort; he is said, in our English Bible, to have put "an ear-ring upon her face." Se v. 11, which must obviously have been either a nose jewel or a ring to be hung from her forehead, otherwise it could with no propriety have been represented as put upon her face. That rings were quite commonly worn, however, in those early times, as earrings in the stricter sense, is evident from what is recorded of the family of Jacob, who are said, among other articles more or less connected with idolatry, to have given him "the ear-rings which were in their ears," se xxx. 9. At a later period in the early portion of the wilderness-journey, they are again connected with the ears of the wearers, Ex. xxix. 2. Occasionally another term is employed 아감, earlis, which appears to have indicated the same kind of articles, only with a more distinct reference to the circular form.

1 No. 1, 2, 3, are Egyptian ear-rings, of gold, bronze, iron, &c., from actual specimens in the British Museum. No. 3, is an Egyptian ear-ring, from Wilkinson. Nos. 6, 8, 7, Assyrian ear-rings, from the Nineveh sculptures in the British Museum.

in which they were usually cast. It was the very general custom among ancient oriental nations for such ornaments to be worn by men as well as women, and the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments furnish not a few examples of this description. But there is nothing in the notices of Old or New Testament scripture to indicate that such a practice prevailed among the Hebrews. Indeed, the passage in Deut. vii. 22, which so expressly connects the wearing of golden ear-rings on the part of men with the manners of the Philistines, seems not doubtfully to imply that the practice was at least unusual, if it existed at all among the male portion of the covenant-people. Rings are, however, never distinctly associated with any lustful females, and these, however, they are sometimes associated in a manner which bespeaks them to have been occasionally used, not for ornament merely, but for purposes of superstition and idolatry. (See note AMPLED)

EARTH. This is the common equivalent in the English Bible to the Heb. כנה, and to the Greek γη, and as these words signify ground, as well as earth—a specific territory of the globe, as well as its entire compass— it is necessary to look at the connection, to see whether the word is to be taken in the more restricted or the larger sense. Generally speaking, our translators have observed the distinction; but they have not been quite uniform in their renderings, and in a few passages they have used earth, where undoubtedly land had been the fitting term. Thus in Deut. v. 17, referring to the drought in the time of Elias, it is said, "it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months," while in Isa. iv. 25, with reference to the same event, we read, "the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land." As the drought in question came specifically as a judgment upon the land of Israel, the more general term should have been avoided. Our translators have fallen into the same inconsistency in rendering two passages respecting God's crucifixion, in which the original almost exactly accords. In Mat. xxvii. 45, we read, "and there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour," but in Luke xxiii. 44, and there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour." It should undoubtedly have been the same in both cases; and as there is no historical ground for supposing that the darkness was more than local, it had been better if in each case "all the land" had been the rendering adopted. Indeed, in old English, earth seems to have been occasionally interchanged with land, as an equivalent; thus Lady Capulet is made to say of her daughter Juliet, "She is the hopeful lady of my earth" (Roman and Juliet, act V. scene 3). And lele de terre is the old French term for laire. In such expressions, however, as "all the earth came," or "all the earth heard," even though nothing more than a limited universality could be intended, it is best to retain the expression in its most general form; for in such popular forms of speech every one instinctively supplies the necessary limitation. (Adam, Creation.)

EARTHQUAKE. A tremendous motion or shaking of the earth, caused by volcanic agency, or the violent action of subterraneous heat and vapours. Whether such convulsions can be precisely identified with volcanic agency or not, it is certain that they have occurred most frequently in those regions of the earth where that agency either still is, or in former times has been, in most active operation. That Palestine has been subject both to volcanic agency, and to the occasional occurrence of earthquakes, admits of no doubt. "The volcanic phenomena of Palestine," says Stanley (p. 120), "open a question of which the data are, in a scientific point of view, too imperfect to be discussed; but there is enough in the history and literature of the people to show, that there was an agency of this kind at work. The valley of the Jordan, both in its desolation and vegetation, was once a volcanic region, and traces of crevices rambled even into the interior of Judea; the startling appearances, if not of the volcano, at least of the earthquake." He goes on to state, that the writings of the psalmists and prophets abound with indications of the feelings produced by such phenomena; such as the following: "He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth; "He toucheth the mountains, and they smoke;" the mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, as the earth is burned at his presence;" the earth shall melt like wax, before him, and the places wherein the reptiles are found, and the birds of the sky; the army of Heaven is destroyed before his presence;" and a recent German traveller, Roscher, quoted in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, goes on to say under "Palestine," thus writes: "It is in the northern part of this country alone, that volcanic formations are found in considerable quantities. Nevertheless, much of the land in which volcanic rocks are not found, bears evident marks of frequent volcanic action, such as hot springs, the crater-like depressions such as the basin of Tiberias, and that of the Dead Sea, with its basaltic rocks, the frequent and visible disturbances of the strata of the normal rocks, the numerous crevices, and especially the frequent and violent earthquakes. The line of earthquakes in Syria includes Hobein, Jerusalem, Nablus, Tiberias, Safed, Baalbek, Aleppo, from thence takes a direction from south-west to north-east, follows the direction of the central chain of Syria, runs parallel to that of the valley of the Jordan, and has its termination northwards in the volcanic country on the slope of Taurus, and southwards in the mountain-land of Arabia Petraea."

Many similar testimonies are given by Dr. Kitto in his Physical History of Palestine (ch. iv), where also may be seen a detailed account of the earthquakes that are known to have visited Palestine, ancient and since the Christian era. The more remarkable are the following: one mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xvi. 7, Wars. 111), which occurred in B.C. 31, and which is said to have shaken the whole land of Judea, destroying many thousands of persons; another, described by William of Tyre, in A.D. 1179, which caused several cities on the coast in ruins, but does not appear to have penetrated far into Palestine; another, in 1579, mentioned by Volney, which is said to have caused great damage, and destroyed in Baalbek alone 20,000 persons; another, in 1822, which spread much devastation around the lake of Galilee, and which was ascertained by two missionaries (Mr. Callan and Mr. Thompson) to have been felt in a line of 500 miles in length by 50 in breadth, but which spent its violence about half way between Beirut and Jerusalem, where whole villages were turned into heaps of rubbish; and still another in 1877, in which no fewer than thirty-six towns and villages suffered partial or complete destruction, and in Safed alone, which seems to have been the centre of the calamity, upwards of 3000 persons are reported to have perished. There can be no doubt therefore, from known facts in the physical history of Palestine, that it has been repeatedly subject to the phenomena of earthquakes; and it is only what might have been expected, that there should be, here and there occasional references in the language of Scripture to the same, that description, distinct notices of their actual occurrence at certain periods in the history of the past. In reality, however, there are not many notices of this sort. Only one stands prominently out in Old Testament history— the earthquake, as it is called by way of eminence by the prophet Amos, ch. 1. He announces his vision as having been granted to him"two years before the earthquake," implying this to have been a most memorable visitation, a kind of epoch in history. The same also appears from the allusion made to the latter prophet Zechariah, who seeks to impress the minds of improvident sinners with the dread of coming vengeance by telling them, that "they should like as they fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah," ch. xvi. 8. It is rather singular that no notice should have been taken of it in the history of Uzziah's reign. Josephus has endeavoured to supply the deficiency, but in a manner which forbids our regarding what he says in his accuracy, He says that the earthquake "shook the ground, so that a rent was made in the temple, and the rays of the sun shone through it, which, falling upon the king's face, struck him with the prophetic" (Ant. xiv. 9). The account in 2 Ch. xxxvi. 19, of the prophecy of Uzziah, ascribes it to the direct interposition of Heaven, as a divine judgment on his presumption for persisting in his purpose to perform a strictly priestly act—the offering of incense. It is incredible, that if this intimation had been instrumentally connected with the earthquake, the history should have been entirely silent upon the subject. Of the extent of that earthquake, therefore, which took place in the latter part of Uzziah's reign, of the precise localities affected by it, or of the destructions it may have produced of anything, in short, but the general alarm and consternation occasioned by it, we know absolutely nothing. Not uncommonly the appearances that presented themselves to Elijah at Horeb, when first a great and strong wind rent the mountain, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord, then an earthquake, then a fire, and finally a still small voice, 1 Ki. xii. 30, are clasped among the phenomena of ordinary earthquakes; but the natural impression produced by the narrative rather favours the idea that the whole scene was of a special and supernatural description. In New Testament scripture mention is made of two earthquakes—one in connection with the last stage of our Lord's earthly history, and another with the imprisonment of Paul and Silas at Philippi. The former of these is by St. Matthew first connected with the death of Christ, and then again with the resurrection; according to him there was what he calls a sepulchre, or shaking, in both cases, Matt. xxviii. 1-6; xxviii. 2. But it may well be doubted whether, in either case, it was an earthquake in the ordinary sense that it means; it would rather seem to be some special and supernatural operation of God, in attestation of the marvellous work that was in progress, producing a tremulous motion in the immediate locality, and in connection therewith a sensible consensation in the minds of the immediate actors. If it had been an earthquake in the ordinary sense, we can scarcely suppose it would have been unnoticed by the other evangelists. And this view is confirmed by its being in the second case connected with the angel's descent: "There was a great shaking, or earthquake, for the angel of the Lord descended," comp. xvi. 15. So that it seems out of place with some to regard the supernatural obseruation of the sun at the time of the crucifixion as caused by the commotion of the earthquake (Kings Greek, at Earthquake). And both that particular earthquake, and the one that occurred at Philippi, are probably to be regarded as somewhat exceptional phenomena, wrought for a specific purpose, and consequently very limited as to their sphere of action. In short, it does not appear from any notices of Scripture that the phenomena of earthquakes, in the ordinary sense of the term, played more than a very occasional and subordinate part in the events of nature, and tremulous quakes and tremor laboris generally are called by the name of tremors seismicae. In the following pages, it will be shown that the ordinary wind gives rise to certain other effects, which are connected with the natural phenomena of earthquakes, and that the term "earthquake" is incorrectly employed as applied only to the latter. EAST, as the designation of a certain quarter or region of the earth, is used somewhat loosely in Scripture. It denoted not only the countries which lay directly east of Palestine, but those also which stretched toward the north and east—Armenia, Assyria, Babylonia, Parthia, as well as the territories of Moab, Ammon, and Arabia Deserta. When Jacob reached Mesopotamia, he is said to have come "into the land of the children of the east," Gen. 31:17, although it lay very nearly due north from Palestine. The magi, or wise men from the east, who came to hail the infant Saviour, were in all probability from Chaldea; and if not Chaldeans, we can scarcely think of any other countries than Persia and Parthia, for in those regions the magi formed the learned and priestly castes. Babel, who belonged to Mesopotamia, says that he had been brought "out of Aram, out of the mountains of the east," xxi. 17. Again, the Midianites and Amalekites, whose land lay directly to the east of Palestine, are called "the children of the east," Is. 31:8; xvi. 9. It was the name of the country, or, rather, of ancient Israel, that they were replenished from the east—meaning, that they were much given to the astrological and magical arts, which might be said to have their seat among the Chaldeans; and hence, it is added, partly by way of explanation, that they were "sorcerers like the Philistines," xvi. 6. In the varied use and application of the term, therefore, it is necessary to consider the connection in which it stands, in order to obtain any distinct idea of the region more particularly indicated by it.

EAST. The name properly of a Christian festival, but used sometimes in the authorized version, though improperly, to designate the Jewish passover. Ac xii. 4. The word should be, "intending after the Passover," not "after Easter:" for it is the Jewish observance alone that was in question.

EAST SEA is an epithet used in two passages, Joel ii. 29; Ezek. xvi. 15, of the Dead Sea, because it lay on the eastern side of the holy Land. The Mediterranean Sea, because lying in the opposite direction, was on a like account called the West Sea, or the sea on the west border, Nu. xi. 21; 2 Ki. vi. 25.

EAST WIND is in Scripture frequently referred to as a wind of considerable strength, and also of peculiar dryness, parching, and blighting nature. In Pharaoh's dream the thin ears of corn are represented as being blazed by an east wind, as, in a later age, Jonah's gourd was withered and himself scorched by "a vehement east wind," xi. 6; xiv. 4; and often in the prophets, when a blighting desolation is spoken of, it is associated with the east wind, either as the instrumental cause, or as a lively image of the evil, Ez. xx. 12; xix. 12; xvi. 13; Is. xlviii. 9.

This arose from the fact, that in Egypt, Palestine, and the lands of the Bible generally, the east wind, or a wind with more or less in it of an eastern direction, blows over larning deserts, and consequently is destitute of the moisture which is necessary to promote vegetation. In Egypt it is rather a south-east than an east wind, which is commonly found most injurious to health and fruitfulness; but this also is familiarly called an east wind, and it often increases to great violence. Clearton, a German writer, quoted by Hengstenberg in his Egypt and the Land of Moses, thus sums up the accounts of modern travellers on the subject: "In their course the east winds sometimes spring up towards the southeast, increasing to a whirlwind. The heat then seems insupportable, although the thermometer does not always rise very high. As long as the south-east wind continues, doors and windows are closed, but the fine dust penetrates everywhere; everything dries up; wooden vessels warp and crack. The thermometer rises suddenly from 16°-20° up to 39°-40°, and even 58° of Beaugourd. This wind works destruction upon everything. The grass withers, so that it entirely perishes if this wind blows long." It is stated by another traveller, Wendel, quoted by the same authority, and with special reference to the strong east wind employed on the occasion of the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, which took place shortly after Easter: "From Easter to Pentecost is the most stormy part of the year, for the wind commonly blows during this time from the Red Sea, from the east." There is nothing, therefore, in the scriptural allusions to this wind, which is not fully borne out by the reports of modern travellers; alike by sea and by land it is now, as it has ever been, an unwelcome visitant, and carries along with it many disagreeable effects.

EBAL AND GERIZIM, the names of two hills which, from the peculiar distinction conferred on them, as the scenes respectively from which the blessing and the curse were to be pronounced on Israel, have acquired a kind of singular interest. Moses declared before his death that he had set before Israel a blessing and a curse—a blessing, if they obeyed God's commandments—a curse, if they disobeyed; and he charged them to put the blessing after they got possession of Canaan, upon Mount Gerizim, and the curse upon Mount Ebal: "Are they not," he added, "on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down, in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh?" De. xi. 29. This description of the locality of the two mounts is certainly somewhat indefinite; and different views have been, and still are, taken of the precise hills indicated by them; but the weight of the testimony of a uniform tradition, that they are the two hills which form the opposite sides of the valley wherein by the ancient Shechem or Shechem, supplanted by the modern Nablous. Many descriptions have been given of the two elevations, slyly differing in the views presented of their respective natures, but chiefly, it would appear, from the descriptions being given from different points of view. Robinson, who surveyed them a little to the west, from the village of Nablous itself, says of them: "Mounts Gerizim and Eldad rise in steep, rocky precipices, immediately from the valley on each side, apparently some 800 feet in height. The sides of both these mountains as here seen unusually, from Nablous, were, to our eyes, equally naked and sterile, although some travellers have chosen to describe Gerizim as fertile, and confine the sterility to Eldad. The only exception in favour of the former, as far as we could perceive, is a small ravine coming down opposite to the west end of the town, which indeed is full of fountains and trees; in other respects, both mountains, as here seen, are desolate, except that a few olive-trees are scattered upon them." (Researches, iii. p. 50.) A late traveller (Mr. Dickson, in his Notes of a Clerical Excursion spent chiefly in the Holy Land, p. 201,) so far differs from this view, that he says, on approaching the mountains from the east, where above the specific heights are found, to which the names of Eldad and Gerizim were given, "the contrast between them is obvious and strong. Eldad is much steeper, more destitute of soil, and altogether more rocky and barren than Gerizim, whose sides are more sloping, and clothed with a much richer and more abundant vegetation." He therefore thinks that the two mounts were considerately chosen: one as the scene of blessing, and the other as that of cursing, since there is something in the very aspect of Gerizim that tends to suggest the idea of blessing, and of cursing in that of Eldad. The same, indeed, substantially had been said long ago by Mambrell: "Though neither of the mountains has much to boast of as to their pleasantness, yet, as one passes between them, Gerizim seems to discover a somewhat more verdant, fruitful aspect than Eldad.

Admitting this, however, something further must evidently be taken into account, in order to explain why these two mountains should have been chosen for such a purpose; why, of all the mountains in Canaan, these should have been selected as the scene of so remarkable and solemn a transaction. If we can so far distinguish between the two, as to be able to say, that the one, from its more sterile and rugged aspect, was the fitter for being associated with the curse, and the other, as the milder and more genial in appearance, for having the blessing pronounced on it; we still need some additional reason to account for these mountains being so definitely fixed on as the scenes respectively of blessing and cursing, while many others in Palestine might (so far as natural appearance is concerned) have equally served the purpose. The region of Shechem, in which the mountains stood, had this advantage above most others, that they were very nearly in the centre of the land. But besides that, it was hallowed by some of the most sacred recollections connected with the history of their patriarchal fathers. "The place of Shechem, as it is called in the plains of Moreh," was the first spot in the land of Canaan at which Abraham rested, and where, after receiving a fresh revelation from heaven, "he built an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him," Gen. xi. 7. It was before Shechem, also, which was no longer designated a place, but a city, that Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, took up his abode, and "bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the land of the children of Hamor, the father of Shechem," Gen. xxxvii. 6. There, too, did he erect his first altar to God, and "called it El-Elohe-Israel." It is possible, as Stanley suggests, that there may have been other associations of a sacred nature connected with this locality; and in particular, that it, and not Jerusalem, may have been "the scene of Abraham's encounter with Melchizedek, and the sacrifice of Isaac" (Syria and Palestine, p. 276.) But whether this may have been the case or not, we have enough in those other scriptural transactions which are expressly identified with this region, to account for the selection of its two most prominent mountain-peaks, whence to read forth, in the hearing of assembled Israel, the blessing and the curse, as recorded by the pen of Moses. When assembled there, the people stood, not only in the centre of the whole land, but on ground that had been hallowed in former times by solemn communications between heaven and earth, and where in spirit they were again brought into contact with their godly ancestors; and no spot could be conceived better fitted for their hearing with solemnized minds the words... which were intended on the one side to encourage their obedience, and on the other to warn them of the fearful consequences of unfaithfulness to their covenant obligations. (See Sin (Aramaic).)

Of the two mountains, Gerizim is not only the more pleasant and fertile in its aspect, but also rises to a higher elevation, though the difference in height is not very great. The remains still exist of the road by which the people used to ascend to the temple which the Samaritans built on the top of it, in rivalry of the temple at Jerusalem. There are also the remains of an ancient fortress, which stood on the table-land of the summit; but nothing particular is known concerning it.

EDED (above, second). The father of Gad, who headed the concord of the Shommechim against Abimelech, Judg. xx. He has appeared to have been a descendant of the original inhabitants of the land, and hence did not belong to any of the tribes of Israel. (See Gad.)

EBED-MELECH (King's door or servant), an Ethiopian eunuch, in the employment of Zedekiah king of Judah. We know of him simply in relation to the story of some action which he showed toward the prophet Jeremia, and whose life he even saved from destruction. His righteousness was recompensed to him again; for he obtained a special promise of protection and safety, amid the destruction which was to be brought upon Jerusalem by the king of Babylon. Je xxviii. 7; xxxi. xxxix.

EBEN-EZEL (stone of its parts), a memorial stone mentioned in 1 Sa. xx. 17; or possibly a stone of direction indicating two diverse routes.

EBEN-EZER (stone of help), a memorial stone set up by Samuel between Mizpeh and Shen, in commemoration of a signal deliverance obtained from the oppression of the Philistines. The precise locality is not known, nor even the sites of the two places between which it was erected. On setting it up Samuel used the explanatory words, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," 1 Sa. vi. 12.

EBEL, the great-grandson of Sam, and one of the ancestors of Abraham. (See Hebrews.)

EBONY (ebony), is only once mentioned in the Bible: "The men of Dedan were thy merchants; they brought thee for a present horns of ivory and ebony," Ez. xxvii. 15; nor can there be any contrast more complete than white ivory and black ebony, although the one is derived from the animal kingdom and the other from the vegetable. Indeed, with its great density and stony hardness, it is not surprising that some of the earlier writers doubted whether it were a vegetable production at all; and Pausanias states that he had it on good authority that in its origin it is entirely subterranean! "I have been told by a man of Cyprus, wonderfully well informed regarding medicinal plants, that ebony yields neither leaves nor fruit, nor indeed has it any stem above ground. It is merely a root buried in the soil, which the Ethiopians dig out, some of whom are very skilful in detecting its localities." To this dark-derivation Southey alludes in his description of Shethad's palace:

> "The Ethip. keen of scent,\footnote{227} Detects the ebony,\footnote{227} That deep incas'd, and lasting high,\footnote{227} A cedars tree, and bower of all fruit, With darkness feeds its boughs of raven grain."

We need not say that Pausanias was misinformed.

True ebony, the wood with which the ancients were acquainted, is obtained from one or other of the woods of Diocresia, most of which—for example, D. elephantum, D. microcarpus, D. Regelii—are natives of the East Indies: so that Virgil is still substantially correct:

> "Divis arboretus patriae solea. India nigrum\footnote{227} Femd elmius,"—Geog. ii. 115.

One of the noblest species is the D. reticulata of Ceylon.

> "The densely black portion occupies the centre of the tree; and in order to reach it, the whiter wood that surrounds it is carefully cut away." But, even when thus reduced, logs two feet in diameter, and in length from ten to fifteen feet, are conveyed to the coast (Sir J. E. Tennent's Ceylon, vol. i. 317, n. 289). With the fact that the dark portion is the interior of the trunk, the Arabs were so far acquainted, that Sir J. E. Tennent quotes a passage from Alhazmi, in which ebony is called "the black narrow of a tree, divided of its outer integuments." The wood of the D. virginsum, a lofty tree frequent in the southern states of America, is white.

Mahogany and many other competitors have gone far to displace ebony from the pre-eminence which it enjoyed in the cabinet work of the ancients. Not only was it imported to Tyre by "the men of Dedan," as mentioned by Ezekiel, but Pliny records how it was carried in Pompey's triumphal procession as one of the spoils of victory in the war with Mithridates. In his description of the abode of Somanus, Ovid appropriately specifies the ebony couch:

> "At media torcuit, ebeno subminus in atta,\footnote{227} Plerumque, univix, poelo velutinae texta.\footnote{227} Quo cubat ipso apio memoriae lenguere soluit,"—Met. xi. 619.

If not exactly "chaos thromos," it is by no means unusual to find in ancient houses of our own land ebony chairs, ebony bedsteads, and ebony cabinets, elaborately carved and inlaid. [J. T.]

ECCLESIASTES (ethos, LXX. Ἡγάθιασται; Vulg. Ecclesiastes, qui ab Hebrews Cohelath appellatur; Targum. The words of the prophecy which Koheloth, i.e. Solomon, son of David, king in Jerusalem, prophesied; Syriac. The book of Koheloth, i.e. Solomon, son of David, king of Israel.)

In treating of this unique portion of the Old Testament scriptures, we shall arrange our remarks under the following heads:

I. Title.
II. Age and Authorship.
III. Subject-matter.
IV. Form and Arrangement.
V. Canonical Authority.

1. Title.—The Hebrew title is translated with sufficient accuracy in our English version, "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king of (or rather, in) Jerusalem." The only difficulty arises from the use of the Heb word Koheloth, freely rendered The Preacher, which is found only in this book, though the root (kahah) from which it comes is met with frequently, and has a definite and well-ascertained signification. It is as a noun that this root appears in its simplest form, the verbal root not being in use in what is called by Heb. grammarians the kal conjugation. From this noun kahah, assembly, cohah, is derived the verb kahalah (kahālat), to assemble; and the participle kahal, assembling; just as from ἐκποιεω word, are derived the verb ἐκποιεομαι, to do away with, etc., and the participle ἐκποιησθαι, in perfect, to be done away with, etc.

speak, and the participle קֹכֶל, speaking. The form קֹכֶל, however, is not in use in the masculine gender, and its feminine, קֹכֶלְתִּה, appears only in this book, where it is never used as a proper name. Still its signification is not doubtful. It denotes one who convokes, and, as a fitting correlative, addresses, an assembly; and the feminine form, under which the noun appears, may be explained in one or other of two ways—either by supposing איסון to be understood קֹכֶלְתִּה מֵאֵי קֹכֶלְתִּה, or by appealing to the common usage of designating an individual occupying a post of honour, by a name descriptive of the functions he discharges or the dignity he enjoys. Of this usage we have several examples in the Semitic languages. Thus, in Arabic, "ךֹכֶל, which is properly a feminine abstract noun, denoting service, is employed emphatically as the title of the successor of Mohammed. And in Hebrew we have examples of the same usage in the word קֹכֶלְתִּה, genitive, and קֹכֶלְתִּה מֵאֵי קֹכֶלְתִּה, in Ezr. ii. 55, and also קֹכֶלְתִּה מֵאֵי קֹכֶלְתִּה, in Ezr. ii. 57, and Ne. vii. 59, are names of individuals, and therefore quite parallel to קֹכֶלְתִּה, also employed to designate an individual. This latter explanation appears to be the preferable one; especially on comparing such passages as Ez. viii. 9, where it is said that Koheleth was wise, and taught the people knowledge, a form of expression which would scarcely have been employed, were קֹכֶלְתִּה only another name for wisdom itself.

Who then is the individual designated by the name Koheloth in this passage, and throughout the book? It is agreed on all sides that Solomon is meant. This is evident, not only from ch. i. 1-12, where we are informed that Koheloth was the son of David, king over Israel, in Jerusalem, but from the whole account which he gives of himself, and of his pursuits and experiences, comp. ch. i. 15, i. 24, i. 31, 34; i. 56; ii. 24: 3; x. 22, 23. It is possible that in the name Koheloth, by which Solomon is here designated, there is a reference to the occasion on which he assembled (קֹכֶלְתִּה מֵאֵי קֹכֶלְתִּה) the whole congregation (קֹכֶלְתִּה) of Israel for the dedication of the temple, 1 Ki. viii. 1-10, 25; or, it may be, to the daily assembling of his servants, and of strangers from distant parts, around his throne, to listen to the wisdom which flowed from his lips, 1 Ki. x. 5, 6-21.

III. Age and Authorship.—But though it is certain that this book contains what professes to be a record of the experience and reflections of King Solomon, it is by no means so certain that Solomon himself was the author of the book. Indeed, Hebrew scholars, of every variety of theological opinion, are now almost at one in assigning to it a place among the very latest books of Scripture. This critical conclusion rests on various grounds; but the principal ground is the language and style of composition, which is distinguished in a very marked manner from that of Proverbs, or any of the books of Scripture which belong to the age of Solomon. This is a point, indeed, on which we should be very careful not to come to a hasty conclusion. The occurrence of Chaldee words and forms in any Hebrew document is by no means a certain and invariable indication of lateness of composition. We must be careful to distinguish archaisms and words and forms peculiar to the poetic style, from Chaldeeaisms of the later period. Moreover, the Hebrew writings which have been transmitted to us being so few in number, it is of course much more difficult decisively to determine the period to which any of these writings belong by the peculiar form of language in which it presents itself. It has, however, been laid there have been preserved to us a larger number of documents of different ages to assist us in forming our decision. Still, from the materials within our reach, scanty though they are, we may draw a conclusion as to the age of the book of Ecclesiastes, perhaps not altogether certain, nevertheless bearing with it a high degree of probability. For it needs but a cursory survey of the book to convince us that in language and style it does not only differ widely from the writings of the age of Solomon, but bears a very marked resemblance to the latest books of the Old Testament. It is impossible to import to any one ignorant of the Hebrew language a complete view of the evidence on which the statement just made is based; still, as the statement is one which comes into collision with common opinion and traditional belief, and has never received from our theologians the attention which it deserves, it may not be improper, without going into too minute detail, to specify some particulars of the evidence. 1. One class of words employed by the writer of Ecclesiastes we find rarely employed in the earlier books of Scripture, frequently in the later, i.e. in those written during or after the Babylonish captivity. Thus, קֹכֶל, he ruled, as in Ez. vi. 2, is found elsewhere only in Nehemiah and Esther. The derived noun קֹכֶלְתִּה (קֹכֶלְתִּהוּת, rule) appears once in the earlier Scriptures, Ez. vi. 6. Under this head may also be mentioned קֹכֶלְתִּה (קֹכֶלְתִּה), kingdom, in ch. xi. 1, rare in the earlier Scriptures, but found above forty times in Esther and Daniel; and קֹכֶלְתִּה (קֹכֶלְתִּה, province, ch. vi. 7, which appears also in Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, and likewise in 1 Ki. xx. 18, 19, where "princes of the provinces" are mentioned among the officers of king Ahab; but in none of the earlier Scriptures. 2. A second class includes those words which are never found in any Hebrew writing of earlier date than the Babylonish captivity, but are found in the later books: as קֹכֶל (quipsa), set time, ch. i. 1 (קֹכֶלְתִּה קֹכֶלְתִּה), which we meet with in Hebrew only in No. ii. 5, and Ez. xxvii. 31; but in the biblical Chaldee and in the Targumus frequently; קֹכֶל (קֹכֶלְתִּה קֹכֶלְתִּה), (E.V.), which appears in Hebrew only in Ez. i. 20; but in Chaldee frequently. (If this word be, as is commonly supposed, of Persian origin, its appearance only in the later Jewish writings is at once accounted for, Rudder's Additions to Gesenius' Thesaurus.) קֹכֶל, ch. i. 29; a derivation of קֹכֶל, to know, found only in 2 Ch. and Daniel, and also in Chaldee; and the particles קֹכֶל, ch. vi. 4, and קֹכֶל, then, ch. ii. 9, found in no earlier Hebrew book than Esther. From the foregoing enumeration it appears that the book of E-ecclesiastes resembles the book of Esther in some of the most distinctive peculiarities of its language. 3. A third class embraces those words which are not found even in the Hebrew writings of the latest period, but only in the Chaldee of Daniel and Ezra, or in the Targums, as מְגָיו (megâyô, probity), which is used nine times in Ecclesiastes, never in any other scriptural writing, but frequently in the Targums, under the slightly modified form (muqathîhô, already, longago), which recurs eight times in this book; מִשָּׁא (mishâ, charitably, rekoning, ch. i, ii, iii, x, xii, found also in Chaldee, Ex. v, 33,

It is well, however, that the book may be understood, and made practically useful, even though the questions of its age and authorship are not determined to the satisfaction of all. There is no ground for the assertion that "the book is unintelligible except on the historical supposition that the people of God were in a very miserable condition at the time of its composition" (Hengst. p. 45, Clark's Tract). Still less for the statement that "there runs through the entire book the conviction that a terrible catastrophe was shortly to befall the Persian empire" (ibid. p. 18). We must confess to a feeling of profound astonishment at the confidence with which such statements as the last are made by some of the German writers. But this introduces another branch of our subject.

III. Theor. The theme of the book is stated at the commencement, "Vanity of vanities, with Koheleth, all is vanity; what profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?" and again, towards the close, ch. xi. 5, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. The utterance of a spirit, we are ready, at first glance, to exclaim, sunk in the abyss of despair. Yet looking into the treatise more narrowly, we find that we have misapprehended its true character—that a principal aim of its author is evidently to inculcate contentment and a quiet enjoyment of the blessings which God has bestowed—that throughout the whole are scattered precepts and exhortations which are by no means in harmony with the dark meaning we have attached to the opening words, ch. vii. 14, ix. 10, xi. 4, &c.—and that the conclusion in which the author gives us the results

However, strictly speaking, it is not the fact that the writer assumes the name of Solomon. The name Solomon is not found in any part of the treatise. Instead of it, the designation Koheleth is uniformly employed. And this change of name has been supposed to contain an intimation that it is not the actual historical Solomon who speaks; for, on the common hypothesis that the book was written by Solomon, and contains the penitent confessions of his old age, there does not appear to be any good reason, but rather the contrary, for the record of such confessions being given to the world under an assumed name. It is an idealized Solomon who speaks. Or, as some have chosen to represent it, it is the spirit of Solomon, which now, freed from the chains of the flesh, and recalling all he had seen and felt in "the days of his vanity," ch. vii. 15, now come to an end, pours forth, for the instruction of mankind, the lessons of wisdom, gathered from the review of a life of such manifold and diverse experiences.

Possibly, the results of criticism admit of being reconciled with the testimony of tradition on the ground of a middle hypothesis: viz., that, though the treatise is the production of a later writer, the text with which it begins and ends, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," was a real saying of king Solomon, handed down by tradition. This view is suggested by the form of expression "vanity of vanities, said Koheleth," in which the writer seems to appeal to a well-known saying of Koheleth, on which he may have found his discourse. No writer of Scripture ever speaks thus in his own name.

It is well, however, that the book may be understood, and made practically useful, even though the questions of its age and authorship are not determined to the satisfaction of all. There is no ground for the assertion that "the book is unintelligible except on the historical supposition that the people of God were in a very miserable condition at the time of its composition" (Hengst. p. 45, Clark's Tract), still less for the statement that "there runs through the entire book the conviction that a terrible catastrophe was shortly to befall the Persian empire" (ibid. p. 18). We must confess to a feeling of profound astonishment at the confidence with which such statements as the last are made by some of the German writers. But this introduces another branch of our subject.

III. Theor. The theme of the book is stated at the commencement, "Vanity of vanities, with Koheleth, all is vanity; what profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?" and again, towards the close, ch. xi. 5, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. The utterance of a spirit, we are ready, at first glance, to exclaim, sunk in the abyss of despair. Yet looking into the treatise more narrowly, we find that we have misapprehended its true character—that a principal aim of its author is evidently to inculcate contentment and a quiet enjoyment of the blessings which God has bestowed—that throughout the whole are scattered precepts and exhortations which are by no means in harmony with the dark meaning we have attached to the opening words, ch. vii. 14, ix. 10, xi. 4, &c.—and that the conclusion in which the author gives us the results of his inquiries is in perfect consistency with the hopeful teaching of the other Scriptures, ch. xii. 11. Taking a superficial survey of the work, we are not surprised that some difficulty should have been felt even in early times in admitting it to be of canonical authority, seeing that some of the leading statements it contains appear to be at variance with one another, and with the other recognized Scriptures. But these difficulties in a great measure disappear on a closer examination.

1. The very name, which is strictly an impersonal one, shows that the person to whom it is applied, becouse of the region of poetry, not to that of reality.—Hengst. (Clark's Tract). p. 44.

2. At the same time it is scarcely possible that ch. iv. 1-3 could have been written in the reign of Solomon, still less by Solomon himself.

Vanity of vanities! i.e. utter emptiness and vanity. xxxix. 22. John xiv. 6. It is evident that the author has in his mind limitations, to which, in the intensity of his feeling, he cannot give expression. He is assuredly not thinking of God, or of God's work, when he excludes all is vanity. We must therefore endeavour to ascertain the range of observation which lay under his eye when he gave utterance to that despairing cry. And this we are enabled to do by an attentive study of the words which immediately follow, ch. 3, every one of which serves to carefully weighted. What profit, what real and permanent advantage, to man? xxxix. 27. This word "man," not "god," is found no fewer than forty-seven times in this short treatise; and the frequency with which it is the subject of care that most accurately represents the aspect in which man is viewed by the writer, denoting, as it does, man, as man, in his frailty and mortality, chaps. xii to xiv.

It is not of man recondite, of God's people of Israel, that the author writes. This special relation is kept out of view, and the general relation of man to God is that which is prominent throughout. Hence there is no mention of Israel; the name indeed occurs once, ch. 11, but altogether in a worldly and not in a spiritual sense.

Corresponding to the view of man on which the treatise is based, is the view of God which it presents. It is well known that in Scripture the Divine Being is spoken of under various names, according to the aspect of his nature and character which is at the time present to the mind of the writer. Of these, the two most frequently in use are Jehovah and Jehovah, the former, the more general, and large in its import, and denoting God as God, in the fulness of his infinite and adorable perfections; the latter, the more special and definite, and presenting the exalting God in intimate union with his redeemed people. The former name, accordingly, denoting God as God, corresponds to the, which denotes man as man, and is the only name of God which appears in this treatise. The name Jehovah, so frequent in the prophetical writings, is not met with once here. And this constant use of the correlatives God and Man, and careful avoidance of the names Jehovah and Israel, throws much light upon the nature of the treatise, and determines the point of view from which the great questions which form the subject of inquiry are regarded.

In all his labour, or in return for all his labour, xxxvi. 27. Here we meet with another characteristic term, which, with its cognates, recurs no fewer than thirty-six times, and the exact meaning of which it is therefore necessary to ascertain and carry along with us. It properly signifies fatiguing toil, which no one would voluntarily submit to without the prospect of some resulting advantage. In ch. iv. 6 it is opposed to rest, and in ch. iv. 8 it is followed and explained by the words "beaying the soul of god." It is important to remark that throughout the treatise the "fatiguing toll" of man is contrasted with the work of God (xxxvi. 21). The mind of the writer is entirely directed to the contemplation of these two works. The one, the work of God, he attempts to trace in its manifoldness and onward progress; but he finds his powers quite unequal to the task. "No man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end," ch. iii. 11. Yet what he does discover of it serves to awaken awe and admiration. He describes it as irresistible, no power being able to stop or retard its onward progress, ch. vii. 11; as altogether excellent, ch. iii. 11; complete and everlasting, "nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it," ch. vii. 11. With this most perfect work of God he contrasts the work of man. The one goes silently and irresistibly on with out any effort on the part of the great Worker. The other is a toilsome and fatiguing work, putting forth upon it all his strength; yet with that result Does his labour issue in the acquisition of any real and permanent good? So far from this, he finds to his bitter disappointment that he has wearied himself in vain, and, as he sinks exhausted, he is compelled to cry out, "Vanity of vanities! all is vanity."

Now, by attending to this contrast, which is constantly present to the mind of the writer, between the "work of man" and the "work of God," very great light is thrown upon the design and scope of the entire treatise. We discover at once what is the main, to which the stamp of vanity and emptiness is affixed. It includes every work of man which he undertakes as man, and which does not harmonize and fit in with the irresistible work of God. Man's work necessarily issues in vanity and disappointment in all cases in which it is not subordinated to, and made to form part of, God's work. When man's work comes into collision with God's work, it is inevitably dashed to pieces. And it is because man, partly from ignorance and partly from subjection to the sinful tendencies of his nature, does not usually work along with but against, though not always consciously against, God, that his most anxious toil issues in the attainment of no permanent good. But what then? Does the sacred writer stop here? By no means. There is a positive as well as a negative element in his teaching. His view of the contrasted works of God and man not only discloses the source of man's failures and disappointments, but likewise suggests the course which man must take in order that failure may as far as possible be avoided and success attained. He must renounce the independency to which he aspires, and be content to subordinate his own work to God's work. He must become a toil fatiguing toll, or that is the necessary condition of the attainment of permanent good. "Fear God and keep his commandments;" all labour, disjoined from the fear of God, is utter vanity, and however successful it may for a time appear, will be seen to be vanity in the end: "for God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil." In the fear of God which the sacred writer thus inculcates, there is an active and a passive element. The work of God is partly known, partly unknown. Hence the duty of the God-fearing man is twofold: active concurrence in God's work so far as known and understood; patient acquiescence and cheerful contentment.

under all God’s arrangements, even the darkest and most mysterious. The value of the latter of these two elements is most largely insisted on throughout the treatise, and constitutes one of its most marked characteristics, ch. ii. 24; iii. 12, 13, 21; v. 17 (Lk.); vii. 13; ix. 7. The language employed by the sacred writer in these passages has been often misplaced, and was in very early times the occasion of doubt being expressed as to the canonical authority of the book.1 That a man can eat and drink and enjoy good in his labour, this is surely strange language, it has been said, for a sacred writer to make use of in conveying his idea of happiness, and certainly it sounds not unlike the language of the sensualist who says, “Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die.” But two things may be very like and yet be essentially different, even opposite in their nature. The same language, spoken by two different persons, may have two different meanings. An advice may be very excellent when addressed to one class of persons, which it would be most imprudent, nay, highly culpable to address to another class: according to the proverb, “what is one man’s meat is another man’s poison.” With regard to the language just quoted, there can be no doubt that “to eat and to drink,” or as it is given in ch. ix. 7, “to eat bread and to drink wine,” means “to feast.” Compare Ex. xxxii. 5, 6, “The people sat down to eat and to drink.” Isa. xxx. 16, 1 Ki. i. 25, do xvi. 1. It is opposed to fasting, Jer. iv. 10; Ezek. vii. 8. It is conjoined with שׁגוי, φαγεῖν, to describe the happy state of the people of Israel under the government of Solomon: “Judah and Israel were many as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking, and making merry,” 1 Ki. iv. 30. Moreover, as feasting frequently formed part of the religious services of the Israelites, as of other ancient nations, we find the expression “eating and drinking” employed to describe not worldly joy merely, but also joy in God: “Go your way, eat the fat and drink the sweet, for to day is holy unto the Lord, neither be ye sorry, for the joy of the Lord is your strength,” Neh. viii. 10-12. It is also most important to notice that the same phrase, “to eat and to drink,” is employed in passages as the name of a magnificent person: there is implied a sumptuous and fit仪表, a translation to that of “eating and drinking.”1 Did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, that he was well pleasing to him (לִלְעֹלָה)? But thine eyes and heart are not but for thy concupiscence (בְּעַרְסָה), and to shed innocent blood,” Jer. xii. 10.

From these passages it is clear that there is an “eating and drinking” which is quite consistent with piety, and which a sacred writer may commend without forgetting his sacred character. It is the feast of innocence which is commended: for the attentive reader will observe that in all the passages above quoted in which happiness is associated with eating and drinking, labour also is introduced as a necessary element. Still less is it the feast of impiety and sensuality; for it is associated throughout with well-doing and the fear of God, Labour and the fear of God are pre-supposed. It is the feast of quiet contentment, of sober enjoyment, the opposite at once of a life of indolence, and of a life of covetousness and grasping ambition: it is a life such as that which St. Paul commends when he says, “Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.” And the peace of God which passes all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus,” Phil. iv. 6, 7, Comp. Mat. vi. 24-34.

That this passion element of the fear of God should so predominate throughout the book, seems to mark it out as the production of one of those dark periods in the history of the church, when patient submission under persecution, and contentment amid privations, were the duties most necessary to be inculcated and practised.

There is yet one other expression in ch. i. 3, which must not be overlooked, as it is one which will help us still further in coming to a right decision as to the true character and design of the whole treatise. I refer to the words, “under the sun,” which recur no fewer than thirty times, chiefly in the earlier chapters. In ch. i. 13, we also find “under the heavens.” The meaning of both expressions is the same, viz. in the band of the living. “Under the sun,” is quite equivalent to “among those who see the sun,” ch. viii. ii. vi. xi. 2, i.e. among the living, ch. i. 3, 17. Compare De. xxv. 13, and other passages, in which we meet with the phrase, “to destroy from under heaven,” i.e. from among the living. In these words “under the sun,” the phrase is therefore implied a reference to the condition of man after life’s close, when he has ceased to see the sun and has gone into darkness. The question with which this treatise commences, thus bears a close resemblance to that of our Lord: “What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?” Compare also the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

There can be no doubt that the thought of death is that which presses most heavily upon the mind of the writer of this book. It is death which more than anything else stamps “vanity” upon all sublunary things, “one generation goeth and another cometh,” ch. i. 4. Through the fear of death man is all his lifetime subject to bondage. It is a thunder-cloud which throws its dark shadow over the whole of his earthly existence. Man lives but to die, and, which is worse, over death he has no control, ch. viii. 8. He is the creature of an irresistible and inflexible law; in this not differing from the brute, ch. iii. 10, nay, not differing from the material world in which he dwells, ch. i. 7. It seems to lie with man just as with the rising and setting sun, the winds, the streams: constant flow, ceaseless motion, yet ever returning to the same point again: “all things continue as they were since the beginning of creation.” Millions of toiling, scheming, restless men, live and die and are forgotten, followed by others who live, labour, die, and are forgotten, just as those who have gone before. Despite all this unceasing labour there is nothing new, ch. i. 10; the old is ever reproduced; so that human affairs seem to revolve in an endless round, and man, with all his high thoughts of himself, is but the creature of an all-governing law, which he is powerless to resist. Now, in all this there is, as we have already seen, an implied contrast between the labour of man and the work of God (מִמַּהְלֵי תוֹלְדֹתָו). Despite all man’s labour, there is nothing new: it is the prerogative of God to create a new thing. And all hope for man lies in the promise of God that he will put forth this reserved power. "Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the things of old; behold, I will do a new thing," is xiii. 14, 15. He has promised to make with man a new covenant,

Is. xxi. 2; to put within him a new heart,

Eze. xvi. 59; vi. 31; even to create new heavens and a new earth, so glorious that the former shall not be remembered nor come to mind, Is. lvii. 17. There is no doubt that it is some such radical change in man and man's condition as is described in these passages, that the Preacher has in view when he says, "There is nothing new under the sun." And thus we are again led to that which is the conclusion of the whole matter, "Fear God; remember God thy Creator," ch. xiii. 14. He alone can give thee a new heart, a new life, delivering thee from the bondage of sin and from the dread of death.

So again, where it is said, "there is an endomembrace of former generations," ch. i. 11 (נֵּסֶת, memorial), there is also an implied contrast. For, however it may be with man, with God the righteous is had in continual remembrance (הָאָדָמָה עַד הָאָדָמָה). By one of the prophets, He is described as causing to be written before him a book of remembrance (יִתְנָהָת עַד הָאָדָמָה) for them that fear the Lord, and that think upon his name, Mal. iii. 16. And thus, the conclusion again returns, "Fear God, and keep his commandments;" though with man there has not been a memorial, that shall have a memorial with God; for "he shall bring into judgment every work, with every secret thing, whether it be good or bad." It is, however, an exaggeration of the truth to affirm, as some have done, that the main design of the treatise is to establish the doctrines of the soul's immortality and of a future judgment. In this, as in the other Old Testament books, we find the doctrine of immortality still in the germ. In ch. iii. 21, indeed, it is either expressly affirmed or implied that there is a difference between the destiny of the spirit of man and the spirit of the brute. In ch. vii. 2, it is said that the "spirit of man returns to God who gave it." This of course points back to Gen. ii. 7, where we are taught that God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (וְיַעֲדוּ חֵפָר בְּשָׁלוֹז), and he became a נְפָשׁ. The Preacher teaches us that at death God takes back to himself the spirit which he gave, but this he says of all men alike, and it is evident he has as yet no joy in anticipating this return to God, for he immediately adds, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," ch. xiv. 1. We hear from him no such utterance as that of Paul — "to depart and be with Christ is far better." For as yet life and immortality have not been brought to light. The silent gloom of death has not yet been broken by the voice of the Son of God; compare ch. ix. 5, 19.

It is only in its germ that immortality is here revealed. Its germ is faith and the fear of God. This is the scriptural order; the fear of God first, then eternal life. It is an error to reverse this order, and make the revelation of eternal life the foundation of the fear of God. The Old Testament saints, therefore, amid all their darkness, had firmly in their grasp that which is the root of immortality — faith, union with God. In this how different from the heathen poets and philosophers! The latter talk far more about the future life of the soul than the former; yet they know nothing of the true immortality, because they have not its foundation — the knowledge of God, union with God. Comp. Matt. xiii. 31, 32.

The fear of God is therefore to be regarded as the positive element in the teaching of Ecclesiastes, rather than the doctrine of immortality. Yet the latter, though not so prominent as some would represent it, is by no means kept altogether out of view. For the fear of God rests on great part upon the conviction that God is righteous, and that God's righteousness must sooner or later be manifested; and from such a conviction the doctrine of a future retribution cannot be long dissociated, ch. vii. 17, xiii. 11.

IV. Form and Arrangement. Ecclesiastes stands alone among the Hebrew writings. The books to which it bears the closest relationship are Proverbs and Job; but in form it is distinguished in a very marked manner from both of these, as well as from the other scriptural books. It contains not a few proverbs, but it is not a collection of proverbs. It is a continuous exposition, having one theme from beginning to end. In this, moreover, a book of argument, appealing not to authority but to reason and experience. It contains no "Thus saith the Lord." Like the writings of the prophets: the author takes lower ground, he makes no claim to prophetic power; he reasons with men on their own level, and builds his argument on what lies under the observation of every one. The book is also remarkable for the copious induction of particulars by which the general theme is established. It is the production of a philosophic observer and reasoner, rather than of one endowed with prophetic intuition and enthusiasm, ch. i. 3, 4. And the whole course of observation and reasoning by which the author is led to the conviction in which his mind ultimately rests, is laid bare before us. He makes his readers his confidants; he does not conceal the difficulties he had felt and the doubts that had risen in his mind; he even sometimes takes up what might be considered a controversial position, giving utterance to thoughts which some might have thought it more prudent to suppress, in order to show us how he found his way out of darkness into the light of faith. In some of these particulars Ecclesiastes bears a striking resemblance to Job, as well as in its general theme; yet in style of composition scarcely any two books can be more dissimilar, the one being as plain and homely (though not less forcible on that account) as the other is singularly elevated in thought and language.

With respect to arrangement of materials and train of thought and argument, we cannot of course expect in a treatise of eastern origin, written between two and three thousand years ago, the same regularity and logical sequence as would be demanded in any similar production of the modern European mind. It is a mistake, therefore, to map out Ecclesiastes into chapters and sections, as has frequently been done. At the same time there is an obvious advance, and a marked distinction between the close of the treatise and the commencement. There is an introduction, in which the theme is announced and the problem stated, ch. i. 1-11; and there is a conclusion, in which the result of the argument is most distinctly enunciated, ch. xi. 1-11. The intermediate chapters, i. 12—xvii. 7, form the body of the treatise, in which by reflection, by argument, by a large induction of particulars, the way is prepared for the solution, so far as a solution is possible, of the problem stated at the commencement. This principal portion of the treatise has been variously divided; recently several writers of reputation have concurred in recommending the following fourfold division:

<th>B</th>
<th>C</th>
<th>D</th>

<tbody>
<tr>

<td>ii. 26</td>
<td>iii. 1 - xiii. 29</td>
<td>viii. 16 xi. 8</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

The first of these divisions (A, ch. i. 12 - ii. 26) is very distinctly marked off from the others; but between B, C, and D the lines of separation are not very clearly traceable, unless we are to regard the recurrence of a leading thought as evidence sufficient that the argument has advanced another stage, and come to a pause. The primary division is therefore divided:

In the former the experience of Solomon predominates; the author, if not Solomon himself, throughout the assumed character of the wise and splendid king of Israel; in the latter this assumed character is almost entirely dropped, and the author appeals to the common experience of mankind. In the former the picture is dark in every part; vanity of vanities is stamped on every line: in the latter the darkness of the picture is relieved by streaks of light, becoming gradually more and more distinct and cheering. In the former the vanity of man's labour is the theme throughout; in the latter the work of God, who hath made everything beautiful in its season, and the peace arising from the fear of God, are ever more and more largely dwelt on. In the second division (C, ch. iii. 1 - xii. 8), viewed by itself, there is also a perceptible advance. The writer commences with a striking description of the work of God, as distinguished from the labour of man, "To everything there is a season." Ex. ch. iii. 1. In the system of divine providence each descriptive event has its place, its time, its cause, its consequences, all definitely arranged. Notwithstanding the infinite multiplicity of its parts, the work of God is one, and well ordered; and it is irresistible. If, therefore, man's work stands in the way of God's, there is but one possible result—man's work must perish. Hence the unprofitableness and vanity of man's work as man, ch. iii. 9. Man cannot follow the intricate windings of providence, ch. iii. 11, so as to adapt to his own petty plans; neither is it possible for him, do what he may, to rule the course of events so as to command success independently of God, ch. iii. 14. The only resource is in faith, and the fear of God, ch. iii. 11.

The greater part of this, which is by far the largest division of the book, ch. iii. 1 - xii. 8, is but an unfolding of the roll and record of human labours, on each and all of which the Preacher stamps "vanity of vanities." But as he advances, and at ever shortening intervals, the divine catalogue of vanities is interrupted, and the Preacher gives utterance to some cheering certainty, on which his soul may rest as on a firm foundation as, "God hath made everything beautiful in its season," ch. iii. 11; "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked," ch. iii. 17; "In the multitude of dreams anyone, &c., but fear thou God," ch. iv. 7; "God made man upright," ch. vii. 29; "Though a sinner do evil an hundred times and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God," ch. viii. 12; or to some sentiment or admission naturally arising from the course of reflection he is pursuing. These last are too numerous to specify; they embrace those portions of the book which bear the closest resemblance to the book of Proverbs, as ch. iv. 6, 9-12; v. 1, &c. The duty, to the commen tation of which, as already remarked, the Preacher most frequently reverted, as one specially salutary in the troubles of life which so frequently he lived, is that of contentment, quiet acquiescence in the decrees and cheerful enjoyment of the gifts of God, ch. iii. 12, 22, iv. viii. 15, ix. 10. The practical aim of the treatise is most fully and marvelously brought out towards the close, ch. xi. 1 - xii. 7, from which it plainly appears that the author is not, as some have imagined, a gloomy misanthrope, who looks on everything with a jaundiced eye, but a believer in God, who strives even when his spirit is most sad and overwhelmed, to behold everything in the light of God, and seeks to lead men to the true good by leading them to a life of faith in God. "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth." The treatise concludes with a special appeal to the young to make choice of that true peace which flows from piety and the fear of God, and not allow themselves to be deluded by the glitter of worldly joys, ch. vi. 3-ix. 2; an appeal enforced by the striking picture of old age feeble and torn, by which the record of the vanity of human labour is so fittingly closed.

V. Canonical Authority.—The doubts on this subject, which occasionally even in early times found expression within the synagogue and the church, were never able to shake the dominant sentiment and belief, that the author of Ecclesiastes was one of the favoured few who wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." And the authoritative decision of the church-fathers is amply confirmed by the internal character of the book. Nowhere even in the sacred Scriptures is the vanity of all ordinary things depicted so comprehensively and clearly. The utterance of the book, indeed, by their boldness often startle and surprise. The tongue of scepticism appears to be allowed an excess of license. But this is no indication of the absence of inspiration; rather the reverse. Shrinking timidity and smooth propriety characterize the words of men; but the words of the Spirit of God are ever characterized by bold and fearless honesty. Who does not feel that the absence of Ecclesiastes from the Old Testament could create a blank which no skill of man could fill up? Moreover, in the pages of the New Testament, we frequently catch the echo of Ecclesiastes. And no wonder. For no teaching could form a more fitting preparation for the full revelation of the world to come than the teaching of this book, in which the vanity of the world that now is is so impressively displayed. Mat. v. 3 (Ex. vii. 2- Mat. vi. 7) (Ec. vi. 2—Mat. vi. 10, 20-24; xi. 19; Mar. vii. 30; Lu. xii. 29 (Ec. vi. 2)—Jer. iii. 8 (Ec. xi. 2—Jer. iv. 1 (Ec. iv. 10)—Rom. x. 2; 1 Cor. 1. 20; 20 (Ec. 1. 19; Col. ii. 6 (Ec. x. 17—Tit. iv. 3, 1; vi. 17, 12; 1 Tim. ii. 17; 1 Cor. 1. 19 (Ec. iv. 17) v. 39 (Ec. 1. 20).
ECCLESIASTICUS

The criticism of Ecclesiastes, as indeed of most of the Hebrew writings, the most valuable aid is derived from the Hebrew Concordance. Of the numerous commentaries on Ecclesiastes, a most elaborate account is given by Mr. Gumbert (Ecclesiastes, in the Book of Ecclesiastes, Translated, etc., by Mr. Bissett, and Mr. Gurney, 1840.) To the English student, the Messrs. Clark have rendered the Commentary of Hengstenberg easily accessible. The Expositions of Holder, Nock, and Miss Storr, are held in estimation. Practical Lectures on Ecclesiastes are unnecessary, such as the volumes of the late Dr. Wardlaw, and more recently those of Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Bridges.

ECCLESIASTICUS, one of the books which compose the Apocrypha, has often been ascribed to Solomon, and by many Roman Catholic authorities is called the fifth book of Solomon, but without any foundation. The fifth council of Carthage unfortunately gave the first wrong decision on this point, and Rome can hence claim the certain amount of patristic authority. Thus the book may emboss many wise sayings, which obtained currency from the time of Solomon, and which may therefore, in a qualified sense, be ascribed to him, no one will doubt. But as the book itself contains indubitable evidence of being the production of a later age (for example, refers to the captivity, ch. xiv. 23, 25, and professes, in the prologue, to be nothing more than the collected wisdom of a learned scribbler who lived subsequent to the times of the law and the prophets; there is no ground whatever for assigning it a higher origin, or investing it with a strictly canonical authority. It professes, in its existing form, to be a Greek translation, by Jesus, son of Sirach, of a Hebrew production left by his grandfather, also Jesus, son of Sirach. What authority should be attached to such a statement it is difficult to say; it is received by many and disputed by some; certainly nothing has ever been seen by any public authorities of a Hebrew original, and in the Greek form above it is known to the church. The Jesus who presented it to the public is supposed to have lived in the second century before Christ, and to have issued the book under the name of 'Proverbs,' with an uninspired production, and therefore not entitled to a place in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, it is undisputed by much the best of its class. (See Apocrypha.)

EDEN [pleasure or delight], the original residence of the first human pair. It also bears, in all modern European languages, the name of Paradise, from the translations given by the Septuagint and Vulgate to Εὐγενικός, garden. This, in the Septuagint, is ἡμέρας, in the Latin, parādisus, or in English, paradise. In stead of God being said to plant a garden in Eden, according to the Septuagint it is, he planted a paradise in Eden; and the Vulgate, by giving the sense of Eden, makes it a paradise of pleasure (parādisus voluptatis). Paradise, however, is simply another and later Hebrew term for garden, and seems in three passages of the Old Testament, Cant. iv. 13; Ec. ii. 5, where it is rendered garden, and Na. ii. 8, in which forest has been adopted as the equivalent. The word is properly parādis, and is supposed to have been imported into the Hebrew from the Armenian or Persian. Like gvre, it denotes garden in the wider sense—a large inclosure or park, planted with trees for use and ornament, and so approaching more nearly to the nature of an orchard than to that of a forest.

The account given in Genesis of the garden of Eden is not such as to enable us to identify its place with any existing locality. "And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison; it is that which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good; there is bdellium (bêlîm), and the onyx-stone (phelêm). And the name of the second river is Gihon. It is the same that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia. And the name of the third river is Pishon; it is that which goeth toward the east of all the earth eastward, to Assyria. And the fourth river is the Euphrates." (Gen. ii. 8-14.) Some parts of this description seem to be intelligible enough to those who know only the post-biblical world, and this has led many eminent scholars into the belief that the whole, by that of learned inquiry, or etymological and geographical explanations, could be made fully out. There can be no doubt that the river called Phrat in the original is the same with the Euphrates, and that Hiddelk appears elsewhere to be applied in Scripture to the river Tigris, or to Assyria. The Euphrates is a well-known region, and has the Tigris as one of its great rivers. But what precisely is the land of Cush or Ethiopia, a term that is known to be variously used in Scripture? What or where is the land of Havilah? or the rivers Pison and Gihon? Or these we have no certain information whatever; and after centuries of research and speculation we are not one whit further advanced, nor have inquiries been able to come nearer to an agreement, than when the matter was first broached. Even if we could, with some measure of certainty, learn what particular countries and rivers were here meant by the names of Havilah, Cush, Pison, Gihon, it would help us very little to a satisfactory conclusion, for the statement in respect to the size of the garden of Eden plainly is, not only that it was somehow connected with four rivers, but that these four rivers had their origin in the garden, flowed through the garden as an undivided copious stream, and afterwards fell into the fourfold division mentioned under the names Pison, Gihon, Hiddelk, and Euphrates. This seems the clear meaning of the words; and to explain them, as Bockhart and others have done, by supposing that the river was one indeed, while passing through the region which formed the garden, but that the four heads, or principal divisions, consisted of two the Tigris and Euphrates, flowing into it and conjoining as they entered the territory of Eden, and again, after leaving it, dividing into two, and forming the main streams by which the river reached the Caspian Sea, is entirely arbitrary. The river, it is expressly said, went out of Eden, had its source there, and from thence that is, on its leaving Eden it became parted into four heads or leading divisions. Now, nothing can be more certain than that there is no region on the known habitable world in which these conditions meet. And on the supposition that the statement is of a strictly historical nature (which we have no reason to doubt), there is room for but one conclusion, namely, that the description, whether written immediately by the pen of Moses, or handed down to him from primeval times, has respect to a state of things which, to a considerable extent, was broken up and changed by the deluge. It is impossible that after such a catastrophe, the outward aspect of the world could have remained after that what it formerly was; and it is not improbable that, in the regions over which it more especially prevailed, alterations took place in the relative heights of districts, and consequently in the direction of rivers. Indeed, to elevations and depressions in the earth's surface, caused by volcanic agencies, the catastrophe, in its physical character, may probably be in great part ascribed. Hence, while the general features of the region may have continued after the flood much as before, and some of the names of rivers and districts that had prevailed in the old world would naturally be retained in the new, it was not to be expected that the precise position of matters in the original garden of Eden should be found any longer to exist.

The circumstance that the description does not suit any actual locality in the post-diluvian world, and that some of the names employed—Pison, Gilson, Havilah—are left altogether indefinite in the records of old Testament history, render it probable that the account was simplified by Moses, and the accredited memory of an earlier age. It is hardly to be supposed that, if for the first time communicated to the world by the handwriting of Moses, there should have been no indication of the change of circumstances which hindered the applicability of the description to any known locality. This is the more probable, as in other parts of the Mosaic writings, in which reference is made to things of the olden time, explanations are often thrown in to make the historical statements properly intelligible; for example, Gic. xiv. 5, xvii. 19; De. ii. 10-12, 24-25. We are therefore inclined to regard the description of paradise in the second chapter of Genesis as a primeval record, in form as well as in substance, and on this account especially incapable of being identified with any particular region with which we have the means of making ourselves acquainted; for the relative position and external aspect of things had become too much changed by the action of the deluge to admit of it.

Dillisch, one of the latest and ablest commentators on the Mosaic writers in respect to this view of the text, he thinks that, according to the author's mode of contemplation, "paradise had, when he wrote, been obliterated from the earth; and this he certainly did not conceive of without a violent disturbance in the relation of the rivers to the land of Eden." But he entirely conceives (as does also Richard, Die Schaffungs-Paradis und Religionsgeschichte, p. 226, seq.) in the view we have given of the subject itself. "It is impossible," he says, "to reconcile the geographical statements of the author, regarding the rivers of paradise, with our knowledge of the present form of the earth's surface, in a satisfactory manner." He then refers to the explanatory schemes of various writers, in particular of von Raumer, Bautsmann, and Berthoau, which, however, he admits, yield no certain result, and expresses his belief in the probability of changes having taken place in the relative altitudes of districts and the courses of rivers in that part of the world. "It is therefore unnecessary," he concludes, "in order to establish the geographical statements of the record writer, that we should be able still to point to four distinct streams (the Tigris and Euphrates among them), proceeding from a single source, which is plainly impossible. The original names of the four streams is, in the sense of the author, as certainly at an end as that paradise is lost." Herford, "Pison, Gilson, Tigris, and Euphrates are only the remains of these four streams into which the paradise river originally divided itself, and which bore the blessings of paradise into all the world." But this is advancing somewhat into the regions of fancy, as it still remains matter of doubtful speculation what existing rivers are to be identified with, or approach nearest to, Pison and Gilson.

Bammgarten, in his Theological Commentary on the Pentateuch, had already propounded substantially the same view of the subject as has now been given, with no further difference than that he makes it somewhat more specific. While he regards the deluge as having necessarily disfigured and changed to a considerable extent the earth's surface, he still thinks a general similarity remained; and we may hence conceive "that from the region of Armenia a river flowed, and then divided itself into four branches, of which the two eastern corresponded to the rivers afterwards denominated [and why not also denominated in primeval times?] the Euphrates and the Tigris; and the two western had the "Pison, Gilson, Tigris, and Euphrates," by a subsequent elevation, rose somewhat above the original river-bed." That he is right in indicating Armenia as the region within which lay the site of the garden of Eden, is highly probable from the notices themselves we have upon the subject, and also from the general current of tradition, which pointed to that quarter as the original seat of the human family.

Those who wish to see a detailed account of the different schemes that have been framed to explain the narrative in Genesis in conformity with existing geographical knowledge, may consult Martin Dibor., de Parad., Tract, in Barchard, Opp.; Mackay, Hist. Paraod, Illustrata; Schultens, Nova Paradis; Faber's Archeology; or Rosenmiller's Biblical Geography, vol. i., as given in Clark's Biblical Cabinet, No. xi. p. 46-97. The difficulties connected with a real geographical solution have given rise in Germany to several mythical explanations, in which the biblical narrative of the garden of Eden is treated much as modern scholars treat the ancient chaldean tradition. One of the earliest, the garden of the Hesperides. Some account is given of these arbitrary schemes in Winer's Real, Woefcher, article "Eden," to which we simply refer, as we deem them of no value in respect to the object for which they are more immediately produced.

In respect to the garden itself, there can be no doubt that it is presented to our view as the region of complete earthly satisfaction—of life in its immortal freshness and beauty. It was the earth's centre, as the habitation of rational and perfect humanity—the seat of that dominion which was given to man as the deputy and image of God, and from which he was gradually—had he stood in his original position—to extend his sway, and the blessings of his ample heritage, over the other regions of the habitable globe. There, as our great poet has sung in immortal verse, nature concentrated her whole wealth, so as to make—"A heaven on earth, a happy rural seat of various view; Groves, whose rich trees wave o'erious guns and lains: Others, whose fruit, furnished with golden rim, Hang amiable—Hesperian fables true—

If true, here only, and of delicious taste.
EGYPT

EGON [Eglon, Eglon]. A king of Moab, who, after the disasters that had fallen on the Moabite race under the hand of God, rallied his scattered forces, and made severe reprisals upon the Israelites. In communion with the Amalekites and Ammonites, he brought the people on the further side of Jordan into subjection, and even carried his conquests into the interior of the land of Canaan, so far at least as to get possession of Jericho, and to make it one of his head-quarters, Josh. iii. 13. It was probably in that city that he was slain by Ehud; but while the sacred record relates various particulars regarding the manner of his death, it does not distinctly mention the place where the blow was struck. Eglon held the eastern portion of the Israelites in bondage for eighteen years.

EGON, the name also of an ancient city in Canaan, whose king, Deborah, formed one of the five Amorite kings that laid siege to Gibeah, and were overthrown by Joshua, Josh. x. 3. The city itself was taken by Joshua, and all its inhabitants destroyed, Josh. x. 13. Its site is still matter of dispute (Josephus, Antiquities, iii. 282; Porter, Handbook, p. 357).

EGON (Greeks, "Alcyon, Alkyon; Hebrew, "Aqor or "Mesor, from the sea of Ham; in the language of the country in hieroglyphics, which signifies the black land; and by the Arabs of the present day, "Mesor; a country in the north eastern part of Africa, latitude at Assamot, 21° 14', and at Beer-besor, 31° 36' N.; longitude at Abalad-el Solomun, 25° E.; and river El Arish, 31° E.; and bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the east by the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea, on the south by Nubia, and on the west by the Libyan Desert. The greatest length of Egypt is about 250 miles, comprehending the Gulf of Atricia, the lesser Oasis, and the Oasis of Ammun; but inhabited Egypt is confined to the valley of the Nile, which in the widest part does not exceed 50 miles, while for its general length the width is only from 10 to 15 miles, decreasing at the southern boundary to 2 miles. Throughout the entire length of the country run two ranges of lofty mountains, the Arabian Hills on the east, and the Libyan on the west, and through the centre of the valley thus formed runs the Nile, called in the translation of the Bible the great river of Egypt; its course does not appear, though it occurs in the original text. Of the sources of the Nile, all that we know is that, about 7 south of Assamot, three rivers unite to form the waters of the Nile—1st, the White river, flowing from snowy mountains south of the equator; 2d, the Blue river, rising in Abyssinia; and 3d, the Tescna or Alburn, the Astaborn or Strabo, the eastern source. From the cataracts at Assamot, the Nile flows northward through Upper Egypt, until it reaches lat. 30° 12', where it divides into two main streams, the Herostotic now the Besulat mouth to the west; and the Phintatic now the Donihatt mouth to the east, the other five mouths which formerly existed being now silted up. These two streams, conjoined with a third springing a little higher up, inclose that portion of land known as the Delta, from its resemblance to the Greek letter Α, and which owes its existence to the deposits of alluvial matter brought down the stream. The Nile has no tides, but a current at the rate of two and a half or three miles an hour constantly running towards the sea, and the stream is always deep enough for navigation. The water is usually of a blue colour, but it becomes a reddish brown during the overflow: it is esteemed highly salubrious. The most remarkable phenomenon connected with the river is its annual regular increase, arising from the periodical rains which fall within the tropics. As rain rarely falls in Egypt, the prosperity of the country entirely depends upon this overflowing of the river, for on the subsiding of the water the land is found to be covered with a brown slaty deposit, which so fertilizes the otherwise barren soil that it produces two crops a year, while beyond the limits of the inundation there is no cultivation whatsoever. The Nile begins to rise in June, and continues to increase until September, overflowing the low lands along its course, the waters being conveyed by canals where natural channels fail. The Delta then looks like an immense marsh interspersed with islands, villages, towns, and plantations, just above the level of the water. The water remains stationary for a few days, when it gradually begins to subside, until about the end of October the land is left dry again. The seed is then sown, and an artificial irrigation is continued in two different ways, viz. by means of the water wheel, or by the instrument called céladoun. The first consists of a horizontal wheel turned by one or two oxen, which sets in motion a vertical drum, over which is slung a chaplet of earthen jars, which scoop up the water and bring it to a trough on a level with the drum. Into this trough each jar empties itself in succession, and the water is conducted by an inclined channel into the plantation, which had been previously divided into compartments of one or two yards square, by raising the mound into walls or ridges of five or six inches in height. Into each of these compartments the cultivator forms an entrance for the water, by depressing a little space in the ridge or wall with the sole of his foot; and this overlooked the channels of irrigation, and adjustment of the openings from one compartment to the other with the foot, is continued till the cultivator is assured by the growth of the plants that each compartment is daily and duly supplied with its proper quantity of water. To this peculiarity in the cultivation of the soil of Egypt, whether for corn or other productions, allusion is made in De. xi. 19.

The second means of raising water, namely, the shadow, consists of a leathern bucket slung at one end of a pole, which has a weight at the other, a contrivance by which the cultivator is enabled to scoop up the water considerably below his feet, and raise it with comparative ease to the mouth of a channel on a level with his breast. This last mode of raising water is depicted on the walls of the ancient tombs of Egypt, and also in the sculptures of Nineveh, by which we learn that the "hanging gardens," or those plantations on the artificial mounds of that celebrated city, were irrigated. The land is soon covered with green crops, which last till February, and the harvest is in March. An elevation of the river of 16 cubits, or about 26 feet, is essential to secure the prosperity of the country; and as that elevation subsides, the chaplet of buckets is lengthened, or the number of shadows is increased. Should the Nile rise above this height, it does great damage, and involves the population in distress; while if it should not attain the ordinary height, there is deficiency of crops and famine; but so regular are the operations of nature that, with rare exceptions, the inundations are nearly uniform. The rate of the deposit of mud is supposed to be about 6 inches in a century.

Ancient Egypt was divided into three parts—1st, the Thebaid, and 2d, the Hypanonies, which together were called Upper Egypt—3d, the Delta, or Lower Egypt, where the Nile divides and reaches the Mediterranean by eight natural and two false mouths; these were, beginning on the west, the Canopic, the Heracleotic, the Bollitine, the Schoenytic, the Penipentine false mouth, the Diboss false mouth, the Phaiotic, the Mendesian (Mandeb), the Tanitic (Taen), and the Pelusiac mouth. Egypt was also divided into fourteen provinces or nomes, each with a chief city; but these were not always the same, nor had they always the same boundaries, as the country round a great city was occasionally called its nome.

Climate.—The atmosphere in Egypt is extremely clear and dry, the temperature regular and exceedingly hot, though the heat is tempered during the daytime for nine months of the year by the strong wind which blows from the north, and which enables vessels to ascend the river against the stream. The winter months are the most delightful part of the year, the air being cool and balmy, and the ground covered with verdure; later, the ground becomes parched and dry; and in May the suffocating khamsson, or simoom, begins to blow into the valley from the desert plains on each side of it, raising clouds of fine sand, and causing various diseases, until the rising of the river again comes to bless the land. It rains but rarely, except near the seashore. At Memphis the rain falls perhaps three or four times in the course of a year, and in Upper Egypt only once or twice, if at all; but at night the air is heavy and the air cool and refreshing: showers of hail sometimes reach the borders of Egypt, but the formation of ice is very uncommon. Earthquakes are occasionally felt, and thunder and lightning are neither frequent nor violent. Egypt is not remarkably healthy, as in addition to visitations of plague and cholera, ophthalmia, diarrhoea, dysentery, and boils are very prevalent.

Geology and Mineralogy.—The hilly region which separates Egypt from Nubia is composed of granite rocks, which terminate at Assouan (Syene), and extend up the shore of the Red Sea to the Gulf of Suez. The Arabian and Libyan hills are both composed of cretaceous strata, the predominant rock being limestone. This sandstone extends from Assouan to Esen, about 85 miles, where it is covered by a limestone of the upper chalk series. From thence for 300 miles the valley is bounded with a tertiary mammalite limestone. Over a great extent of Egypt the rocks are covered with moving sands, and in the lands bordering on the Nile by the alluvium deposited during the inundations, and which consists of an argillaceous earth or loam, more or less mixed with sand and quartzose sand. The sedimentary deposit has no traces of stratification. The minerals used in buildings, sculpture, vases, &c., were found in the rock formations of the country: Granite, syenite, and basalt were obtained from Assouan, sandstone from Sidilis, alabaster from Tel-el-Amarna, limestone from Baut-hassan and from Toora, breccia from the Cosseir Rood, porphyry from the quarries of Gebel-Dahan, emeralds from the mines of Gebel-Zelara, gold from the mines near the Gulf of Suez, and iron from the desert plains of Nubia, native in the lakes in the Oasis of Ammon, hence called sal-ammoniac. Bitumen, salt, and sulphur are also among the other minerals of Egypt.

Botany.—It would appear that, anciently as now, Egypt did not produce timber; the only trees, besides the palm and tamarisk, being the sycamore, fig, and acacia or gum-arabic tree, which last does not attain to any size north of Wady Halfa. The poplar plant, once so important, is now nowhere to be found in the country. It was manufactured a paper, which was supplied to all the ancient world. Boats, baskets, cords, and shoes were also made of it. The disappearance of this important plant seems to have been prophetically announced in Is. xix. 7. Besides the lotus or water-lily of the Nile, Egypt has always been celebrated for its production of corn, barley, a great variety of the bean class, cocks, turkeys, onions, flax, and for plants of the cucumber tribe, as we learn from the sculptures and from several passages in Holy Writ, and they are still abundant as ever. To the products of ancient times have been added the sugar-cane, cotton plant, indigo, and tobacco. Wine was abundantly produced in Egypt, and the sculptures bear ample testimony to the extent to which the ancient Egyptians indulged in intoxicating draughts.

Zoology. — The Egyptians were celebrated in the ancient world. The camel was introduced by the Phoenicians: horses and asses abounded. The giraffe is found on the southern borders; the ibex, jackal, lemmun, and yelken are common; and the hippopotamus and crocodile formerly reached the Delta, but they are now seldom seen below Lyopolis. Water-fowl were plentiful, and were anciently prepared and salted like the fish of the Nile, as we learn from the sculptures, and must have been a great source of wealth: representations are found of such birds as the ostrich, the vulture, the hawk, the heron, &c. The crocodile, serpents, the asp, and other reptiles are common. The Nile abounds in fish, and the trionyx or soft tortoise is not infrequent. Among the countless insects are the scorpion, locust, locust, the bessent, and meposquito. The ibis, formerly so common, is now extinct. Many of the animals, birds, and reptiles were held sacred by the people: whoever killed a sacred animal, an ibis, or a hawk, was put to death. If a cat died a natural death, every person in the house shaved its eyebrows; if a dog died, the whole body and the head were shaven. The cats were buried at Babastis, the dogs in the vaults of their own cities; field mice and hawks at Buto; the ibis at Hermopolis; and other animals where they were found lying. Of all animals the sacred calf Apis was the most revered. The chief temple of this god was at Memphis. The females being sacred to Isis were thrown into the Nile, which was considered sacred, and the males were buried at Sakkarah, where their tombs have lately been discovered by G. Mariette.

Religion. — The two main principles on which the religion of Egypt was based appear to have been the existence of an omnipotent Being, whose various attributes being defined, formed a series of divinities; and the delineation of the sun and moon. Not only was every attribute of the Divinity made into a separate deity, but imaginary gods were invented to assume some office relating either to the duties or future state of mankind. Even the imaginary genius of the menes, cities, or rivers, were worshipped as gods, and each month and day were consecrated to a deity (Isa., ii. 8). Each divinity formed a triad with a wife and sister, and a son. The great triads were composed of the principal divinities, the first two members being frequently of equal rank, and the third subordinate, as in the case of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, or Amun, Mut, and Khonsu. Other triads formed of deities of an inferior class; and occasionally a sort of triad was composed of two deities and the king. While the worship of some of these gods was peculiar to particular places, the worship of others was universal: that of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, for example, having prevailed all over Egypt. The eight great gods of the first order are stated to be Nepht, Amun, Re, Pitha, Khem, Satet, Mut, Babastis, &c. The most important of these of the second order are Re, the sun, Atmo, Thoth, the moon, Athis, Amanta, Marose, &c. Nepe, Ranno. The Egyptians believed in an author of evil, who was called Typhon; and the antagonism of good and evil is shown by the opposition of the solar gods and the dragon Apephs, and the hostility between Typhon. The Egyptians believed in the transmigration of souls, and in the existence of a future state, in which mankind would be rewarded or punished according to their actions while on earth. There is also a distinct allusion to a resurrection of the body, as we gather from the many representations of the soul returning to animate it, and likewise a curious picture bearing a strong allusion to the resurrection, and the two natures of man, the earthly and the spiritual, (Tripe Memoir, Case of Amenemhet by Storrs and others). Copies details and illustrations of the religion of the Egyptians will be found in Jablonski's Paithen, Wilkinson's and Egypt, &c. and for the impurities connected with it, see article Cem-Worship.

History. — The Egyptians are the earliest people known to us as a nation. When Abraham entered the Delta from Canaan, they had been long enjoying the advantages of a settled government and established laws. They had already built cities, practised agriculture, and parceled out their valley into farms. They revered a landmark as a god, while their neighbors knew of no property but lands and movables. They had invented hieroglyphics, and improved them into syllabic writing, and almost into an alphabet. They had invented records, and wrote their kings' names and actions on the massive temples which they raised. As we have no means authentic of counting the ages during which this civilization was progressing, we shall overlook those years when the gods were said to have reigned on the earth, and the times of Moses, the fabulous founder of the monarchy, and regard history as beginning with the earliest maining records, namely, the temple at Karnak and the Obelisk at Heliopolis, both raised by Osiris, the great pyramid, but before Sopis and Screenish, kings of Memphis; with the tablets in the copper mines near Sina, which record the conquest of that country by Sopis, and prove that these mines had been already worked by the Egyptians. Such, then, was the state of Egypt in the time of Abraham, about 1500 B.C. The country was divided into several little kingdoms, whose boundaries cannot now be exactly known. In the valley to the south of Siblis was the kingdom of Elephantine; next was the kingdom of Thebes, which perhaps included all the valley to the east of the Nile, for it had a port at Eema on the Red Sea, and thus traded with Arabia. On the west of the river was the kingdom of This or Abydos, which had some trade with the Great Oasis and the kingdom of Hemopolis. Embracing the western half of the Delta was the kingdom of Memphis, which in the reign of Sopris had been strong enough to conquer Thebes and the peninsula of Sinai. In the cast of the Delta were the kingdoms of Bubastis and Tanis.

It was in the time of these petty monarchies that the Chaldean and Phoenician herders were moving westward and settling quietly in the Delta, till after a few generations they took possession of some of the cities and levied a tribute from the Egyptians. Their sovereigns, called the Hyksos or shepherd kings, dwelt at Altares—probably the city afterwards called Helopolis—and they held their ground in Egypt for about six reigns. The tyranny of the Hyksos led the states of Egypt to unite against them; and Amasis, king of Thebes, making common cause with the kings of the other parts of Egypt, the hateful Phoenicians were defeated and driven from the country, probably about 1550 B.C., and 200 years after the reign of Osiris I. With Amasis and the expulsion of the Hyksos began the chieftains of that great Thothian kings, whose temples, and statues, and obelisks, and tombs, have for more than 3000 years made the valley of the Nile a place of interest. The kings of the other parts of Egypt sank to the rank of sovereign priests. Amemath R, gained Ethiopia by marriage. Thothmosis II. added Memphis to his dominions by his marriage with Queen Niboris, the builder of the third pyramid. Thothmosis IV. built the temple between the two paws of the great Sphinx. Amemath III. set up his two gigantic statues in the plain of Thebes, one of which uttered its musical notes every morning at sunrise. Amenophththah I. added to the temples of Thebes and of Albydos. Ra- meses II. (Sesostris) covered Egypt and Ethiopis, and the coasts of the Red Sea, with his temples, obelisks, and statues. He was successful against the neighbouring Arabs, and marched through Palestine to the shores of the Black Sea. Ra- meses H, still further adorned Thebes with his architecture. It was at the beginning of this period, before Memphis was united to Thebes, that the Israelites settled in the Delta, and that Joseph, as chief minister of the king of Memphis, changed the laws of Lower Egypt. It was after Thebes and Mem- phis were united, when Joseph's services had been forgotten, that Moses led his countrymen out of Egypt to escape the tyranny of their masters. The wealth of the Egyptians at this time was proverbial, and the still existing monuments of their magnificence prove the high civilization of the country. The Jewish nation was weak and struggling with difficulties before the reign of David; the history of Greece begins with the Trojan war; but before the time of David and the Trojan war, the power and glory of Thebes had passed away. Upper Egypt sank under the rising power of the Delta. Theban prosperity had lasted for about 500 years.

B.C. 990.—On the fall of Thebes, Shishak of Bubas- tis, the conqueror of Rechoborn, governed all Egypt, and recorded on the walls of the great Theban temple his victories over the Jews. After his death Egypt was torn by civil wars, and Zerah king of Ethiopia was able to march through the whole length of the land. For a few reigns the kingdom was go- verned by kings of Tanis. Then the kings of Ethiopia ruled in Thebes, and led the armies of Egypt to aid the Israelites against their Assyrian oppressors. This unsettlement of affairs lasted nearly 300 years, during which, as the prophet Isaiah had foretold, Egyptians fought against Egyptians, every one against his brother and against his neighbour; city against city, and king- dom against kingdom. The city of Sais at length obtained the mastery by the aid of the number of Greeks that had settled there, and of the skill in arms of the Greek mercenaries whom the kings of Sais took into their pay. The kings of Sais were more despotic than the kings of Thebes, but under their rule Egypt again enjoyed a high degree of prosperity. They struggled with the Babylonians for the domination of Judea—Psammetichus conquered Ethiopia—Necho began the canal from the Nile to the Red Sea. His sailors circumnavigated Africa; he conquered Jeru- salem; and when the Chaldees afterwards drove back the Egyptian army, the remnant of Judah, with the prophet Jeremiah, retreated into Egypt, to seek a refuge with the king Hopala. The colony of Greeks at Naumarus, a little below Sais, now became of importance. The Greek philosophers, Thales and Solon, visited the country. Hechene of Miletus went up as high as Thebes, and Pythagoras dwelt many years among the priests. But Egyptian greatness rested on a weak foun- dation: jealousy increased between the native soldiers and the Greek mercenaries; the armies had to encounter the powerful and ambitious monarchies of Asia, and, as for tole especially by Ezzikel, Elcan, and Assay, were put to the worse. Cyrus reconquered the island of Cyprus, and finally Cambyses overran Egypt and reduced it to the rank of a Persian province, B.C. 523. During 200 years Egypt suffered severely under its Persian rulers, or else from its own struggles for freedom. Cambyses plundered the tombs and temples, broke the statues, and smorged the priests. Darius governed more mildly by native satraps; but after his death at Marathon, the Egyptians rose and made themselves independent for a brief period. After- wards, when Ptolemy rebelled against Artaxerxes, they again rose and made Iuranus and Amyntas kings. Then for a few years Hellanica and Herodoctus, and other inquiring Greeks, were able to enter the country, and study the customs of this remarkable people. When the Egyptians were again conquered, Darius Nothus attempted to alter the religion of the country; but when the civil war broke out between Artaxerxes Meconon and the younger Cyrus, the Egyptians re- belled a third time against the Persians, and with the help of the Greeks, were again an independent mon- archy. Plato and Eusonos then visited the country. The fourth conquest by the Persians was the last, and Egypt was governed by a Persian satrap till Persia itself was conquered by Alexander the Great, B.C. 332.

When Alexander's army occupied Memphis, the numer- ous Greeks who had settled in Lower Egypt found themselves the ruling class. Egypt became at once a Greek kingdom, and Alexander showed his wisdom in the regulations by which he guarded the prejudices and religion of the Egyptians, who were henceforth to be treated as inferiors, and forbidden to carry arms. He founded Alexandria as the Greek capital. On his death, his lieutenant Ptolemy made himself king of Egypt, being the first of a race of monarchs who go- verned for 500 years, and made it the second chief kingdom in the world, till it sunk under its own luxu- ries and vices and the rising power of Rome. The Ptolemies founded a large public library and a museum of learned men. Under their patronage, Theocritus, Callimachus, Lycocharon, and Apollonius Rhodius wrote their poems; Euclid composed his Elements of Geometry; Apollonius of Perga invented conic sections; Hipparchus made a catalogue of the stars; Eratothenes measured the size of the earth; the Bible was translated into Greek; several of the Apocryphal books were written; Homer was edited; anatomy was studied. Poetry soon sunk under the despotism, and the writers were then content to clothe science in verse. Aratus wrote an astronomical poem; Manetho an astrological poem; Nicander a medical poem; and afterwards, Hieronymus a geographical poem. Under these Alexandrian kings the native Egyptians still continued building their grand and massive temples, nearly in the style of those built by the kings of Thebes and Sais. The temples in the island of Philae, in the Gulf of Aquis, at Letopolis, at Qimbes, at Dendera, and at Thebes, prove that the Ptolemies had not wholly crushed the zeal and energy of the Egyptians. An Egyptian phalanx had been formed, armed and disciplined like the Greeks. These soldiers rebelled unmistakably against Epiphanes, and then Thebes rebelled against Soter II., but was so crushed that it never again held rank among cities.

But while the Alexandrians were keeping down the Egyptians, they were themselves sinking under the Romans. Epiphanes asked for Roman help; his two sons appealed to the senate to settle their quarrels and guard the kingdom from Syrian invasion. Alexander H. was placed on the throne by the Romans, and two sons went to Rome to ask for help against his subjects. Lastly, the beautiful Cleopatra, the disgrace of her country and the理想的 of the republic, maintained her power by surrendering her person, first to Julius Caesar, and then to Mark Antony. On the defeat of Mark Antony by Augustus, B.C. 30, Egypt became a province of Rome, and was governed by the emperors with jealous suspicion. It was still a Greek state, and Alexandria was the chief seat of Greek learning and science. Its library, which had been burned by Caesar's soldiers, had been replaced by that from Pergamus. The Egyptians yet continued building temples and covering them with hieroglyphics as of old; but on the spread of Christianity, the old superstitions lost their sway; the animals were no longer worshipped; and we find few hieroglyphical inscriptions after the reign of Commodus. Now arose in Alexandria the Christian catechetical school, which produced Clemens and Origen. The sects of Gnostics united astrology and magic with religion. The school of Alexandrian Platonics produced Plotinus and Proclus. Monasteries were built all over Egypt; Christian monks took the place of the pagan hermits, and the Bible was translated into Coptic. On the division of the Roman empire, A.D. 337, Egypt fell to the lot of Constantinople. On the rise of the Arian controversy the Egyptians belonged to the Arian party, while the Greeks of Alexandria were chiefly Arians. Hence a new cause of weakness to their government under the Theodosiæ, Paganism and Arianism were forbidden by law and the library was burned by the Arians, and the last traces of science retreated from Alexandria before ignorance and bigotry. The country sunk by year in civilization, in population, and in strength; and when the Arabs, animated by religion and with all the vigour of a new people, burst forth upon their neighbours, Egypt was conquered by the followers of Mahomet, A.D. 640, six hundred years after it had been conquered by the Romans. So time has proved the prediction of Ezekiel, that Egypt should be a base kingdom, ch. xxiv. 10.

The population of Egypt must have been very large in the earliest times. It has been placed at 7,000,000 under the Pharaohs at 2,500,000 exclusive of Alexandria in the time of Nero. Volney gave the number 2,200,000. Böhring's report on Egypt at 3,200,000. At the present time it is above 3,000,000 population of Cairo, 300,000.

Architecture and Sculpture.

The monuments we have left to us in Egypt are of two periods — those built in the times of the Pharaohs, and those built during the rule of the Greek and Roman kings of the country. Although the temples of the two periods differ considerably in plan and in other particulars, there is yet some reason for believing that these built under the Greeks and Romans were constructed after designs, as they certainly occupy the sites, of Pharonic temples still more ancient than any now existing; that they were, in fact, mere restorations of temples built by the earlier Pharaohs.

The leading features of the now existing temples of the time of the Pharaohs are these: First, a gateway or pylons, flanked by two truncated pyramids, shown in elevation No. 222, and marked a and b. On the plan No. 223. These occupy the entire width of the building, and form the entrance to a square court c, surrounded by a portico supported by a double or single row of columns. Crossing this court c, the visitor passes through a second pylons into the inner court d, which was likewise surrounded by a portico supported either by columns or by piers, against which were figures of the king (No. 224). Beyond this second court, it would appear, the public were not admitted.
for the spaces between the front row of columns or piers facing the gateway, are occupied by a dwarf wall, which effectively barred entrance excepting at either one or three points where there were gates. This inner court of led immediately into the largest chamber of the temple, called the "Hall of Columns" (No. 225), the roof of which was always supported by columns, representing a grove of papyrus. The centre avenue was higher than the rest of the hall, and consisted usually of twelve columns, the capitals being imitated from the full-blown expanded papyrus (No. 228); while the columns which sustained the lower roof were in the form of a bud of the same plant (No. 226). To the Hall of Columns succeeded a series of smaller chambers, the roofs of which were generally supported by six or four columns, imitating the bud of the papyrus, either as a single plant, or as several bound together (No. 227); or else by square piers, or columns with eight, twelve, or sixteen faces (No. 229). These apartments frequently surrounded a dark chamber—the most sacred in the temple—the holy of holies. Whether the roof of the portico which surrounded the court was supported by piers or columns, the structural arrangements were always precisely the same. There roof stones which rested upon the architrave (No. 230). The bulk of the column, in proportion to the weight it had to sustain, was extremely ample; and the pressure being always perpendicular, these ancient structures have come down to us with their roofs sound, while arched buildings of much less antiquity have been entirely ruined by the lateral pressure which that mode of construction exerts on the walls.

The Egyptian gate was peculiarly simple, with its undisguised lintel and door-posts, all so vividly reminding us of the memorable night on which so many door-posts and lintels in Egypt were marked with the blood of the passover, Ex. xii. 7. The lintel was always of one stone, and the door-posts also were very frequently of only one block, while each of the three portions had its appropriate decoration. In the smaller doorways, where no cavetto and torus were super-added, the lintel bore the winged globe or protecting divinity of entrance, and was besides decorated with the names of the divinities to whom the temple was dedicated, and of the Pharaoh who built it. The door-posts also bore the name and title of the builder.

In the larger gates, such as the propylon of Luxor, the globe was sculptured in the cavetto, and the posts with figures of the king making offerings to the different divinities. The surface of each architectural feature was engraved with its particular ornament appropriately coloured. In the carvings of the cornice it was customary to place the names and titles of the Pharaoh or king, with the other significant decorations peculiar to that member of the cultus. The next member, the torus or bead, had its special decoration; and the architrave stone was likewise symbolically ornamented with the names of the divinities to whom the temple was dedicated, and of the sovereign in whose time it was built. The abacus of the column was invariably decorated with the royal titles.

The capitals were painted in accordance with the intention of the form; if, for instance, the expanded papyrus (No. 228), the leaves of the calyx would be yellow, and the filaments green. Beneath were five horizontal divisions, which probably represented the blue and white bands with which the columns of the primitive temples were adorned on festive occasions. To these succeeded a representation of the king offering gifts to the gods of the temple; and lastly, the yellow and red lines at the base of the shaft signified the brown leaves that envelop the base of the stalk of the natural plant. A further intimation of the origin of this order of Egyptian column is the presence of three ridges extending up the shaft to the bands of the neck of the capital, by which the triangular form of the stalk of the plant was intended to be signified (see sections at No. 229).
No. 251 represents a restoration of the propylon or gate of the temple of Luxor, a ruin which is in excellent preservation, though the lower portion is buried in the accumulated rubbish of the modern village. In the illustration the rubbish is removed from the base of the towers, and also from the sphinxes of the great avenue, which extends from the front of this temple to the side entrance of the temple of Karnak. We know from representations upon the walls that flag-staffs were inserted into these grooves, which are invariably found in all the towers of the propyla that flank the entrance to the temples of Egypt of whatever period. Over these grooves are holes and small chambers, in which were contrivances for affixing these staffs to the towers. On each side of the gate is seated a colossal statue of the Pharaoh who built this entrance to the temple, and in front of each tower is a similar statue.

In no instance does a statue of a king occur except by the side of a gate, e.g. xxiii. 1; and xxiv. 17.

The foregoing is a general description of the ordinary form of the temples of the age of the Pharaohs, but there are no two specimens now remaining which agree in all particulars.

The temples built during the reigns of the Greek and Roman kings may be thus described (Nos. 252, 253): First, the propylon, with its truncated pyramidal towers, which were sometimes adorned with narrow flags on tall poles; then a court surrounded on three sides with a colonnade. At the extremity of the court, and facing the gateway, was an elevated portico of six columns in line, and three or four deep. The initiates obviously were not permitted to enter beyond the court, for the first row of columns of the portico are invariably joined by a dwarf wall, the only opening being between the centre intercolumniation, to which were attached the values of the gate. To the portico succeeded a series of small chambers, the roofs of which were supported by four or by two columns. The centre chambers were lighted by small square openings in the roof, and those at the side by small openings in the walls; but in no example is there that kind of clerestory performed with large openings, that occurs in the Hall of Columns of the Pharaonic temples. Besides the foregoing characteristics, there is an elaborate form of capital, representing the papyrus in three stages of growth, in one capital (No. 255), or sometimes a collection of lotus flowers (No. 254), or the full-blown papyrus alone (No. 255); but in no instance do we find the pier with the attached figure (No. 224), nor the single bud of the papyrus (No. 226).
The temples of the Roman period are usually inferior in extent to the Ptolemaic buildings; they are also remarkable for a yet more elaborate form of capital, more salient and curvilinear forms in the sculpture and architectural decorations, and a still more perfect masonry. Granite seems rarely to have been employed for architectural purposes in any part of Egypt excepting the Delta. In the Tebtunis it was used chiefly for sculpture, the ordinary building material being the limestone of the district, or the fine sandstone of the quarries of Siut.

The most usual kind of mural sculpture, and entirely peculiar to the Egyptians, seems to have been designed to endure to the latest time. The outline of the object intended to be represented is cut into the smooth surface of the wall, while at the same time the minor forms and rotundities are represented within the incised outline. By this contrivance the general outline is the last part to suffer injury, for to obliterate it the whole surface of the wall must first be destroyed. Sometimes the outline is excessively deep, at others the surface of the figures is altogether much lower than the general surface of the wall, and in others the outline is but slightly incised with a corresponding flatness within.

The Egyptians rarely practised the true basse-relievo, but wherever they did so the sculpture is almost invariably in very low relief. The back view of the human figure is never represented in the low-reliefs excepting in the case of an enemy, and then rarely; the figure is generally represented in profile, and there are but few attempts at delineating the front view of the foot or of the face; however, whether the face be represented in front or side view, a profile eye is never found. The figures of the king in battle-epics, and of the landlord proprietor in domestic scenes, are always on a much larger scale than the other actors in the piece, from whence we may infer that superior size typified persons of sovereign power, men of renown, or of official or domestic importance. In Egyptian sculpture the erect figure in the round invariably has the left leg advanced, as if about to march; another peculiarity of the round figures is that the limbs are never entirely detached from the body of the stone, the portion of the work thus left being always painted white.

In addition to the foregoing special characteristics, are certain conventionalities of colour worth noting. The Egyptians are represented with red and yellow complexions, red eyes for the men and yellow for the women. The hair of the king is frequently painted blue, but that of ordinary men black. In representing the various nations with whom they had intercourse, they seem to have endeavoured to imitate the complexions peculiar to each. Amen Re, the chief divinity of Thebes, is always painted blue, and he is further distinguished by two high feathers which he wears in his cap. The interior divinities are not uncommonly of the complexions of mortals. The sky or heavens are invariably indicated by a strip of blue coming downwards at the lower side of each extremity (No. 237), and occasionally having upon it a row of five-pointed stars. Water, seas, and rivers are represented by a series of zigzag lines of a blue or green colour. Mountains have a yellow colour, with red spots upon it. (For the peculiar manners and customs illustrated by the monuments, see PAG, BEARDS, BRICKS, CHARIOTS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, SHEEP AND WEAVERS, &c.)

Arts and Manufactures. The civilization and customs of the Egyptians at the time of the erection of the pyramids differed in no important points from those of their descendants. The masonry of the passages in the great pyramid has not been surpassed at any age; while the pile is so accurately placed north and south, that the variation of the compass may be ascertained from the direction of its sides. More than 2000 B.C., the Egyptians had duodecimal as well as decimal numbers; weights and measures adjusted to a pound of 1400 grains. The geographical division of the country; the division of the year into twelve months of thirty days, the year being divided into three periods of four months each—the period of inundation, the period of vegetation, and the period of harvest; ornaments of gold and silver; musical instruments; and with the exception of horses and chariots, the paintings represent the usual industrial pursuits of after times. The statues of the most ancient times were worked to a fixed canon. Bronze statues cast from moulds and having a core of earth were first made in Egypt and introduced thence into Greece by Rhodius. Painting in tempera appeared at the same age, but encaustic not till the Greek and Roman periods. Their musical instruments were harps, lyres, guitars, drums, tambourines, clappers, double and single pipes, flutes, cymbals, the zither, and a few others of less common occurrence. Their armaments were various, including dancing of the bards, jugglers, wandering, mariners, ball, drachms, dice, more, single-stick, quarter-staff, wrestling, bull-fights, &c. (Ancient Egypt, vol. i. p. 199-232.) In mechanical arts, the carpenter, boat-builder, potter, leather-cutter, glass-blower, and others, are frequently represented; and we see the blow-pipe, hewers, and syphons; the press, balance, lever, the saw, the adze, the chisel, the foors, the ordinary, harpoon, mazor; we have also glazèd pottery, the potter's wheel, and the kiln; and dated specimen of glass of the time of Thothmes III, 1415 B.C. In metallurgy, gold-beating, damascening, engraving, casting, inlaying, wire-drawing, and other processes. Tin and zinc, as well as iron and steel, are either proved by discoveries or inferred from the monuments. In agriculture, are the plough, hoe, sickle, and other implements. In warfare, shields, cuirasses of quilted leather, helmets, spears, clubs, axes, daggers, bows, battle-axes, pole-axes, hatchets, and falchions: for scribes the testudo,, and besides the crucibles. The processes of growing and preparing flax, and making into thread, string, ropes, and cloth, as well as the looms employed, are all depicted. Mats and baskets were beautifully made either of the flax cloth or palm-leaves, or of the outer rind of the papyrus plant, the pith of which was used in making paper. Collins or wooden sarcophagi were chiefly of sycamore deal or cedar, covered with stucco and richly painted. The ordinary boats of the Nile were of planks of the native, and had two rubbers or large oars, and the sail of cloth frequently painted or worked in coloured patterns. Many of the vessels of burden were of great size. The boats made of papyrus were mostly punts for fishing, or for gliding through the canals of the Delta. Implements for painting, hammers, bells, crucibles, and surgical instruments have all been found, and are preserved in various museums. The commerce of the Egyptians with neighboring nations enriched the country with slaves, cattle, gems, metals, rare animals, and objects of curiosity. The Egyptians expended enormous wealth on the tombs and furniture of the dead, and the paintings acquired as fully with the cryptographs, followed from the beginning to the final judgment.

Hieroglyphics. The inscribed slabs of black basalt now in the British Museum, and known as the Rosetta Stone, was accidentally discovered by the French among the ruins of Fort St. Julien, near the Rosetta mouth of the Nile, and hurried over to the English according to the terms of the treaty of Alexandria. This stone furnished the clue to the knowledge of hieroglyphics which we at present possess. Prior to its discovery, the only help to our study of hieroglyphics was a treatise of little value by Herodotus, a few lines by Herodotus, and a few more by Clement. The hieroglyphical writing went out of use on the spread of Christianity, and the very language itself, the Coptic, became a dead language, so that after a time the Bible and services of the church were written with a translation, that they might be understood in Arabic by the vulgar, while read in Coptic by the priest. The Rosetta Stone contains an inscription in three characters. One is in hieroglyphics; a second in what we now call an hieratic or common Egyptian letters; and the third in Greek. This last could, of course, be read. It is a decree by the priests in honour of Ptolemy Epiphaneus; and it ends with the important information that it was to be written in three characters. The Greek was clearly seen to be a translation, by which the other two inscriptions might be understood. It is to the sagacity of Dr. Thomas Young, and through his comparison of the several inscriptions on the Rosetta Stone, that we owe our first knowledge of this mode of writing. He determined the meaning of all the sentences, of many of the words, and of several of the letters. This knowledge was enlarged and corrected by Champollion, Mr. Salt, Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Mr. Sharpe, Mr. Birch, and other students both at home and abroad, who have made further additions; and the result is some definite information belonging to the three sciences of history, mythology, and language. In history we have obtained a pretty correct series of the kings' names; and dates approaching the truth have been assigned to the existing works of art. In mythology we have learned the names of the gods, the ages in which some rose into importance and others fell, the groups into which they were arranged, many of their attributes, and their union of several characters, in one person. In the department of language we have learned the origin of writing and the system pursued by the Egyptians in the use of it. The language of Egypt, as it was spoken in the first centuries of our era, is preserved in the Coptic Bible, the lives of some Egyptian saints, and a few other books. By these, since the discovery of the phonetic value of so many of the hieroglyphics on the walls of the temple, and of the hieratic writings of the papyri, it has been abundantly proved that the Coptic is the legitimate descendant of the language of the Pharaohs. All that is wanted for the more complete decipherment of the ancient texts is a large collection of Coptic words than the known works in that language supply; and a larger and more accurate collection of copies of the texts furnished by the monuments in a form convenient for study. It is not our province to enter into an analysis of the language of the hieroglyphics, and therefore it will be sufficient to remark that there appears to be but a slight affinity between the Hebrew and the hieroglyphics, except in the grammatical structure of the language, and the paws, which are identical with those of the Hebrew and the cognate dialects.

It is impossible to enumerate here more than a few of the works which now exist on the history, antiquities, and manners of Egypt. Among the most valuable and accessible for biblical students, are Sir J. Wilkinson's Researches and Observations of the Ancient Egyptians, with which may be coupled Lane's Modern Egyptians, and Mrs. Peden's Edifices and Monuments in Egypt; Bingenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses; Procureurs d'Egypte; Rossellini, Monumenti dell'Egitto; Kenrick's Ancient Egypt; Budge, Relic of Egypt; Sharpe's Copt. Egypt; as also valuable articles in Notes and Observations on Egypt and Hieroglyphics | [54 | EHUD [etymological import unknown], one of the persons who was raised up to deliver Israel in the time of the judges, and to vindicate their cause, the descendant of the tribe of Benjamin, and the son of Gera. While he was evidently a man of valour, and had doubtless at heart the best interests of his people, the mode he took to accomplish the object he had in view was certainly liable to reproach, and allowance requires to be made for the circumstances of the time. It had too much the character of meeting the adversary with his own weapons. Ehud went at the head of a deputation which had been sent to offer a present, or possibly to pay a tribute under that form, from the portions of Canaan that had fallen under the sway of Edom. And after the gift had been presented, and the company of deputies had got as far as what is called the quarries on their way back, Ehud returned, and on the precipitous ground of having some important message to deliver to Edom, was allowed to enter with him into a private chamber, where he suddenly stabbed him. His being left-handed gave him an opportunity of more easily accomplishing his purpose, as the action of his hand was not perceived by the adversary, till too late, to save himself from the stroke. And Ehud having taken the precaution of locking the door behind him, found time to make his escape before any alarm was raised regarding the deed he had committed. He hurried on to acquaint his countrymen with the fact; and having blown the trumpet in Mount Ephraim, he assessed a band of valiant men, who fell upon the Muleites before they had time to recover from their consternation, and broke their yoke from the neck of Israel. Undoubtedly that yoke had been unrighteously imposed, and the I-sedmites were at liberty to resort to all lawful means to obtain deliverance from its burden. At the same time, it behoved them to remember that it had come upon them as a chastisement from God for their sins, and that, in the very payment of an offering or tribute, they made a formal acknowledgment of their actual subjection to the supremacy of Moab. However justly therefore Edom may have fallen under the fatal stroke of Elam, one cannot justify, on abstract principles of righteousness, the inflicting of such a stroke under a profession of friendship and by an artifice of deceit. But in saying this we do not impute to the reality of his faith, or the honesty of his zeal in the cause of God.

EKRON [apparently from וַיְקָרָן, to reed or pluck up], Sept. Εἰκρών; Aramaic, one of the five chief cities of the Philistines. In common with the other cities it was assigned to the tribe of Judah, 1 Ki. xiv. 15; but afterwards it appears among the cities of Dan, Jos. xix. 15, which may perhaps be explained from its having been a border city, Jos. xii. 32; so that it might have been occupied by either tribe that could gain possession of it. According to Jos. i. 41, it was actually taken at an early period by Judah; but it must soon again have reverted into the hands of its original occupants; for in the first book of Samuel, and also in the later Scriptures, it always appears as a strictly Philistine city, 1 Sa. xi. 1; 2 Sa. x. 1; 2 Ki. xix. 5. It stood upon the north-west-boundary of Philistia, and hence came into nearest contact with the occupied portion of the Israelitish territory. From this alone one may infer it to have been a place of considerable strength; since, while in so exposed a situation, it could still maintain its ground against the tide of Israelitish conquest for so many generations. Its site is now occupied by a small village of unplastered bricks, and one may also say its name still survives; as Akhi, the name of the latter, is evidently but another form of the ancient Ekron.

EL, one of the Hebrew names for God, and often found in composition as part of the appropriate names given to persons and objects. (See God.)

ELAH [arab. el-hāl], a common name, De. xxxii. 17; 1 Ki. iv. 19; 10. ch. ix. 15; but chiefly known as the name of Baasha's son and successor on the throne of Israel. He was cut off in the second year of his reign by Zimri, "the captain of half his chariots," in the midst of a drunken revel. With him the line of Baasha became extinct, 1 Ki. xvi. 41.

ELAIH, the name of a valley which formed the scene of David's memorable conflict with the giant Goliath, 1 Sa. xix. 24—most probably so named from the terebinth-trees which grew in it. It is described as "between Shechem and Azokah," but there is some doubt as to the exact position of these places, and authorities consequently differ as to the locality of the valley of Elath. But the opinion of Dr. Robinson is now generally followed, who identifies it with the Wady es Suat, or Valley of Acracia, which lies about 11 miles south-west from Jerusalem, on the way toward Gaza. The largest terebinth he saw in Palestine stood in the vicinity of this valley. (Recherches, vol. ii, p. 39.)

ELAM, El'ah-ma'is, a province of the ancient Persian and Babylonian empires, and understood to be the same with the region called Susiana by the Greek geographers, having Susa for its capital. In Scripture, however, it seems first as the name of one of Shem's sons, the head ofless of a orient tribe, 2 Es. x. 2; and by the time of Abraham, Cheleb-amur, the king of Elam appears in connection with the king of Shinar or Babylon, as taking part in the descent that was made upon the cities of the plain, Gen. xiv. 1. By the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah Elam is associated with Media, much as elsewhere Persia is, Is. xxi. 2; Je. xxv. 25; and in the latest writings of the Old Testament the Elamites rank among the nations of the Persian empire, Eze. xiv. 5. By Daniel also Susa is placed in the province of Elam on the banks of the Ulu or Eulacus, and Elam itself included as one of the divisions of the Babylonian empire, Eze. xx. 2. It would seem, therefore, that strictly speaking Elam was no more than a province, though an extensive province, of Persia; but from the Elamites having been among the original inhabitants of that part of the world, and having for a considerable time maintained an independent position, Elam came to be not infrequently employed as a name for the whole of Persia. Hence, not only do we find mention made of a king of Elam so early as the time of Abraham, but Elam is represented by Ezekiel as among the nations that had been the terror of the world, Eze. xxvi. 21; and, like the Persians generally, its people are spoken of as excelling in the use of the quiver and bow, Is. xix. 3; Je. xxv. 25. Elamites are mentioned among the representatives of the different nations that heard the word of God in their own tongues on the day of Pentecost; but this must be understood of Jews residing in that part of the world, and speaking the Elamite dialect, Ac. vii. 4. (See Per.Sia.)

ELAM, the name, 1. of a Levite, a Kohathite, who in the time of David had a subordinate charge about the house of God, 1 Ch. xxvii. 3; 2. of a chief man of the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Ch. viii. 21; 3. of some person, otherwise unknown, who gave his name to a large party who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon, Eze. ii. 7; 4. of apparently another person, called "the other Elam," from whom a company of precisely the same number, 1254, derived their designation, Eze. ii. 24; Ne. vii. 24; 5. of a priest who took part with Nehemiah at the dedication of the second temple.

ELASAH, sometimes also in English Bible ELEASAH, but the same in the original τῷ Ελασpersona). 1. a man of the tribe of Judah, son of Hozai, 1 Ch. viii. 29; 2. a man of the family of Saul, by the line of Jonathan, 1 Ch. viii. 37; ix. 7; 3. one of the family of Pashur, who had married a Gentile wife, Ex. x. 22; 4. a son of Shaphan, who, along with another person, carried a letter from Zedekiah king of Judah to the king of Babylon, and took charge also of Jeremiah's letter to the captives in Babylon, Je. xxthree.

ELATH, the name of an Arabian city. The Hebrew is אֶלָת, which seems to have been variously supplied with vowels, and to have assumed a diversity of forms; commonly Elath, but sometimes also Eloth; in Jerome it is Ailath, in the Sept. 'Aλάθ, in Josephus 'Aλαζόν, and the Greeks and Romans called it Elama. It is written Elath in Scripture, with one exception, which has Eloth, 1 Ki. iv. 26. The place stood on the shore of the Red Sea, not very far from Edion-geber, as stated in the passage last referred to, and appears to EL-DAD [laird of God], one of the seventy elders who had been appointed under Moses to assist in the administration of justice among the people. He is mentioned along with Medad, another elder, as having on a particular occasion received the gift of prophecy, which came upon them in the camp, while Moses and the rest of the elders were assembled around the door of the tabernacle. The spirit of prophecy was upon them all; and the simple peculiarity in the case of Elad and Medad was, that they did not lose their share in the gift, though they abode in the camp, but they prophesied there. It appeared, however, an iniquity to Joshua the son of Nun, and seems to have suggested the idea that they were using the gift with a view to their own aggrandizement. He therefore commanded Moses to forbid them. But Moses nobly replied, "Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them," Nu. xii. 23, 24.

ELDERS [Heb. נדלא, Greek πρεσβύτεροι, English elders, presbyters or elders]. The word is occasionally used both in the singular and the plural, with respect simply to the age of the party spoken of; as when Joseph is said to have gone up to bury his father "with the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt," Ge. xli. 17; or when Timothy is instructed to "reprove not an elder i.e., a man in advanced life, an elderly person, but entreat him as a father, and the younger men as brethren," I Tim. v. 1. But that commonly the word is used in an official sense, to designate individuals invested with a certain degree of authority, the recognized heads and rulers of the community to which they belonged. The name was doubtless appropriated originally to this use, because, from the patriarchal manners of the ancient people of God, the persons raised to such official prominence commonly were those of ripened age and experience. It would seem that even in Egypt a kind of government was maintained among them by means of such a body; for on first receiving his commission Moses is instructed to go and intimate its purport to the elders of his people, and these as a known and recognized class is said to have actually assembled, and to have made them acquainted with the message and instructions he had received, Ex. iii. 16, 17. At later periods we find a selection made from these elders for special purposes; as when Moses was called up to Mount Sinai to converse with God, seventy of the elders were appointed to go as far with him, and were privileged to have a near view of the divine glory, Ex. xxv.; and again, on the occasion of a tumult among the people, Moses was ordered to gather together "seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom he knew to be the elders of the people, and officers over them," Nu. xi. 30—evidently indicating their known official position. It was upon these elders, as the official heads and representatives of the people, that the Spirit of prophecy at that time rested—for the occasion they were made to share in the distinguishing honour of Moses. And as in the legislation of Moses certain things were committed to the charge of the elders of each particular city, Ex. xix. 21, 22, 24, it was clearly implied, that the people, on their settlement in the land of Canaan, were expected to appoint persons in the several districts, who, under the name of elders, should look after the administration of justice and the execution of the divine regulations. Hence, in the history we read of transactions occasionally taking place which were managed by, or in the presence of, the elders of particular cities, Acts xx. 13: xx. 16; iv. 23-24. In the Psalms also, and the prophets, the elders are frequently spoken of as a distinct class, bearing an official character, and occupying some extent a separate position, Ps. xlvii. 2; lxii. 8; lxvi. 1; xx. 4-5. So that there is reason to believe, the local government by elders, as it was originally in the constitution brought in by Moses, so it never wholly fell into abeyance throughout all the changes that ensued, down to the period of the Babylonish exile.

After the return from that exile, it is well known the office of the eldership, instead of losing ground, rose into higher significance and fuller organization. The synagogal institution, whether it then for the first time came into existence, or received only a fresh impulse and expansion, undoubtedly at no distant period became widely diffused, and attained to an important place in the Jewish discipline and worship. By and by every town and even village had its synagogue; while in the larger cities synagogues existed in considerable numbers. But with every synagoge there was connected a government of elders, who varied in number according to the population attached to it, but who always had the chief management of its concerns, and the power of exercising discipline upon its members. The rulers of the synagoge, and the elders of the people, of whom we so constantly read in the Gospels, were substantially one, and the highest council of the nation in the gospel age, the Sanhedrin, was composed of a certain number of those elders, along with a priest from each of the twenty-four courses into which the whole priesthood was divided. From the very nature of things, ruling was the chief part of the duty connected with the office of elder among the Jews; and it also involved a certain measure of teaching; as the ruling necessarily carried along with it a knowledge and application of the law of God. (See SYNAGOGUE.)

Considering that Christianity sprang out of Judaism, and that the first Christian communities were composed entirely, or in great part, of converts from the Jewish faith, it was natural that the governing body in the new should be fashioned after the mold of that of the old. The apostles, who in an official respect stood at the head of the church of the New Testament, were not attached to any particular portion of it; they were Christ's authorized ambassadors generally to found churches in different parts of the world; and in doing so it was manifestly the part of wisdom to avail themselves, as far as they well could, of the kind of organization that the providence and Spirit of God had furnished to their hand. Cases might, and doubtless sometimes did occur, in which a whole synagogue, or decidedly the major part of it, went over to the faith of Christ; and then, as a Jewish synagogue was turned into a Christian church, the elders and ministers of the one would, as a matter of course, continue to hold the same relative position in the other: hence, presently, we find elders associated with every Christian community. It was some time before they came into formal existence in Jerusalem, as the presence of the apostles there at the first rendered them for a time less necessary; but even there they are not long in making their appearance as a recognized class. The pecuniary support raised at Antioch in behalf of the poor-saints in Judea, is sent to the elders at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Paul, Acts x. 36; and in the discussion and settlement of the question respecting circumcision, it is "the apostles and elders" who are expressly said to have come together to consider the matter, Acts x. 40. Elsewhere, the appointment of elders as the presiding body, appears to have been made with the very formation of the Christian communities. In even his first missionary tour Paul ordained elders in every church he visited in his brief passage through the surrounding districts. But he also, in settling the organization of matters in Crete, the most prominent instruction given him is, that he should ordain elders in every city, Tit. i. 5. That these were the highest officers in the communities over which they were placed, is evident from their being alone mentioned. But in Titus the Jewish term elder is exchanged with the Greek term επίσκοπος, overseer or bishop, Tit. i. 5, 7, as it is also in St. Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus—those being designated elders in one verse, who are addressed as bishops in others in another, Acts xvi. 19, 20. In like manner, in the first epistle to Timothy, while bishop is used as the prevailing designation, elder is also employed to denote the higher functionaries of the church, 1 Tim. iii. 1, 2, 11, 12. Hence also, in the Apocalypse, where the entire church, the old and the new together, is represented by a competent number of official heads, the representation takes the form of four and twenty elders, Rev. i. 4, and as the church appears there in a reigning and triumphant state, sharing with Christ in his judicial authority and all-subduing power, the elders who represent her are seen sitting on thrones, and having crowns of gold on their heads.

A distinction is made by St. Paul between elders who simply rule, and elders who, beside ruling, labour in word and doctrine, 1 Thess. v. 12, and it has been questioned whether this is to be understood of a difference in the original destination, or of one that existed merely as matter of fact. The words themselves cannot fairly be regarded as decisive either way. It may reasonably be supposed, that in the circumstances of the primitive church, when considerable difficulty must have been experienced in getting persons properly qualified for the work of teaching, distinctions of the kind referred to would not be very sharply drawn; and that it would often be left to the determination of experience, whether some appointed to the eldership should confine themselves to ruling, or should take part also in teaching. But as no blame is imputed to such as merely ruled, may, as special honour is claimed for them, if only they ruled well; it is clear that the apostle recognized the propriety of a ruling eldership apart from teaching as an actual institution; while he asserted a title to higher consideration for those in the eldership who combined the two kinds of service together. On this subject no further light is given in the notices of the New Testament; but there can be no doubt, as a matter of fact, that the distinction between simply ruling and ruling along with teaching, soon developed itself in the church as one of real practical importance; that a single individual of more eminent gifts in each Christian community, came to be constituted its presiding presbyter or bishop, and to be more especially charged with the oversight of its members and the conducting of its public assemblies. In process of time still further developments took place, but these belong to the province of church history rather than to that of biblical literature.
Moreover, this mini-L"I I I:1 chosen little is. St,it, Mac. communities, chosen of emergency, to mediate robes maintained to high-priesthood him of tory. was commonly maintained along with Hechlon, as if the two stood near each other; and accordingly travellers have discovered the ruins of a place not far from Hechlon, which the Arabs call El-Aul. The rains are on an elevated situation and if the ancient city stood there, it must have commanded the whole of an extensive plain.

ELEZA SA. So Elvis.

ELEZAR [chosen goal helper], appears to have been a very common name among the covenant people, and was borne by several persons mentioned in sacred history.

1. The most distinguished, as well as the earliest of these, was the son of Aaron, who, after his father, became the head of the tribe of Levi, and succeeded him in the high-priesthood. Ex. 25:25-26; Ex xx 35 seq. Nachum and Ahaziah appear to have been the two eldest sons of Aaron, as they stand first in the genealogy of Aaron's house, as given in the sixth chapter of Exodus. Eleazar was the next eldest, and on their death stepped into the room of the first-born. Of Eleazar himself very little is said in the history, except with reference to his official position and duties. He seems to have maintained a good understanding both with Moses and with Joshua. On the solemn and affecting occasion, when his father Aaron went up to Mount Hor to die, Eleazar was ordered to accompany him, and the priestly robes that had been so long worn by the father himself, now ready to be offered, were, before the fatal moment arrived, taken by Moses from off him, and placed upon the person of his son, Num 26:28-29. The high-priesthood continued long in his line, and seems, indeed, generally to have been filled by one of that line. For a short period, though we have no information how it came about, the offspring of Ithamar attained to the highest place, in the person of Eleazar and his immediate successors; but it presently again reverted to the elder branch. Abiathar was of Eleazar's line. When he died, he was buried in "the hill of Phinehas" his son, Jos. xxi 1.

2. Eleazar, who was appointed to take charge of the ark while it remained in the house of Abinabah, I sa vii 1.

3. Eleazar. One of David's heroes also bore this name—one, it is said, "of the three mighties." He valiantly withstood the Philistines in a great emergency, and drove them back; also along with two others, broke through the host of the Philistines, at the hazed of life, to fetch David a draught of water from the well of Bechelon, 1Ch xii 14-16; 2Sa xxii 9.

4. Eleazar. Various persons of the same name are also mentioned in later Jewish history, 1Ch xxii 21; xxiv 26; Ne xiii 12; Ezr viii 32; 1 Mc. ii. 5, iv. 13 seq.

ELECT. ELECTION. The terms are variously used in Scripture. They denote designation of persons to office, Ac ix 15; Jn vi. 15; 1Sa xvi 24; of people or nations to the enjoyment of peculiar privileges, as in the case of the Jews, De vii 7-8, Ex xvi 22; and finally, of a definite number of persons to eternal life, 2Th ii 13. This is the theological sense, and the only one which here calls for explanation or defence. The subject is doubtless one that belongs to the deep things of God, and therefore the clearest possible statement of it must leave an impeccable veil resting upon portions of the theme, and afford room for that explanation of Paul, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out." It is therefore much to be lamented that to the difficulties which belong to the subject itself, there should so very often have been superadded difficulties of another kind, springing from a misconception of what the doctrine really is, or from bold and injudicious statements of it. When we look into sacred Scripture, we are struck with the fact, that the doctrine is almost uniformly presented in some practical connection, and in such a way that the very statement of it contains an answer to the more common and plausible objections.

Statement of the doctrine. As presented in Scripture, election has respect to persons, as contrasted with election of nations or communities, and also from election merely of character, e.g. of such as shall believe and obey, Is xxvi 27; Jn xvi 30; 3Jo 3, 8. According to the passage of Scripture, there are a definite number of persons, said to be given to the Son by the Father, and to have their very names recorded in heaven. This election to eternal life is an election of persons out of a race universally guilty and condemned, none of whom have therefore any claim whatever on the divine favour, Rom ii 19, whose, fairly considered, it is not liable to any charge of injustice on the part of God. Further, this decree of election, like all the divine decrees, is eternal and immutable. In point of fact God does save a certain number of the human family, and it is against all right views of God to suppose, that he should have acted without a plan or purpose so to do; and as little can we suppose that having once formed such a plan he should ever change it. Hence believers are said in Scripture to be "chosen before the foundation of the world," and their salvation is "according to his own purpose and grace, which was given in Christ Jesus before the world began," Eph i 4, 11; 2Th ii 13. Their election has its source in free grace and love. It is "according to the good pleasure of his will," and not for anything good in the creature, whether he has been or is saved. This includes all the means and constitutive parts of salvation, as well as salvation itself in the sense of the ultimate and crowning gift of eternal life. We are not "chosen to salvation" without faith and holiness, but "through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," 2Th ii 13; Eph i 4. Moreover, election does not proceed on the redemption of Christ as the ground or cause of it, but includes that redemption as the grand means through which the purpose to save is accomplished. Hence we are said to be "chosen in Him." Such we believe to be the election of Scripture, and by the mere statement of it, most, if not all the false theories on the subject, as well as the more common and imposing objections, are at once met and refuted.

Analogical considerations. These, before proceeding further, it may not be unnecessary to advert to; for analogy, even when it does not convince, is well fitted to silence, and prompt to more careful inquiry. In many cases it will pave the way for a more ready reception of, and more devout acquiescence in, what was otherwise erroneously supposed to be a severe and repulsive dogma. Now, the principle involved in the doctrine of election, as above given, and its attendant difficulties, are not confined to the region of Scripture or revelation, but meet us everywhere, so that if any war will against this point of Scripture doctrine, he must carry that war into other regions also; yea, wage it in every province of the divine administration. In God's ordinary provision how diversely does he deal with men, and in how many ways does his preconceived plan and purpose affect their history in this life? They are far from being placed by God on a footing of equality in this world. One is born in rank, and another in obscurity and poverty. One is born in a Christian family, amid all the healthful influences that surround it; another in an infidel home, exposed to the pestilential atmosphere that belongs to it from the beginning of its existence. One is endowed with great physical strength; another pines under sickness, and drags along to the grave a weak and weary frame. The privy of constitutional maladies, which embitter life and bring on premature decay and death. Some, like Newton and Hume, are endowed with extraordinary mental gifts, and are thus marked out and equipped by God for distinction in the world; others are but shabbily endowed with intellectual gifts, or are denied them entirely. And so throughout the numberless diversities of gifts and social condition which prevail in the world. It is manifest that God makes no difference of state and destiny; and the true source of the difference is to be found in his scheme of providential government. If, therefore, we desire to perceive the state and destiny of men in this life to be so largely influenced by the plan or purpose of God, why should we hesitate in recognizing the operation of the same principle in regard to their future state and destiny? Should we not rather expect to find here, as elsewhere, a close and beautiful analogy between the economy of grace and the constitution of nature and providence? If, on the other hand, an election of grace independent of the will or merit of man had not been found in the Bible, would not the minds of men have been perversely stumbled at the difference in the mode of the divine operation in the constitution of nature and that of grace; or would we not have missed that unity of plan which shows that it is one God who works in one sphere and in the other? Nor is it only when we thus contemplate what may be called the more direct or immediate agency of God in his providence that this principle meets us. We find it again in the influence which the plans and purposes of men, altogether irrespective of any volition of ours, exercises over us. The purpose of the head of a family to reside in a certain country or locality; his preference of one school or college to another, or of one church or minister to another, may, so to speak, be the turning point in the future fortunes of his family. "The parent's plan," says Albert Barnes, in his introductory essay to Butler's Apology, "may fix the very college where he shall study, the companions he shall choose, the law-office or the seminary where he shall prepare for professional life, and finally everything which may establish his son in the world. So the plan of the infant is successful in corrupting thousands of the young; the purpose of Howard secured the welfare of thousands of prisoners; the determination of Washington resulted in the independence of his country. In all these and ten thousand other cases there is a plan formed by other beings in respect of us, which finally enters as a controlling element into our destiny." (p. 47.)

Scriptural argument. — In advancing to this, we proceed from presumption to proof. But if fully gone into, this would necessarily involve the particular examination of a considerable number of passages, and require more space than can here be given to it. We shall therefore simply subjoin the following list of texts, which in their plain and natural import express the doctrine, and are those on which it is more especially rested by theologians. Matt. xxv. 21; xvi. 24; xvi. 20; xvii. 24; xviii. 18; xix. 20; xix. 14, 15; Thomas 1. 47; 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1. Tim. 3. 16; Tit. 2. 14; 1. Peter 1. 21. Their general meaning will be sufficiently brought out by a reference to the counter-theories of exposition.

Counter-theories. — The first theory by which it is attempted to set aside the obvious interpretation of these passages, is that which admits an election merely to outward gospel privileges. As the Jews, it is asserted, were elected to certain national and special privileges, and the New Testament election must be interpreted in the light of that fact, and applied to the enjoyment of the external privileges of the gospel. That the ancient Jewish people were the subjects of such an election as that now specified we have already admitted. "The Lord chose them to be a special people unto himself above all the people that are on the face of the earth," and his "elect" did "inherit" the land. But the conclusion that is drawn from this treatment of the Jewish people to the prejudice of the personal election of the people of God to eternal life by no means follows. Both elections may be true. Because a national election is asserted in the Scriptures, it is surely strange to argue that there can be no election of particular persons. It is a sufficient answer to this theory perhaps to say, that there is scarcely one of the above passages which can be interpreted by it; and our Lord has expressly asserted that "many are called" under the external privilege of gospel ministration, "but few are chosen." "Christians are said to be "destined to the adoption of children," to be "chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," to be "ordained unto eternal life:" all which is very different from being elected merely to a gospel state and the external privileges belonging to it.

It is to be observed, moreover, that this interpretation proceeds on a want of understanding of the typical relation between the elect or covenant people of old, and the church of true believers under the gospel. No one can fail to perceive the folly of keeping both the type and antitype here on the same level of external privilege. The type of course deals with the external and temporal; the antitype with the spiritual and invisible. But this theory, in violation of the plainest rules of typical interpretation, deems the antitype on the same platform with the type, and makes what was outward in the one equally outward in the other. Hence, to adopt the application already made by another, "the election of the Jewish people, as a nation, to outward privileges and a temporal inheritance, was rather a reason why election in the Christian sense must go further and deeper. For the proper counterpart, under the gospel, to those external relations of Judaism, is the gift of grace and the inheritance of glory—the lower in the one case shadowing the higher in the other—the outward and temporal preposenting the spiritual and eternal. Even McKnight, who cannot certainly be charged with any excess of the spiritual element in his interpretations, perceived the necessity of making, as he expresses it, "the natural seed the type of the spiritual, and the temporal blessings, the emblems of the eternal." Hence he justly regards the outward professing church in the one case, with its election to the earthly Canaan, as answering in the other to the invisible church, consisting of believers of all nations, who, partaking of the nature of God by faith and holiness, are truly the sons of God, and have the inheritance of his blessing" (Fairbairn's Typology, p. 203).

To the same effect substantially it is said by Mr. Ltiton, in his book on the Church of Christ (p. 294): "Eternal rewards did not belong to the Jewish nation as such, but to the pious members of it. The corresponding fact under the Christian economy is not national, but individual election; and election, not merely to external connection with a visible church, or access to the means of grace (what is to prevent any heathen from placing himself under the preaching of the Word?), but to the effectual grace of the Holy Spirit renewing the heart. Election to the mere possibility, apart from the actual foretaste of salvation, is an idea unknown to the New Testament writers. Living, sanctifying union is everywhere presupposed in those who are called the elect of God, as when St. Paul connects election and calling directly with justification, with the foretaste of glory, with adoption, etc."

Besides all this, the theory in question relieves us from none of the difficulties that surround our subject. For in point of principle where is the difference between election to personal salvation and eternal life, and election to the "privileges of a gospel condition"? If this be essential, it is absurd to the ultimate enjoyment of eternal life, surely the great difficulty still preservs viz.,—why some are thus favored, while others are not—why a state of things out of which ultimate salvation must result, and out of which alone it can result, is granted to some and denied to others? Thus, while violence is done to Scripture, the mystery is left very much as it was. The truth is obscured or lost, but the error, however plausible, leaves all our perplexities as it found them. The lesson on the one side is without any countering argument the other. Theory of election of characters. Another theory of the subject is that of an election of characters, as contrived or distinguished from persons, i.e., an election of such as believe and obey, or such as God foresees shall believe and obey. A very few sentences will suffice to show that this kind of election has no place in the Word of God, and is moreover inconsistent with much that has an important place there. Faith and obedience are never set forth in Scripture as the ground of the decree of election, but, on the other hand, are themselves included in it and secured by it. We are elected not because we believe and obey, but to believe and obey. The faith and obedience, and all the worth and work of man, are the effect of election, and not its cause. 2 Thess. ii. 13; 1 Pet. i. 2. It is, moreover, a grave objection to this theory that it gives the glory of salvation to the creature rather than to the Creator; that it gives man whereof to boast, and runs directly in the face of Paul's irrevocable argument in Ro. xi, where he declares that "election" is entirely "of grace," and argues, "If by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more of grace, otherwise work is no more work."

Nor is this view of election less inconsistent with the Scripture doctrine of the covenant of grace, under which Christ has a people given him of the Father in consequence of his obedience unto death, is in Ch. i. 28-30. For it leaves the matter altogether uncertain whether there shall be any such people. It leaves it dependent, that is to say, on the will and works of man, and brings in the divine purpose only as based upon these. Surely it is more philosophical, as well as more scriptural, to place the divine purpose first in order, and represent it as involving and securing all the means of its accomplishment.

We can only glance at this. But it surely were derogatory to God's wisdom to suppose that in any region of his working he works without a precious plan or purpose, or to suppose that the salvation of his people is the only work which he accomplishes without such a plan. As a matter of fact, whatever view may be taken of election, a certain number of the human race only are saved, and it is a manifest absurdity to suppose that God has saved them without having determined so to do. Again, the divine foreknowledge necessarily implies that the events foreknown entered into a purpose or plan. A contingent or uncertain event cannot be foreknown. "There must," says Edwards, "be a certainty in things themselves before they are certainly known, or which is the same thing known to be certain." And what is it that makes them thus certain but the divine purpose or decree? The application of this to the doctrine of election is too obvious to be stated. If God knew from eternity who should be saved, he must have been because of his eternal decree to save them. This argument we know is sometimes met by boldly denying the divine foreknowledge of the acts of moral agents. This, it is said, is no more derogatory to God than to say that there are things which even Omniscience cannot achieve. But these things are such as involve a contradiction in their very statement, as that "God cannot inscribe a triangle within two straight lines, and cannot make two parallel lines meet, and cannot make twice two equal five. These are manifestly inherent impossibilities, and imply no defect of power on the part of God. We cannot conceive them to be done. But it is not so in regard to a knowledge of future moral acts. It is conceivable. There is nothing in their nature which renders them inherently unknowable, and ignorance of them implies a defect of knowledge inconsistent with our idea of an omniscient God" (Bibliotheca Sacra, April, 1882). Others admit foreknowledge, but deny that it is associated necessarily with decree. God foreknows, they say, the actions of free agents, but we cannot tell, and need not inquire how. This is not the place, however, for a more extended discussion of these points. (See Foreknowledge and Predestination.)

As to the doctrine being, as has sometimes been alleged, a "purely speculative dogma, barren of all practical results, exercising no influence on our conduct whatever, and consequently not to be taught as a revealed truth," we simply ask, Is it nothing to have a settled conviction that the entire glory of our salvation, from first to last, belongs to God? Is such a conviction barren? Is it not fitted to awaken gratitude and love? And are not those the great moral forces by which obedience to God is secured and maintained? Undoubtedly, too, that profound humility and sense of human littleness, which spring from a just contemplation of this doctrine, are no mean practical results, and are at the same time causes, in their turn, of the highest forms of devotion to God which the church or the world has ever seen.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL [God of Israel], a compound epithet applied by Jacob to the altar which he erected to God on his return to the land of Canaan, and shortly after he had received the name of Israel, Ex. xxvii. 20. The El at the beginning designates God as the strong and mighty one, who can do whatever seems good to him, and who, in the recent experience of Jacob, had peculiarly manifested his power in overcoming the deep-seated enmity of Esau, and thereby averting the most alarming evil which Jacob had ever been called to encounter. In memory of this signal deliverance, and of the goodness of God he had experienced in connection with it, Jacob imposed the significant name of El-Elohe-Israel on the altar he had erected. q.d. To the Mighty One, the God of Israel.

ELEMENTS, in the primary sense of the term, are the component parts of the physical universe; and these, according to the ancients, are fire, air, earth, and water. In this sense the term is used in the last chapter of 2 Peter, where, in reference to the final close of things, it is said, that the elements shall melt with fervent heat. All shall be, as it were, resolved again into its first principles. The term is also used figuratively of the more elementary parts of religion. Thus, in He. v. 12, it is stated as a matter of reproach against the Jewish believers, that they had need to be taught again which be the first principles (or elements, στοιχεῖα) of the oracles of God—the things which are properly for beginners—the rudiments of the system. It is also applied to the religion of the Old Testament in contradistinction to the New: in former times believers were in bondage to the elements of the world, Ca. vi. 6; or, as it is again put, though the word is the same in the original, they were under the rudiments of the world, from which believers are now delivered by the grace of Christ, Ca. ii. 20. In both passages the apostle means to designate the religion of the old covenant as of a more elementary and imperfect kind than that of the gospel. It was adapted to the state of those who, as to spiritual things, were in comparative childhood, dealing, as it did, so much in symbol, and with the forms rather than the realities of things. All the fundamental ideas and principles of the gospel were there—only they were exhibited by means of carnal ordinances, which, from their very nature, were incapable of yielding more than an inadequate manifestation of the truth. And now that the truth itself had appeared in its reality and fulness, to revert to the old and cling to it with passionate fondness, but too clearly showed that the gospel of Christ was but imperfectly apprehended.

ELHANAN [Elhanan]. It is generally agreed that some corruption has crept into the text of Scripture in connection with this name, though critics differ as to the precise nature of it, and how the correction ought to be made. In 2 Sa. xxi. 19 it is said, among the exploits of David's heroes, that Elhanan, the son of Jaare-oregim, a Bethlehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam. The authorized version inserts "brother of" before Goliath, in order to make the statement correspond with the supposed facts of the case, and with a sort of parallel statement in 1 Ch. xx. 5. In this latter passage we read, that "Elhanan, son of Jaar, slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear," etc. Again, we find an "Elhanan, son of Dodo of Bethlehem," among the thirty distinguished heroes of David's time, 2 Sa. xxi. 21. Some, among others Gesenius, suppose this Elhanan, the son of Dodo, to be the same with the Elhanan previously mentioned at ch. xx. 19, and that Jaare-oregim there is a corruption. As the name of a man it certainly looks suspicious; though to substitute Dodo for it can only rank as a conjectural emendation. It is quite improbable, however, that there should have been two renowned heroes of Bethlehem in David's time both of the name of Elhanan; and we must suppose that either Jaare-oregim is a corruption of the text, or that the father, Dodo, had two names. Then, as regards the giant killed by this Elhanan in single combat, as it seems quite clear, from the notices both in Samuel and in Chronicles, that the action took place not only after David became king, but in the latter half of his reign, we must either suppose that there was a second Goliath of Gath, who was conquered by Elhanan, as the former one had been by David, or that, according to the text in Chronicles, the reading in Samuel should be not, Goliath, but "the brother of Goliath." Distinguished scholars are found on both sides, and nothing decisive can be urged for either.

ELI [Heb. אֱלִי, probably occurrence, height], a priest and judge in Israel; in the latter respect, the immediate predecessor of Samuel. We learn from the genealogical tables, especially that given in 1 Ch. xxiv. 3, seq., that Eli and his family were of the line of Ithamar, the younger of the two sons of Aaron. This line, however, was the smaller and less influential, as well as younger of the two, for when examination was made in David's time into the affairs of the priesthood, with a view to the proper distribution of its families and offices, it was found that there were sixteen heads of distinct families in Eleazar's line, and only eight in that of Ithamar. It seems, therefore, somewhat strange that the head of a family in that younger and weaker line should so early have attained to the high-priesthood. No explanation is given of it in the history; we are simply told that toward the close of the period of the judges, Eli was the priest in the more peculiar sense—that is, the high-priest, 1 Sa. i. He was probably the first in that line who held the office, and may have been elevated to it mainly on account of the qualities which fitted him for discharging the duties of a judge. In this latter respect he was had in high reputation, and judged Israel, it is said, forty years, 1 Sa. iv. 18. The more distinctive honours of the priesthood did not continue long in his family, for in Zadok the elder line again rose to the ascendant, and apparently retained it to the close of the Old Testament history. In regard to Eli himself, his character is presented to us as one of mingled excellences and weaknesses. Personally, he appears to have been a man of unaffected piety and genuine worth. This is evident from the general recognition of his title to the place of a judge in Israel, and also from the deep concern he manifested in his old age for the ark of God, trembling for it in the first instance, and then, when he heard of its surrender into the hands of the enemy, falling paralyzed from the chair on which he sat, and breaking his neck. In such things we plainly see the man of God, profoundly moved by whatever touches the glory of his name and the interests of his kingdom. But this earnest and high-toned pity was combined with a melancholy and most culpable slackness in the management of his own family, practices being systematically carried on by his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, within the very precincts of the sanctuary, which ought to have been instantly, and with the firmest determination, repressed. Instead of exercising this severe but salutary discipline, Eli contented himself with administering a gentle reproof to his sons: told them it was no good report he heard of them; and reminded them of the aggravation their sins derived from the sacred presence within which the evil was done. 'Ye make the Lord's people to transgress of one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall entreat for him?' (1 Sam. ii. 19, 20). But that was all; the sensual and depraved sons were still permitted to retain their office, and they pursued in it, as before, their course of iniquity. Even after the most solemn proofs and warnings had been administered to Eli, first by a man of God (whose name is concealed), and then through a vision and dream communicated to the child Samuel, he appears to have taken no effective measures against the evil. No doubt the languor and futility incident to his advanced age may partly account for his soft and apathetic behaviour; but it was not sufficient to excuse him, since, if he felt inadequate to the task of reforming what was amiss, he should have resigned his office into the hands of one more capable of administering it right. Accordingly, the long threatened judgment of God at last burst like a storm on him and his family. The Philistines marched up in battle array against the land, and, amid the disasters that ensued, both Eli himself, and his two profligate sons, fell victims to the wrath of Heaven.

Eli was ninety-eight years old when he died, and his eyes were dim that he could not see, 1 Sam. iv. 19; too old and feeble, doubtless, for the responsible position he occupied. And in this alone his case forms a warning to the servants of God in future times, showing, as it so palpably did, that to cling to office when the natural decay and infirmities of life incapacitate one for its proper and efficient discharge, is itself a serious failing of duty. But most of all does his case provide a testimony and a warning against the undue relaxation of parental discipline and authority. To allow sin to proceed unchecked, or remain unpunished in the family, is in any case an unwise as well as unrighteous procedure—a cruelty to the children, not less than an unfaithfulness to God. But when such procedure comes to be practised by one holding a high and responsible office in the household of faith, the evil is immensely aggravated, since these who should be lights and examples to others thereby become ring-leaders in corruption. It was expressly on this account that judgment fell so heavily on the house of Eli.

ELI AB [Heb. 2889; God for father]. 1. A leader of the tribe of Zebulun, Num. i. 9; 2. a Reubenite, an ancestor of Dathan and Abiram, Num. xxvi. 7; 3. an ancestor of Samuel the prophet, 1 Chron. vi. 21; 4. and, to say nothing of one or two others, of whom no more than the names are known, 1 Chron. xxiii. 5; xxiv. 8, David's eldest brother, 1 Chron. xxiii. 21. Even of him we know nothing, except that he seems to have looked with a kind of curious eye toward David, and sought rather to check than to encourage him in his enterprise against Goliath.

ELIA DA [Heb. God's care for]. 1. A son of David: the last but one born to him in Jerusalem, 2 Sam. xvi. 16; 1 Chr. ii. 4. In another passage the name is changed into Rehob (Heb. God's care for), 1 Chron. xi. 17, an important and sometimes melancholy change, but why adopted is unknown.

2. The father of Rezin the Syrian, 2 Kings xvi. 21.

3. A Benjamite, a mighty man of war, who led an immense force from his tribe to assist Jehoshaphat in his wars, 2 Chron. xix. 17.

ELIAHBA [Heb. God hides, i.e. keeps in safety among peril]. 1. One of David's thirty heroes, 2 Sam. xxvii. 32.

ELIA KIM [a servant appointed by God]. 1. An officer in the household of Hezekiah, and a man apparently of faith and probity, as he was one of the commissioners sent by the king to treat with the messengers of Senacherib, 2 Kings xviii. 19-21, and is also referred to with honour by Isaiah as a kind of typical servant of God, ch. xlix. 32.

2. Eliaim, a king of Judah, son and successor of Josiah, whom Pharaoh Necho made king after the death of his father. Pharaoh, at the same time, changed his name to Jehonakim, which simply substitutes the Yo, contraction for Jehoshah, for El, God, and means set by Jehovah. As it is by this latter name that he is chiefly known in history, the reader is referred to it for a notice of the facts of his reign.

3. Eliaim, A priest in the days of Nehemiah, who took part in the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 8.

4. Eliaim, the original name of the king of Judah, who is better known by that of Zedekiah.

ELIAM [God's people]. 1. The father of Bathsheba, but called Ammiel in Chronicles, 2 Sam. vii. 2.

2. Son of Ahitophel, and one of David's thirty warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

ELIAS SHEB [God restored]. 1. A priest in David's time, and one of the governors of the sanctuary, 1 Chron. xxvi. 27.

2. A high priest in the time of Nehemiah, who had also formed some alliance with Jehohanan the Ammonite, and given him charge in the temple courts, for which the wrath of Nehemiah was called forth. Neh. vi. 1, 20; xii. 4, 7.

3. Various others of this name are mentioned, Ezra vi. 27, 31.

ELIEL [God's strength is God]. A common name among the Hebrews, but nothing of any note is preserved of any one bearing it, 1 Chron. xxv. 20; xxvi. 11; xxvii. 31; 1 Kings xi. 33, xxiv. 25, xxv. 35, xxvi. 24.

ELIEZER [God helps]: substantially the same with Eliezer, though the names are not interchanged in Scripture. 1. Eliezer first appears as the name of one in the household of Abraham; he is called Eliezer of Damascus, Gen. xvi. 5. It has been supposed by some, from the expression rendered "steward of my house," being literally "son of possession of my house," that he was probably a relative of Abraham, and his heir at law. This, it is thought, receives confirmation from what follows, in which Abraham says, "Let one born in my house literally and properly, the son of my house be mine heir," as if pointing to a relative in his family. Undoubtedly there appears to have been some bond between Abraham and this man superior to that of an ordinary servant, but we want the means of determining what it actually was. As Scripture is altogether silent of any blood relationship, or of any branch of Abraham's kindred being about Ramases, the probability rather is that Eliezer, though he may also have been a distant relative, was something like an adopted son of Abraham, and that as such the main part of Abraham's possessions should have fallen to him if Abraham himself died childless.

2. Eliezer. The second son of Moses and Zipporah, to whom Moses gave the name Eliezer as a memorial of the help granted to him by God, Ex. viii. 1.

3. Eliezer. Various persons, besides those above noticed, bore this name, but none of them rose to any distinction, excepting a prophet, the son of Dodavah, who rebuilt Jehovah-plat because of his wicked alliance with Ahabiah, king of Israel, 2 Ch. xx. 37; 1 Ch. vii. 8; xx. 24; xix. 16; Ezra. viii. 16; x. 18, 21, 23.

Elihu [whose God is He]. 1. One of the interlocutors in the book of Job. He stands in some sense apart from the three friends of Job, betwixt whom and himself the chief part of the dialogue was carried on; and without any previous notice even of his presence, we are told at a certain point that "the wrath was kindled in Elihu the son of Barachel the Buchite, of the kindred of Ram," Job xxiii. 2. The designation of the Buchite has been thought to indicate his relationship to Buz, one of the sons of Nahor by Milcah, Gen. xxi. 22. This is certainly possible, but the description is of too brief and general a kind to warrant any definite conclusions of such a nature. Elihu represents himself as by much the youngest person in the party, and it may have been on that account that his name was omitted at the outset; he may have been regarded as a kind of minister or attendant of the three friends, rather than one of themselves. He tells us that his youth kept him silent so long as the more aged men had anything to say; and when at last he does open his mouth, he enters into a formal apology and defence of himself for presuming to speak in such presence. What he said, however, came nearer to the point than many things which had been uttered by those who preceded him; and in token of his comparative superiority, he is not included with the three friends in the sacrifices and intercessions that were to be presented by Job in their behalf, Job xxii. 7-9 (See Job).

2. Elihu. A forerunner of Samuel the prophet, the son of Tohu, 1 Sa. i. 1. In 1 Ch. vi. 34, however, Eliel is the name that stands in the same position—Eliel the son of Toah; probably mere accidental or linguistic variations.

3. Elihu. A Kenite Levite, one of the doorkeepers of the house of the Lord in the time of David, and of the family of Obed-edom, 1 Ch. xvi. 7.

4. Elihu. Also one of the captains of thousands who, from the tribe of Manassah, followed David to Ziklag before the battle of Gilboa, 1 Ch. xxi. 28.

Elija\(\text{H} \) (Heb. יֵלְיָהוּ and יֵלְיָהוּ, Elijah, God-Jehovah, i.e. God-Jehovah), in the Septuagint and the New Testament Elias—a great Israelish prophet. On his first appearance he is simply denominated "Elijah the Tishbite, of the inhabitants of Gilead," 1 K. xi. 31. This has been commonly understood to represent him as a native of some Israelish town called Thisce or Tisle; and so undoubtedly the ancients understood it, only some of them appear to have placed Thisce, not in Gilead, but in Galilee. Tobit speaks of himself as a " captive from Thisce, which is at the right hand of that city which is called properly Nephthali, in Galilee above Aser." (1. 2.) But Josephus says of Elijah that he was of "a town Theobolon, in the country of Galilæa" (in Τισβήν ὁ Θεοβολῶν τῆς Γαλαάτης, Ant. viii. 13, 2). It must be admitted that nothing certain is known of either of these places; and though the opinion has generally prevailed that a Thisce in Galilee was the birth place of Elijah, it cannot be said to rest on any valid authority. Several continental writers have not only disparaged this opinion, but have gone to the extreme of holding that he was not a native of Palestine at all, that he was not even of the stock of Israel, but a native probably of some place in Arabia, and a more resident, by which they understand a foreign resident, or sojourner in the land of Gilgal (Kai) on 1 K. xiii. 18, and the authorities there cited. This appears a very improbable view, and destitute of any proper support in the notices of Scripture. Whether there might be such a place as Thisce in Gilgal or not, still, when Elijah is made known as "of the inhabitants of Gilgal," the natural import of the expression unexceptionably is, that he belonged to that section of Israel who inhabited the extensive district on the farther side of Jordan, known by the name of Gilgal. Even thus interpreted the designation is somewhat vague; for anything it tells us, Elijah may have had his residence in the territories of Reuben, of God, or Manasséh; he may have been himself a member of one of those tribes, or he may have belonged to the tribe of Levi, possibly even to the narrower circle of the Aaronic priesthood. Such points are left altogether indeterminate; and were so probably for the purpose of rendering more markedly prominent his distinctive character and calling—that he might be known and thought of simply as the great prophet of the Lord. In this light alone is he presented to our view in the sacred history. His whole mission and striving were embodied in his name. His one grand object was to awaken Israel to the conviction that Jehovah, Jehovah alone is God. Hence it is important, for bringing out the precise import and bearing of his utterances, to keep up the name JEHOWAH wherever it occurs in the original.

The period of Israelitish history at which Elijah appeared was one that emphatically called for the living exhibition of this great truth. It was the period of Ahab's apostasy, when, through the influence and example of his wife Jezebel, he formally introduced the worship of other gods into Israel. In the language of the sacred historian, "it seemed a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat; and he took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshipped him. And he reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria," 1 K. xi. 32. In other words, he did not rest, like his predecessors, with the corrupt worship of Jehovah under the symbol of a calf, but brought in the worship of the Tyrian Baal, with its usual accompaniment of the Asherah pollutions—the rites of the Syrian Venus. It may readily be conceived that, to reconcile the people to so fundamental a change, sophisticated arts of various kinds would need to be resorted to; and it would seem, from several indications in the history—in particular from the interchange that was kept up between the names of Jehovah and Baal, 1 K. xi. 21—that pains were taken to mediate between the rival services, and to make it appear that there was no essential difference between Jehovah and Baal. Elijah was raised up for the more immediate purpose of dissipating these vain sophistications, and showing, by terrible things in righteousness, that there was a real and irreconcilable difference between the rival deities— that Jehovah was the one-living and true God, and Baal but a dumb and senseless idol.
Hence he enters on the work assigned him as the special servant or messenger of Jehovah, and in his name announces absolutely what shall come to pass, constant that there is no power in heaven or earth capable of reversing the word. "And Elijah said unto Ahab, As Jehovah God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." ix. x. By the introduction of the worship of Baal, Ahab had in a manner displaced Jehovah from his acknowledged supremacy in Israel, and the prophet, as his accredited representative, so family protests against the impiety, precludes Jehovah still to be the God of Israel, and vindicates the claim by shutting up heaven for a time over the territory of Israel.
In his mode of doing this, it will be observed, Elijah assumed the attitude of a priest or Levite, whose special business it was "to stand before the Lord to minister unto him." De. xx. This does not prove that he in reality was so, though, as has been already intimated, he may have been; but it shows the kind of priestly position which the prophets deemed it necessary to take up in the kingdom of Israel, on account of the de-seated state into which matters had been brought. They assumed no such position in the kingdom of Judah, where the theocratic constitution, with its Aaronic priesthood, continued in a measure to subsist. But in Israel, especially during the reign of Ahab, when the very foundations were out of course, and there was neither king nor priest to do the part assigned them by theocracy, the prophetic agency required to rise with the occasion, and, as under a special commission from above, had both to make unknown God's will and to do before him priestly service.
After the utterance of a word, by which the genial influence of heaven was to manifest itself to the whole series of years, it obviously became necessary that a hiding-place should be provided for Elijah, that he might escape as well from the violence of those in high places, as from the importunities of others, who might effort to prevail upon his pity. Such a hiding-place was found for him to the east—probably beyond the limits of the kingdom of Israel—beside the brook Cherith, that flowed into the Jordan. (N. CHERITH)
There he not only found water from the brook, but also supplies of bread and flesh, morning and evening, administered at God's command by ravens. This sick of furnishing the prophet with food has appeared too marvellous for many commentators, and various devices have been resorted to in order to lighten the difficulty.
By some the obblig (ravens) was changed into kobia (Arabians); by others it was understood to indicate, the inhabitants of the city Orbo, or the rock Orb; and others still again, by ascribing it to an altogether unsupported meaning, have substituted mercantus for orobus. These explanations may be summarily disnised as at once grammatically untenable, and unsatsfactory in the sense yielded by them; for how unlikely was it that such parties should carry any supplies of food to Elijah so circumstanced! especially that they should do so morning and evening. Nor is the solution of Michaelis much better, that the retreat of Elijah lay near to a great raven haunt, and that he took advantage of the young hares, wild fowl, &c., which those voracious creatures brought within his reach. Provisions of this sort could never be turned into "bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening." The words plainly express a supernatural employment of the ravens for the pur-purpose—wonderful, indeed, as everything supernatural is, but surely not more wonderful than the infliction at Elijah's word of the long continued drought which set continued with the or the fetching down, at a later stage of the prophet's history, of two successive streams of fire to consume the forces sent against him. Any birds might have served the purpose in question, but the ravens' nature of those actually employed undoubtedly heightened the evidence afforded by the transaction of the overruling power and providence of God.
The brook Chereth, however, in course of time dried up, and another place of refuge had to be provided for the prophet. To some it was a more likely quarter, in the house of a widow, a poor widow, as she proved to be, with an only son and she, not in the land of Israel, but at Zarephath, in the territory of Zidon —
the native region of the infamous Jezebel, 1ki. xvii.
Notwithstanding the Lord tells Elijah that he has commanded this widow to sustain him; and being perfectly assured that God's word could not fail, he proceeded without delay to prove it, brought by righteous-direction to the place, and to the woman, he found near the gate of the city gathering a few sticks to prepare her lunch with, that she and her son might the water die. In the unswerving confidence of faith he bids her go and bake the bread as she intended, but in the first instance to bring a portion of it with a little water to him—demanding such faith from her as he himself exercised toward God. And he added, as the ground both of her belief and of his own demand,
"For thus saith Jehovah God of Israel, the barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cistern of oil fail, till the day that Jehovah sendeth rain upon the earth." Strange as the whole manner may appear for a while, that a woman made no scruple complying with the word spoken; and in accordance with the assurance given her, the miraculous supply of meal and oil continued as long as it was needed. She was blessed because she believed; and from her believing conduct, with its present remuneration of good, the heart of the prophet also could not fail to draw encouragement and strength.
But her faith was by and by put to a fresh trial, and in that trial discovered a certain measure of imperfection in respect to spiritual insight or desire. On the occasion of a severe illness befalling her son, which soon reached a fatal termination, she said to Elijah in what appears a somewhat petulant tone, "What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? Art thou come unto me to call my soul to remembrance, and to shew my son?" A proper feeling probably lay at the bottom of the address. The devout and holy life of Elijah had enlightened her conscience, and impressed her with convictions of sin, such as she had not known of before. Possibly she may have felt that she had profited less than she ought to have done by the residence of such a man in her house, and may, in consequence, have become more liable to chastisement. So far, the feelings working in her bosom may have been reasonable and proper; but they still hardly account for the peculiar form of her address to the prophet. This seems to imply that she looked upon him as, in a sense, the occasion of her calamity, and that it had been better for her not to have known him, than to have become the subject of such a discipline. What might be wrong in it, however, was graciously overlooked; as matters stood, the calamity proved a heavy trial to Elijah as well as to the widow, and with holy freedom and earnestness he laid it before the Lord.

"He cried unto Jehovah and said, O Jehovah my God, hast thou also brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son?" The cry was heard; and after stretching himself three times upon the child—thereby presenting, as it were, a channel of communication for the divine power to pass into the lifeless body—and crying, while he did so, "O Jehovah my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again, the child began to breathe again, and was presently delivered of the disease toward receiving him, she said, "Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of Jehovah in thy mouth is truth;" that is, she knew it now in a manner she had not done before; the truth burst upon her mind with a power which had all the freshness of novelty.

It was in the third year, as it would seem, of Elijah's sojourn with the widow of Zarephath, that the word of the Lord came to him, announcing the near prospect of rain, and bidding him go and show himself to Ahab, ix. 17. Some would understand the expression "in the third year" from the commencement of the drought, but this would restrict too much the whole period; as in two passages of the New Testament, I. c. v. 25. J. c. 1. v. 17. the drought is expressly said to have lasted three years and a half. If, as is probable, Elijah spent nearly one year beside the brook Cherith, it would leave two years and some months for his residence at Zarephath, and hence he might be said to leave it in the third year. When going forth on this new and more active part of his mission, he was met with a striking evidence of the extent to which the famine prevailed in Samaria; having fallen in with Obadiah, the chamberlain of Ahab, on a search throughout the land forfountains and brooks of water, that all the cattle might not perish. The prophet was recognized by Obadiah, and was treated by him with respectful obeisance. But on being charged to go and tell his master Ahab, that Elijah was there, he began to imagine that the prophet had some design upon his life, and asked if Elijah did not know how he feared God, and led so many as fifty prophets in a cave, and fed them with bread and water, to protect them from the fury of Jehovah. He also mentioned, as the ground of his apprehensions in the present case, that the most rigorous search had been made for Elijah throughout the land of Israel and the neighboring kingdoms, evidently for the purpose of laying violent hands on him; and he could not suppose that Elijah would now expose himself to the risk of meeting Ahab, in the defended state in which he appeared. In this, however, he was mistaken, and having been solemnly assured of Elijah's determination to show himself to Ahab, he went to his master with the tidings. On meeting Elijah the king addressed him with the reproachful charge, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" but was answered with the indignant reply, "I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of Jehovah, and hast last followed Baalim." And he added a request—for the purpose of bringing the controversy to an issue, and ascertaining where the source of the evil actually lay—that Ahab would cause Israel to assemble on Carmel, to witness between him on the one side, and the prophets of Baal and Asherah on the other. (The latter are called in the authorized version prophets of the groves—improperly, so under A.V. though all these prophets there are said to have been 450 of the former class, and 400 of the latter; and the latter, the prophets of Asherah, it is stated, ate at the queen's table; meaning probably that they were maintained at her expense, as being the servants of her own Syrian goddess. No mention is made of them in the memorable transactions that presently took place on Carmel; so that they must either have declined the contest, or it must have been deemed prudent to withhold them from being present on the occasion. But the 450 prophets of Baal appeared, and, with the prophet Elijah, there was a vast multitude of the people. All Israel, in a sense, were there to be spectators of the contest. If looked at in an external point of view, never did combatants seem more unequally matched. In the interest of Baal there stood the 450 prophets, with the king, and doubtless many also of the leading men in the kingdom, at their back; while Elijah alone ventured openly to expose the cause of Jehovah. When he put the question to the assembled people, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If Jehovah be God, follow him; but if Baal, follow him," there was no response; "the people answered him not a word." They were not prepared to take up and avow the position, that there was such a distinction between Jehovah and Baal, as rendered their claims of service properly antagonistic, and necessitated a choice between the two. The matter must, therefore, be submitted to a palpable and decisive test. Let each party take an offering, cut it in pieces, lay it on wood as ready to be consumed in sacrifice; and let the one who answers by fire be the God. This proposal at once commended itself to the people. It would do so, we may conceive, the more readily, because it was by fire that Jehovah had revealed himself to their fathers, when the Levitical service was originally set up, i.e. ix. 21; and also because, if it gave any advantage to either party, this manifestly lay on the side of the numerous retinue that represented the interest of Baal. Elijah even conceded to them a further advantage, in allowing them the right, on account of their number, to kill their victim first, and so giving them the opportunity of obtaining a prior decision in their behalf, if it was in the power of their god to bestow it. In such circumstances it was impossible for them to decline the trial. They prepared their bullock and dressed it, but put no fire under, and with earnest importunity began to cry, O Baal, hear us. So they continued, it is said, from morning until noon, when Elijah in mockery lade them cry aloud, in case their god might be asleep, or engaged in some busy and interesting occupation, from which he needed to be somewhat forcibly recalled. Then they redoubled their vehemence, and, after the manner of the Syrian devotees, cut themselves with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out.
were wont to be made by the worshippers of the Syrian goddess; "A discreet bowing opens the scene. Then they fly wildly through one another with the head sunk down to the ground, but turning round in circles, so that the loose-flowing hair drags through the mere; thereupon they first bite themselves on the arms, and at last cut themselves with two-edged swords, which they are wont to carry. Then begins a new scene; one of them who surpasses all the rest in frenzy begins to prophesy with signs and graces, openly accuses himself of his past sins, which he now wishes to punish by the mortifying of the flesh, takes the knotted whip, which the priests are wont to bear, lashes his back, cuts himself with swords, until the blood trickles down from his mangled body," (comp. 1 Ki. xvi. 21-24).

But all was to no purpose; "there was no voice, nor any answer, nor any that regarded." Then, about the time of the evening sacrifice, that is, about three o'clock in the afternoon, Elijah stepped forward to do his part—repaired an altar that had fallen down, with twelve stones, corresponding to the twelve tribes of Israel—the ideal number of the covenant-people, whose God Jehovah was—and, having arranged his altar, brought was a trench eight feet deep, and fourteen cubits in circumference, and barrels of water to be poured on the altar, till not only the wood was thoroughly wet, but the trench also was filled with the overflow. Then with sublime simplicity he came near and said, "Jehovah, God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day, that thou art God in Israel; and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word. Hear me, O Lord; hear me, that this people may know that thou Jehovah art God, and that thou hast turned their heart back again." No sooner had he spoken, than the fire fell from heaven and consumed the sacrifice, and even licked up the water that was in the trench. The effect was electrifying; the people in one mass fell on their faces, and shouted, "Jehovah, he is the God, Jehovah, he is the God!" Elijah, however, was not content to let the matter rest there; he called upon the people instantly to carry out their convictions of truth, by enforcing the penalty of the law upon those who had been labouring to subvert its fundamental principles. "Take the prophets of Baal," said he, "let not one of them escape." The advice was promptly followed; for, as the sun went down, the brook Kishon and slain there. The treatment has often been characterized as harsh, but unjustly, when contemplated, as it ought to be, from the Old Testament point of view. The commonwealth of Israel being a theocracy, in which all was professedly held of Jehovah as its one living and supreme head, idolatry was therefore condemned as treason; the promoter of idolatrous worship, or the false prophet, who spake in the name of another god than Jehovah, was to be summarily put to death. In fact, so that Elijah and the people now only did what Ahaz as the visible head of the commonwealth should already have done. If Ahaz himself had fallen in the carnage as the active abettor of idol-worship, it would have been no breach of constitutional principle.

The crisis seemed now past; the decision of assembled Israel had been given, and Jehovah was once more publicly acknowledged as the one living and true God. "The heavens heard the earth, and the earth to temper their fiery glow," "Get thee up," exclaimed Elijah, describing the change, "eat and drink, for there is a sound of abundance of rain." The prophet himself went up to Carmel to pray, and look for the refreshing shower. Such, and the manner of the little cloud was discerned in the horizon, though not bigger than a man's hand, he hasted back to Ahab to tell him to speed forward his journey, while himself, as if inspired with the energy of a new life, girt up his loins, and ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel—a distance of about fifteen miles amid torrents of rain. It was a day of triumph to the noble-hearted prophet, and he probably thought that the victory was now finally won—that his person would be as safe, and his name as honoured at Jezreel as in any other part of the land.

But his ardent hopes in this respect soon met with a mortifying reverse. So far from being humbled and subdued by the news of the terrible scene on Carmel, Jezebel seemed only roused into greater fury, and sent a message to Elijah, accompanied with an oath, that by to-morrow she would have him made like one of the slain prophets. If she really wished to kill Elijah, she betrayed a foolish impatience of temper in sending such a message. But it is possible, after what had happened, that she spake not in the heat of anger, but in the vanity of putting her own threat in execution; and she may have uttered it more for the purpose of ridding Jezebel of his presence, than of committing herself to the destruction of his life. Anyhow, the determination avowed was, in the circumstances, indicative of a most impenetrable and hardened state of mind. It appalled for the moment the lion-hearted prophet; his courage sank at the tidings; and he arose and went for his life, taking his servant with him as far as Beersheba, but himself pressing on a whole day's journey into the wilderness. There he found a juniper-tree under which he sat down, and requested for himself that he might die. "It is enough," he said, "now, Jehovah, take away my life; for I am not better than my fathers," (1 Ki. xix. 14). It was the language of fainting and despondency; he had done his best; mighty forces had been operating through his hand, and he had been enabled to do great things by them; but it was a hopeless struggle; the throne of iniquity still held its place; he was no more able to prevail than his fathers; why should his life any longer be prolonged? Such, at least, was the feeling that wrought in his bosom—not altogether to be justified, but, at the same time, so natural in the circumstances, so difficult to be repressed, that his case called for pity and support, rather than rebuke. And he got what he needed; for his work was by no means done yet, as he had too hastily supposed. He was first thrown into a profound sleep, and when he awoke he found at his side, brought by an angel's hand, a cake baked on the coals, and a cruse of water. Of these he partook and refreshed himself, and again laid himself down to rest. But he was admonished a second time by the angel to arise and eat, as a great journey was before him; and in the strength of the food then received, it is said, he went forty days and forty nights. A supernatural result, doubtless; for no merely natural supply of food could have sustained his animal frame for such a length of time; but this does not hinder, that the natural in the present case, as in so many others, formed the ground on which the supernatural raised itself, and that a certain measure of new strength was required for the fitting development of the other.

The support of the bodily frame in unexhausted freshness for forty days, and that in connection with a sojourn in Horeb, whither Elijah was non-borne by the Spirit of God, plainly brings this prophet into a certain relationship to Moses. The wonder of Moses, as a man capable of dwelling on the mount of God, and holding a face-to-face communion with Heaven, again in a measure repeats itself. There is a manie-resonblance, though with a difference suited to the altered circumstances of the time; and so in what follows. At Horeb the prophet takes up his abode in a cave; and when there the word of Jehovah came to him saying, "What dost thou here, Elijah?" To which he replied in a somewhat quenched and disaffected tone, "I have been very jealous for Jehovah, God of hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away." The state of feeling was much akin to that of Moses, when, descending from the mount, he found the people wholly given to idolatry, and in the venemance of a righteous indignation broke the tables of the law, and called upon every man to smite his sword against his fellow. This severe and stormy mood soon passed away, and he presently became the earnest intercessor of his people. Elijah, too, subsequently came into a like tender and more subdued frame, but it was the other which held possession of his soul at the cave in Horeb. He spake as if he had been more jealous for the interest of God, than God had been for it himself; as if when so many altars had been thrown down, so many prophets slain, and an all but universal apostasy prevailed, it was just matter of complaint that no greater judgments from Heaven had been inflicted on the evil-doers, and no more adequate help given to second his endeavours, to correct his judgment in this respect, and bring him to a better mind, he has presented to his view a series of symbols, in which the Lord appeared as the direct agent. First, a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord: then an earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire: it is said that Jehovah was not in any of these—meaning, not that they were caused otherwise than by his immediate working, or were not symbols of certain operations of his hand, but that at this particular time he did not reveal himself in any one of those symbols to Elijah. They were rather the symbols of that vehement and angry frame of mind, which prevailed in the prophet himself, than of any feeling or purpose now cherished in the heart of God. But after them there came a still small voice, a soft and gentle breathing, as it were, which when the prophet heard, he wrapped his face in his mantle and went to the mouth of the cave, where he heard the voice of Jehovah again asking him what he was doing there. Jehovah would now manifest himself, not in the terrific emblems of power, such as were fitted to appall and terrify men's minds, but in the still small voice, which might win its way into their better feelings, and with quiet energy prompt and persuade them to wiser counsels. This was the kind of agency which the Lord would now have Elijah to understand still remained to be plied in Israel: Enough, it virtually said, of overawing displays from the secret place of thunder; gentler and more persuasive measures must now be pursued; nor has the effect produced by the former been in vain, it has thrown the way open for more peaceful action.

Such was the main purport of the instruction conveyed on this occasion to Elijah. It was followed up however by certain communications of a more explicit kind. In these he was directed to return, not precisely to the land of Israel, but to the wilderness of Damascus; where he might find a comparatively safe retreat; and thereafter—not perhaps immediately, but as opportunity might offer, or the course of Providence might open the way, to anoint Hazael king over Syria, Jeho king over Israel, and Elisha to be prophet in his own room. He was also informed, that in connection with these appointments there would be severe visitations of judgment; some were to be slain by Hazael, some by Jeho, and some still again at the instance of Elisha. At the same time he was given to understand, that matters were not so bad in Israel as he had imagined, and that beside himself, there remained 7000 who had not yet bowed the knee, or by kissing done obsequies to the image of Baal. There was, therefore, room for fresh operations, and some ground to hope that a revived interest might yet be awakened in the worship and service of Jehovah. Elijah was doubtless cheercd to learn that such was the case, and set forth, we may well conceive, with a lightened heart on his new commission. This part of it that he was enabled to execute is what was mentioned last in the divine communication—the calling of Elisha to succeed him in the prophetical office. This, it would appear from the narrative, took place very shortly after his return to the Syrian region, probably when on his way to the wilderness of Damascus; for it is mentioned in immediate succession to what took place at Horeb, and Abel-meholah, where Elisha resided, lay in the valley of the Jordan, not far from the route of Elijah toward the place of his immediate sojourn. We hear nothing of the operations of these servants of God in the wilderness of Damascus, nor are we told how long they sojourned there. A war with Syria meanwhile sprang up, in which Ahab and Israel came off victorious, 1Ki. xx. The success could scarcely fail to inflame the pride of Ahab and Jezebel, and was probably among the causes that contributed to the atrocious procedure, which issued in the deliberate murder of Naboth, and the appropriation of his vineyard. It was this wicked conduct which again drew Elijah from his lurking-place. In obedience to the word of the Lord he went to meet Ahab, when he came to take possession of his ill-gotten property; and as if an apparition had suddenly presented itself before him, the guilty monarch exclaimed, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" "I have found thee," was the prompt reply; and then followed a terrible denunciation of the iniquity that had been committed, and of the sweeping desolation and ruin that were destined to befall Ahab and his house. In respect to Ahab himself the threatening took effect without any further intervention on Elijah's part, and in connection with a fresh Syrian war, which cost the king of Israel his life. We first meet with our prophet again in the time of his successor Ahaziah, who in the second year of his reign fell through a lattice in his upper chamber, and presently after sent messengers to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, whether he should recover of his disease. Elijah was admonished by the word of the Lord to go and meet them, and to ask, whether it was because there was no God in Israel that they went to inquire of the god of Ekron, 2Ki.1.3. This reproachful internegation was accompanied with a solemn message in the name of Jehovah, that the king should not come down from the bed on which he was laid, but should surely die. The messengers, on receiving such a message, naturally turned back; and then ensued a memorable scene in Elijah's history. The enraged monarch despatched a company of fifty soldiers to apprehend him; and when these through their captain delivered to him the message, "Thou man of God, the king hath said, Come down," they were greeted by the stern reply, "If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty." Promptly, fire did come down and its inmates. The same scene was enacted over again with another fifty; and only when the captain of the third implored that his life and the life of his men might be spared, did Elijah, at the divine suggestion, go down and present himself before the king. But it was only to repeat anew, beside the bed of the now humbled monarch, the same awful words which he had originally addressed to the persons commissioned to inquire at Ekron.

The conduct of Elijah on this occasion has often been objected to as harsh and intemperate. But if it actually had been so, the charge would not so much lie against the prophet, as against God, who formally sanctioned the procedure of his servant by sending the fire from heaven that had been sought. It was folly, in such a case, to restrict the charge of blame to the conductor of the infernal agent in the transaction. But what scene could there be in such a case for any charge of undue severity? After the most extraordinary visitations of providence, and threatening of coming judgment, it still more appalling, the Israelitish court continued wedded as much as ever to its idolatry, practically defying Heaven to its face. Therefore, instead of demonstrating it as harsh, that some of the more active participators in the royal measures were killed, one should rather speak of the forbearance and mercy which suffered any of them to escape; for by the constitution under which they lived, all had become liable to utter extirpation. It is true, that our Lord condemned two of his disciples for seeking to call down fire from heaven on a village of the Samaritans, after the manner of Elias, but xxv. 14. But the circumstances were very much parallel. Jesus had not manifested himself to the Samaritans as Jehovah had done through Elijah to the Israelites; nor was his life exposed at all to such peril by the conduct of the Samaritans, as that which hung around Elijah at the time of his coeking fire from heaven. Besides, the old things were now passing away; and the executions of corporal evil and temporal judgment, which galvanized the ancient economy, would have been entirely out of place, if brought into connection with a state of things essentially different.

It comes plainly enough out in some of the notices relating to the immediately preceding transactions, and also in other incidental notices of the same period, that considerable progress had been made to the better in Israel since the destruction of the false prophets at Carmel, and that the true prophetical agency had become both firmer in its scope, and more active in its movements. Elijah himself was allowed without molestation to meet Ahab on the vineyard of Naboth, and proclaim the Lord's message. Even in his transactions with Ahabiah, it was rather the nature of the word spoken, than the fact of his going at large and engaging in prophetical work, which provoked the wrath of the king. Then, in Ahab's first Syrian war we read of one of the sons of the prophets meeting him, and freely administering to him a rebuke, xx. 31, seq. Also in the second Syrian war, in which Ahab lost his life, the prophet Micaiah appeared openly before Ahab, and delivered his mind upon the subject— with the king's displeasure, no doubt, yet as one who was in the habit of declaring boldly the Lord's counsel. Such things indicated a mighty advance since the time that Elijah complained of all the Lord's prophets but himself having forsaken him, and of his having had to flow all for his own life. It is evident, that during the interval there had been very great prophetic activity on the part of Elijah and his fellow-labourer Elisha; and that their quiet, peaceful ministrations, hugged in the still small voice at Horeb, had accomplished far more than the giant energy and convulsive action that preceded it.

Hence also in the next and closing scene of Elijah's history, that of his translation to glory, we find sons of the prophets in considerable numbers fifty men of noble birth among them were expressly mentioned, moving around the scene of his death. They had the settled abode even in Bethel, one of the chief seats of idolatry, xxiii. 14. To the schools of the prophets had now again manifestly been revived, and, with divisions of their members located in diverse places, they were kept in regular organization and efficient working by the great prophet, whom they all acknowledged as their earthly head.

But at length the times set by God came for removing this head to a higher sphere. The purpose had been communicated to himself, and the monarch also, in so far as it was told by a whirlwind, that he should be carried up from the earth. It had been revealed at the same time to Elisha; so that he would on no account leave his master, though the latter repeatedly sought to be left alone, that his departure might take place in the privacy which was most congenial to his own feelings. The two started from Gilgal, then they went to Bethel, from this they came back to Jericho; and as Elijah said the Lord had sent him to these places, the probability is, that he wished to give some parting counsel to the prophetic institutions there. Leaving Jericho they came to the Jordan; and, as if the spirit of a higher sphere had already caught hold of Elijah, he took his mantle and smote the waters, so that they parted asunder, and made a passage for the two to pass over. When on the further side he asked Elisha if there was anything he could do for him before he was taken away from him: on which Elisha said, "Let a double portion, I pray thee, of the spirit be on me," literally, let there be a mouthful or ration of two (יִתְנָה דַּעַת) with thy spirit to me. The expression is peculiar, and is the same that is used in De. xxvi. 17, in respect to the inheritance of the first-born, who, simply as the first-born, was to have a double portion, or the ration of two among his brethren. It was this which Elisha sought—not, as many commentators have supposed, and as Kammacher in his Elijah also maintains, a gift of the spirit of prophecy twice as large as Elijah himself possessed. This carries impossibility on the very face of it: for with what property could a man be asked to leave as an inheritance to another double of what he himself possessed? Nor did Elisha yet any such supplanting endowment; his position as a prophet was altogether of a dependent and secondary nature.
as compared with Elijah's; and the attempts that have been made to invert the relation of the one to the other, proceed upon arbitrary and superficial considerations. (See Elijah.) Not less arbitrary is the view of Ewald, that the request of Elisha must be understood as indicating a wish for two-thirds only of Elijah's spirit (geschichte, iii, p. 28)—a view that requires no refutation. The proper explanation is, that Elisha here regarded Elijah as the head of a great spiritual household, which included himself as the second-born, who had since been added to the fraternity under the name of "the sons of the prophets;" and what he now sought was, that he might be constituted Elijah's heir in the spiritual vineyard, by getting the first-born's double portion, and therewith authority to continue the work. Elijah gave answer to the request, by saying it was an hard thing he had sought; meaning that as circumstances then stood—with so much done on the part of God to bring things to a better footing in Israel, and so little actually accomplished—it was more than could justly be expected, that God should continue the gifts of grace for prosecuting the work in the manner anticipated by Elisha. Nevertheless, it was added, if Elisha saw his spiritual father at the moment of his ascension, it would be a sign that his request should be granted. And he did so; for while they thus talked together, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, which parted between them, and carried Elijah in a whirlwind to heaven. Elisha looked on with subduing astonishment, and exclaimed, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horses of Israel."—as if with Elijah's departure not only he had been deprived of a venerated parent, but Israel also had lost the chief means of its defence and glory. The prophet's mantle, however, had fallen while he ascended; and with this, the symbol of the continuation of his office, Elisha returned to Jordan, and smote the waters as Elijah himself had previously done. These immediately parted asunder, showing that Jehovah, who had been so wonderfully with Elijah, was now in like manner with Elisha, and giving to the seer of the prophets, who stood to view at Jericho, undoubted evidence of the fact, that "the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha." Thus gloriously ended the career of trial and conflict pursued by Elijah. Why it should have had such a termination—why he alone of all the prophets who spake and witnessed for the truth of God during the continuance of the old covenant, should have been taken to heaven without tasting of death, must remain for us in a great degree involved in mystery. We can without difficulty perceive in it a certain assimilation to the exit of Moses—first of all, in the locality, the scene of both being in some part of the mountainous region over against Jericho; and then in the extraordinary circumstances connected with the departure of each; for though Moses actually died, yet the death took place, it would seem, in the immediate presence of the Lord, and by a higher than an earthly ministry was his body committed to its proper resting-place (De. xxxiv. 5; Jud. x. 29); it was a death which might nearly be said to have been a translation to glory. That it was something more in Elijah's case—that he should have passed into heaven by an actual and visible translation, must be mainly accounted for by the peculiar circumstances of the time, viewed in connection with his special agency as a prophet. His work had been one of mercy and judgment—of judgment, indeed, more prominently than mercy, but still judgment of a more or less providential kind, and intended ever to return again to mercy. The aim and object of his striving was to have Israel raised to the full enjoyment of covenant-blessings, and that by a return on their part to the true covenant-standing, secured for them in the constitution brought in by Moses. He looked no higher than this; it formed no part of his mission to give fresh revelations to Israel of God's purposes of grace, or point their expectations to the other coming One who should be their Carpenter; his object was gained if his countrymen could but be brought to stand on the foundation laid by Moses, and thereby escape the doom that was threatening to overtake their apostasy. In this, however, as he comparatively failed—for the revival effected by his supernatural and energetic striving was partial and incomplete—there was granted at the close the sign of his miraculous translation in a whirlwind and chariot of fire—a sign for those who received his testimony and trod in his footsteps. of Heaven's acceptance of his work; and for those who had rejected the counsel of God against themselves, a sign of that coming whirlwind of wrath and fiery indignation, which was sure one day to vindicate the insulted truth and majesty of Heaven.

It is also from Elijah's peculiar position and striving as a prophet, that we are to explain his appearance, along with Moses, on the mount of transfiguration, to do homage to the Son of man. This did not arise, as is very commonly represented, from his being the greatest of the prophets, and as such, appropriately taken to personate the whole prophetic order; for in the higher department of prophetic agency, especially in its relation to the appearance and kingdom of Christ, he was far outranked by Isaiah and several of the later prophets. It was his relation to Moses rather than to Christ, which fitted Elijah for taking the place he did on the mount of transfiguration. The peculiar testimony to be there given to Jesus was that of the old to the new—of the old as then ready to vanish away, in order that the new might come in with its plenitude of grace and truth. And the proper representatives of the old were Moses, his mediator, and Elijah, his strenuous advocate and reformer—the giant wrestler, who hazarded his life and spent his noblest endeavours to drive back its corrupters, and preserve for posterity its heritage of blessing. When these, therefore, appeared to do homage to Jesus, and then retired before his surpassing glory, in obedience to the word, "This is my beloved Son, hear him," it virtually proclaimed that all was now to become new, and that even the best and greatest in the past was not to be compared with what was going to be established through Jesus for the kingdom of God.

In another connection, but still with reference to his peculiar calling and work as the prophet-reformer, the name of Elijah occurs in the transactions of gospel history. It had been foretold by Malachi that the Lord would send Elijah the prophet before the great and dreadful day of the Lord, that he might turn the heart of the children to the fathers, and the heart of the fathers to the children, et. c. 5; that is, might do an Elijah-work of reformation—bring back degenerate children to the state of their pious ancestors, so that parent and son might have, as it were, a common standing, and be of one mind in respect to the service of God. Partly in interpretation of this prophecy, and partly to indicate how it was to meet with its fulfilment, the angel

Gabriel, in announcing the birth of John the Baptist, said, "Many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God; and he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord," Luke x. 17. There can be no doubt that the Jews generally of our Lord's time expected a reappearance of the literal Elias; in that respect falling much into the same error as they did in the carnal views they formed of the person and kingdom of Messiah. He who came in the spirit and power of Elias was the Elias for gospel times, precisely as he who came to save and reign over God's heritage was the David promised to be raised up and to bring in a better era for the Israel of God, the xxxvi. Hence our Lord, in the later stages of his ministry, first told his disciples that, if they would receive it, John was the Elias which was for to come; and then that in him "Elias had indeed come, though they knew him not, and did to him whatsoever they listed." Matt. xiii. 14.

Jrotius later the Gabrk-l. was in Jehoshaphat. His father, Jehovah, was a prophet, of a people, Jehovah, 10. He who has formed the suppositions from the agency be proceeded; of the Elijah school of prophecy, of which he was still regarded as the ideal head (see Tristram's chronology, at Job. ix. 23).

ELIM [strong trees], the name of the second station of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea, Ex. xv. 27. It was distinguished for its copious fountains and luxuriant trees, having had twelve springs of water and seventy palms growing at their side. Authorities still differ as to the precise spot where this delightful encampment is to be sought. It must have been, says Stanley, in one of three valleys, "Gilanrud, Fezir, or Tsebulich" (p. 253). Both he and Robinson are induced to give the preference to the first of the three, and Stanley thinks that both possibly may have been included, as they are as much of the same character, and lie comparatively near to one another. The water seemed less plentiful than of old, but here are first "the wild palms, successors of the 'threescore and ten.' Not like these of Egypt or of pictures, but either dwarf that is, trunksless— or else with strange hairy trunks and branches, all dishevelled. Then there are the feathery umbrellas, here assuming gaudy boughs and heavy heads, worthy of their venerable situation, on whose leaves is found what the Arabs call nunna. Thirdly, there is the wild acacia, the same as we had often seen in Egypt, but this also tangled by its desert growth into a thicket" (p. 253).

ELIM LECH [what tool is king], a Rechabite, the husband of Naomi, by whom he had two sons, Malchon and Chilion. In a season of scarcity, which appears to have happened some time in the latter part of the period of the judges, the whole family passed over into the land of Moab, where both the father and the two sons died. Nothing further is told of them; but the future fortunes of Naomi, and her daughter-in-law Ruth, are interestingly detailed in the book of Ruth.

ELIOE NAII [fowroes Jelenah my eye, i.e. are turned]. 1. The head of a family in Benjamin, 1 Ch. vi. 2. The head of a family in Simeon, 1 Ch. vi. 26. 3. A Rehobite Levite, one of the doorkeepers in the house of God, 1 Ch. xxiii. 4. A priest of the sons of Tashub, a contemporary of Ezra, and one of those who married strange wives, Ezra xii. 5. An Israelite of the sons of Zattu, who had also married a strange woman, Ezra x. 32.

ELIPHALET, or ELIPHELET [tool for safety]. 1. A son of David, the last born to him in Jerusalem, 2 Sam. xiv. 16. 2. One of David's thirty heroes, 2 Sam. xxiv. 31. 3. A Benjamite, and two companions of Ezra, 1 Ch. vi. 32. 4. Son of David. 5. A Benjamite, and two companions of Ezra, 1 Ch. vi. 32. 6. Son of Zattu, who had also married a strange woman, Ezra x. 32.

ELIPHAZ [tool for strength]. 1. One of the sons of Esau, the father of Teman, see xxxvi. to. 1. One of the three friends of Job, the chief, indeed, of the three. He is simply described as "Eliphaz the Temanite of three. He is the most prominent part of the discussions which took place between Job and his friends is accredited to Eliphaz, but to obtain a proper view of its tenor the whole must be taken in connection. (See Job.)

mother of John the Baptist. She was, like her husband, of the family of Aaron. The only description given of her character is in connection with that of her husband; both are said to have been "righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless," 1 Sa. 1.5. Her history is necessarily intertwined with that of her husband. (See ZACHARIAH.)

ELISHA [trod for setting], in the New Testament, Elisha, son of Shaphat, and a native of Abel-Meholah, which lay near the Jordan, and belonged to the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ki. xix. 16; Js. viii. 22. When at Horeb Elijah was expressly directed to anoint this man prophet in his room. The direction implied designation to an office, for such only as were set apart to a sacred office were anointed, and it was an act more peculiarly appropriated to kings and priests. The act itself was symbolical of the Spirit's grace, as qualifying for the discharge of the office; and since prophecy in the true sense was always the special gift of the Spirit, those who possessed the gift might be said to be anointed, whether they received any outward consecration or not. (See ANointing.) In the case even of Elisha, it may be questioned whether the anointing involved an application of oil, for in the narrative of the transaction we read only of Elijah throwing his mantle over him, which was plainly meant on the one side, and understood on the other, to be a call to the prophetic office. It may, however, have been succeeded by a special act of consecration, both here and in the case of such as had a distinct sphere of prophetic agency to fill, but we want materials for determining how far, or with what particular forms of the prophetic calling, actual anointing was connected.

That Elisha was in circumstances of external comfort is evident from his being found by Elijah ploughing with two yoke of oxen, himself personally engaged with the twelfth, 1 Ki. xix. 13. Hengstenberg (p. 111; Eng. trans. p. 111) sees in the twelfth a symbolical reference to the twelve tribes of Israel, and in the circumstance an indication that Elisha was to be a prophet, not for the ten tribes alone, but for the whole covenant-people. If the number twelve had been employed by him in an action formally connected with his entrance on the prophetic office, or with the public discharge of its duties, we could have seen the force of this application of the historical notice; but occurring, as it does, in connection with Elisha's earlier and common occupations, it appears to seek for a symbolism where none could naturally be thought of. The first action too of Elisha in his new calling destroys its fitness for such a purpose, as one pair out of the twelve he presently killed and made a feast with them—a portentous entertainment on taking leave of his former associates and quitting his old employment, that he might henceforth give himself to the ministry of a higher service.

How long Elisha companied with Elijah, and assisted him in the revival of the schools of the prophets, and the other forms of prophetic agency which occupied the latter years of Elijah's career, is not absolutely certain, but according to the common reckoning it filled a space of ten or twelve years. From the public events that are known to have taken place in the interval it could not well have been less. Even the state of comparative fulness and efficiency to which the prophetic associations had been raised, and their distribution throughout the land, must have required the active cooperation of the two men for a variety of years.

During the continuance of the period of their joint action, Elisha occupied but a subordinate place; he "ministered to Elijah;" and when Elijah was going to be taken up, it was represented by the sons of the prophets as the "taking away of his master from his head," 2 Ki. ii. 13—literally, from over his head. He had hitherto stood, as it were, at Elijah's head, counselling, directing, or overlooking him; but now he was to be lifted up over it—removed to a higher sphere. The relation, as of greater and less, father and son, continued to hold in respect to the prophetical agency of each after the translation of Elijah; and the respect of Elisha to obtain a double portion of his master's spirit, which was granted, referred, as stated in a previous article (see ELISHA), to the higher position henceforth to be occupied by Elisha, as compared, not with what Elijah had been, but with what any in the schools of the prophets were to be; Elisha, as the first-born, with a double share in the spiritual inheritance, was to stand in the room of Elijah and be the head over the brethren.

It may, however, be admitted, as no way inconsistent with this relative inferiority, that there was a certain advance intended by the ministry of Elisha; the work begun by Elijah was not only to be continued, but also carried forward. The name of the successor might be said to indicate this; for in the name of both prophets the distinctive strivings of each had its expression. To establish the truth that Jehovah alone was the El or God whom the Israelites ought to worship, was the great object of Elijah's activity, and from this, as from a position already won, it was Elisha's more especial calling to manifest that, if but rightly acknowledged as the El, Jehovah should also prove the salvation of his people. Hence, while the agency of the latter prophet was altogether of a less elevated, more quiet, and subdued description than that of Elijah's, it certainly parboiled more of beneficent working, and was more palpably distinguished by the bestowal of blessing. With this indeed it commenced; for immediately after he had assumed the part of Elijah's successor, and in the parting asunder of the waters of the Jordan, while he smote them with Elijah's mantle, he received the seal of Heaven on his commission—the people of Jericho sought and obtained through him an important boon. Having tarried there for a little, they came and said to him, "The Lord, I pray thee, the situation of the city is pleasant, but the water is salty, and the ground barren." This can scarcely be understood to refer to the only, or even to the chief, source of the water that supplied the inhabitants of Jericho, for it had been from early times a flourishing city; and having been designated the city of palm-trees from the abundance of those in the neighbourhood, there must have been fertility, as well as barrenness, in the adjoining territory. But at the time in question the defect as to water, and the evil effects flowing from it must have been conspicuous, otherwise neither would the people have asked, nor would Elisha have undertaken to work a miraculous change to the better. The mode of his doing this by salt may seem strange, since the intimate mixture of saline matter in springs spoils instead of improving the quality of the water, but it is to be explained by the symbolical use of salt in things spiritual and divine. Being in respect to substances of a fleshly kind the great preservative of nature, it became an emblem of what is pure and incorruptible—of life itself in a state of insurrection, or of the means which minister to its support and comfort. (See SALT, Its application therefore, on the present occasion, to the waters of an missionary spring, simply denoted that the healing power of the Lord was applied to them, so as to render them capable of ministering to the re-illumination and healthfulness of life. How actually the change was effected we cannot tell; but one can easily conceivethat, as the unwholesome ingredient must have beencontracted by the waters passing through some beds of rock or earth that furnished it, so, by turning thesubterraneous currents in another direction, they mayhave either avoided the pollution or again becomepurged from it. This is at least one perfectly conceivabledock of accomplishing a permanent change, andone which, while requiring a miraculous interposition atfirst, might afterwards proceed in harmony with theordinary powers and properties of nature.

The next recorded act of Elisha was of a differentkind, and was doubtless intended to show that, what-ever diversity of gifts or operations might belong tohim as compared with his great predecessor, he alsostood officially connected with the authority and thehonour of Heaven. It took place when on a visit toBethel, which had been, since Jeroboam's time, one of thegreat seats of corruption, but which had latterlyenjoyed the privilege of having one of the schools of theprophets established within its gates. On approachingit certain "little children," as they are called in theEnglish version, though it should rather be "younglads," mocked Elisha and called him by the contemptuousepithet of baldhead. To be actually bald on theback part of the head was reckoned a blinsham among theIsraelites as well as among the Romans, and hence thepriests were forbidden to shave themselves bald, so speaketh Amos. It must be understood that theepithet, whether literally applicable to Elisha or not,was used in a slighting manner toward him, not simplyas a man, but as a prophet of the Lord, and used bypersons who, though young, were still sufficiently grown tobe the proper subjects of moral treatment; for nootherwise could he have turned round as he did andcurseth them in the name of the Lord. In treating himwith contempt they contemned the Lord, and at thesametime ridiculed the attempts at reformation which heand the sons of the prophets had been making atBethel. Therefore in the Lord's name he pronouncedon them an anathema, which so far took present-effectthat they were attacked by two she-lions out of thewood, which tore forty-two of them. It is not saidthat they were actually killed. This fate may indeedhave befallem some of the party, but is by no meansprobable in regard to the greater number.

A more public occasion soon called for the exerciseof Elisha's prophetic gifts. Moab had rebelled againstIsrael after the death of Ahab, and Ahaziah, the sonand immediate successor of Ahab, had, it would seem,been able to do nothing during his brief reign to regain thelost dominion. But Jehoram, the next son, who presently succeeded to the throne, set about preparations for war; and the more effectually to secure his purpose, he entered into an offensive alliance with Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, and also with the reigning king of Edom. Jehoshaphat was no doubt tempted to join in the alliance, from his territories having been attacked by the king of Moab, who had stirred up (though with less only to himself) and his allyed a somewhat formidable conspiracy against him, 2 ch. x.

The array of the three kings, in executing theirproposed campaign against Moab, came to a valley where they expected to find water; but experiencingdisappointment, the fear became prevalent that thewhole should fall a helpless prey into the hands of theadversary. In this extremity Jehoshaphat began to ask if there was no prophet of Jehovah to be had, atwhich they might make inquiry. He was informedthat Elisha was there; and on going down to him withJehoram the king of Israel, the prophet immediatelybroke out in an exultation with the latter, and said,"What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophetsof thy father and of thy mother." Jehoshaphat howeverinterposed, and referred the present difficulties to thecounsel of Jehovah, as if he had brought together theconfederate forces for the purpose only of consigningthem to destruction." Nay," he said, not speak ofmerely repairing to those false prophets, "for Jehovah hath called these three kings together to deliverthem into the hand of Moab." On this Elisha reprosedhis indignation, and consented, for the sake of Jehoshafat, but on this account alone, to inquire of the Lord.Preparatory to his doing so, he asked for a minstrel,that his disturbed and pulled spirit might be soothed, andmight rise into a more placid frame without which it was not in a fit state for receiving themore special communions from above. He ere longreached the proper state, and obtained from the Lorda message, calling upon them to fill the valley withtrenches, to hold the water which the Lord was goingtoprove for them, and also assuring them that theLord would deliver the Moabites into their hand. Theevent proved as the prophet had announced, for in thecourse of the following night the trenches were filledwith water, though no man had filled the immediateneighbourhood; and the Moabites, seeing from a distance the fiery glitter of the sun on the water, andmistaking it for blood, which they supposed theconfederate forces had shed in mutual slaughter, hastenedforward to the prey, and thereby exposed themselves toan attack which ended in their complete discomfiture.

This gracious interposition in a time of peculiarurgency and peril was fitted to leave a favourableimpression upon the mind of Jehoram; and so it appearshe have done. He acted in a very different relation toElisha from that which his father had maintained toward Elijah; and though he did not cease to follow thesins of Jehosokia, and appears in many respects tohave profited little by the judgments that had beenexecuted upon transgression in Israel, yet he kept abeafrom the more offensive rites of Baal, and the grossercorruptions practised by his parents. After the deli-verance on the plains of Moab, Elisha seems commonlyto have been treated by him with marked respect, asappears from the other incidental notices given of themiracles wrought by his hand. These notices are notarranged in perfect chronological order; for they seem toproceed on the principle of relating first the acts done in behalf of individuals, and then those whichconcerned the king and people of Israel. If one admits themiraculous element in the acts referred to, as calledfor by the adverse circumstances of the time, neededto revive the languishing faith of the people, and ifpossible arrest the work of judgment, none of them willoccasion any peculiar difficulty, and, as a whole, they afford a remarkable exhibition of the forbearance and merciful consideration of God.

The first of the instances recorded is respect to a poor woman, a widow of one of the sons of the prophets, who came crying to Elisha for relief, because she had fallen into debt, and the creditor was ready to take her two sons for bondmen in payment. The law authorized this, limiting however the period of service to the year of jubilee, i.e. xx 20; but in her circumstances the enforcement of the law even for a limited period could not but be felt as a grievous calamity.

To Elisha also it appeared a case warranting the divine interposition; and in the mode of administering relief he took what she actually had as the ground and occasion of providing what besides she required to obtain. Finding she still had a pot of oil, he told her to go and borrow vessels from her neighbours and pour out as much as would flow. She did so, and found that the oil continued to stream forth till every vessel was filled. Herself astonished at the result, she went and told the prophet; and was directed by him to sell what was needed to discharge the debt and apply the remainder to her own use.

The more direct object of the next wonder wrought by Elisha was also a woman, but one in affliction, not in depressed circumstances. She belonged to the priests' remnant that still survived in different parts of the land of Israel, dwelling at Shunem in the tribe of Issachar. This place lay on the route from Gilgal to Carmel, which was frequently travelled by Elisha; and the priests Shumamite, not only on a certain occasion pressed him to go in and take some refreshment, but obtained the consent of her husband to have a little chamber added to one of the sides of the house, for the purpose of affording a convenient lodging-room for Elisha as often as he might pass that way. He gladly availed himself, it would seem, of the pleasant welcome it offered, as he could not but be refreshed in spirit with the indications which there from time to time met him of an humble and loving faith. He wished, therefore, to give some mark of his grateful feeling to the woman; and, finding that she sought for herself and her husband no boon of a worldly kind, that she was content with her place and condition in life, but being reminded by Gehazi that she had no child, he made promise to her that she should next year embrace a son. The promise was fulfilled; at the proper time she became the mother of a son. And the child grew, and doubtless gathered around him many fond hopes and tender affections—till one day, when with his father on the harvest-field he was visited by a stroke of the sun, or some similar affection, and began to cry in agony, "My head, my head!" he was carried home and in a few hours expired in his mother's arms. If the child had come to this Shumamite woman in an ordinary manner, she would probably have felt that she had no reason to look for any singular interposition, and that, however sore the visitation, she must bow her heart, like other bereaved mothers in Israel, to the hand of her heavenly Father. But coming, as this child had done, in the form of an unsought and special boon, she could not bring herself to believe that it was to be thus hopelessly wrested from her grasp; her faith rose with the occasion, strengthened probably and encouraged by the knowledge of what had been done through Elijah to the widow's son at Zarephath. Therefore she ordered the servant instantly to saddle an ass, and repaired without delay to the prophet at Carmel, where she knew he was at the time sojourning. The interview that took place between them is given only in fragments, but it came out that the child was, if not absolutely gone, on the very eve of being so, and that nothing would satisfy the mother, but that Elisha should go with her, and exercise his supernatural gifts in her behalf. The moment he heard of it he despatched Gehazi, with instructions to lose no time by the way, and when he reached the place, to lay Elisha's staff on the face of the child, apparent in the hope that this might be sufficient for its revival, and probably under the impression that the child was in a swoon, rather than actually dead. But the matter turned out to be of a more serious description; for no response came from the application of the prophet's staff by the hand of Gehazi, and he hastened back to meet his master with the tidings that the child had not awaked.

When Elisha was come to the house, it is mentioned as matter of surprise, that "behold, the child was dead and laid upon his bed," as if it was only now he saw the full extent of the calamity. Hence, he no longer thought of any secondary applications by means of his staff, but addressed himself in earnest prayer to God, and then, after the example of Elijah, he stretched himself upon the child, that the divine virtue in the one might by such personal contact pass the more readily into the other. The Levites responded to the faith and prayer of his servant, and after a second stretching on the child, life in its full vigour again returned, and the boy was delivered safe and sound to its mother.

The prevalence of a general dearth gave occasion to another, though somewhat less remarkable, operation of the healing power possessed by Elisha. The sons of the prophets at Gilgal had difficulty in obtaining supplies of food; and in gathering for a common repast there was brought, among other productions of the field, what is called in the English version "a wild vine," on which grew "wild gourds," that were shived into the pot of herbs, and when tasted, told with such an effect on the company, that they cried out, "There is death in the pot." It is not agreed among commentators what the production here referred to might be; it could not properly be a wild vine, but must rather have been some plant having wild runners similar to the wild vine, since it yielded pottage—which some take to be wild cucumbers (Genesis, Wine, &c.), and others coloquintida (Michaelis, Ostmann, &c.). Both of these indeed belong to the general family of cucumbers, and bear fruit that is of a caustic bitter taste, and in its effects far from wholesome. It matters little, therefore, which of the two it might be, as indeed we want the means for properly deciding; but by throwing in a quantity of meal, as the symbol perhaps, rather than the cause, of a wholesome and nutritive diet, an effect was produced of a counteractive nature—the potage was found to be diverted of its noxious qualities.

It was probably about the same time, and in connection with the same dearth, that a supernatural effect was produced, not by undoing an evil in articles of food, but by greatly extending their sustaining virtue. A person came from Baal-shalisha bringing bread of the first-fruits, and some full ears of corn—the first-fruits of harvest. Offerings of this description properly be-
Elisha

Elisha, the successor of Elijah, was a great prophet who lived in the time of the kings of Israel and Judah. He was known for his miraculous works and his ability to heal leprosy, as recorded in 2 Kings 5:1-28. In this passage, a Syrian nobleman named Naaman, who was afflicted with leprosy, came to Elisha seeking help. Elisha, knowing the power of God, challenged Naaman to perform an act of faith to be healed. Naaman obediently went to the river Jordan, washed seven times, and was instantly healed. This incident is a classic example of Elisha's miracles and his faithfulness to God. Elisha's ministry not only brought healing but also led to a deeper understanding of God's power and the importance of faith in the face of adversities.

Thus, Elisha's life and ministry were characterized by his unwavering commitment to God and his willingness to trust in divine intervention. His actions and teachings continue to inspire generations to seek God's wisdom and power in their lives.

The narrative of Elisha's life is filled with rich teachings about faith, obedience, and the power of God. It serves as a reminder to all who seek to follow in the footsteps of the prophets as they too sought to serve and glorify God in a world often hostile to His kingdom.
vants of betraying him; but being informed of the peculiar service rendered to his adversary by Elisha, he resolved on seizing the person of the prophet, and sent a great host to surprise him in Dothan. The servant of Elisha stood aghast at the formidable array; but Elisha himself retained his composure, and assured his servant that there were with them more than supplied them. In confirmation of this he prayed to the author of his services, and said, "Is not the mountain full of the host of the Lord, as I see before me?" He saw the mountain full of chariots of fire and horses of fire, visible manifestations to the spiritual eye of the might and protection of Jehovah around Elisha. The prophet further prayed that the Syrian host might be smitten with blindness—not apparently with the actual loss of corporeal vision, but a kind of bewildерment, which prevented them from knowing where they really were, and led them to surrender themselves implicitly to his guidance. He conducted them into the midst of Samaria, where their eyes were again opened, and they found themselves at the mercy of their enemies.

Jehoram would have instantly fallen upon them, and asked Elisha if he would smite: but Elisha magnanimously rejected the proposal, and ordered bread and water to be set before them; after which they were dismissed to their master. If Benhadad had been in any degree conscious of the mere noble and generous impulses of nature, he would have abated his hostility on hearing of such mercy and forbearance toward his troops, or perhaps have altogether ceased from so unequal a contest. But warlike ambition seemed to him only motive, brute force the only power he could estimate or wield: and so the partial defeats he had sustained but served to stimulate his rage, and led him to gather all his strength and implements of war for a desperate assault on Samaria. He succeeded in driving matters to a fearful extremity; so that extravagant prices came to be paid for things which in ordinary circumstances would have been totally rejected as articles of diet, &c. &c.; and some were even beginning to resort to the dreadful expedient of feeding on human flesh. This forced itself on the notice of the king one day as he passed along the wall; when a woman cried out to him against her neighbour, because after having agreed to kill and eat each other's sons, the one whose turn came second resciled from the agreement, and would not suffer her son to be destroyed. On hearing this sad story, the king rent his clothes, from which it was perceived that he wore sackcloth upon his flesh, and was baying to heart more than had been suspected the miseries and distresses of his people.

If we had been simply told that Jehoram thus clad himself in sackcloth and rent his clothes, we should have concluded favourably in regard to his penitent state of mind; but the notice in that respect is followed up by a stern and vehement denunciation against Elisha, in which the king said, "God do so and more also to me, if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat, shall stand on him this day." It does not appear from the narrative why Jehoram should have so directly connected Elisha's name with the extremities endured, and should have voiced such summary vengeance against him. From the circumstance one of two suppositions is forced upon us—either Elisha had spoken of the assault of Benhadad as a divine judgment for the still prevailing sins, and thus came to be wrongfully identified with the evil; or he had advised Jehoram to reject the terms offered by Benhadad, and was now denounced by the king as one that had given wicked counsel. It is possible, even that both suppositions may to some extent have come into play. But however it may have been in that respect, there can be no doubt that the resolution of the king to execute death on Elisha indicated a still unsatiated and rebellious mind. It appears, however, to have been rather the sudden outburst of uncontrolled passion, than the expression of a deliberately formed purpose. For, after having despatched a messenger to take the life of Elisha, whose approach was described by the prophet, and the door of the house barred against him—the king himself this morning, as he is called, ch. xvi. 22 followed close behind him; and it seems to be to this master, not to the messenger, nor even to Elisha, that the words should be inscribed at the close of ch. xi. "Pekhele, this evil is of the Lord, what should I wait for the Lord any longer?" p. 67. I now admit that the Lord's hand is in this calamity; it is needless for me to contend any longer against it; let me surrender myself to His disposal. If this be the correct view of the matter, then the king's heart must have inclined immediately after he gave the order for Elisha's death; and he deemed it better to go himself, and make proposals of a capitulation to the enemy.

Hence, seeing the king in this softened mood, brought down to acknowledge the Lord's hand in the calamities experienced, and his own incapacity to struggle any longer against the evil, the prophet, in the Lord's name, gave intimation of an almost instantaneous deliverance. Then Elisha said, Hear ye the word of Jehovah, thus saith Jehovah. To-morrow, about this time, shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shewbread, and two measures of barley for a shewbread, in the gate of Samaria." ch. vii. 1. It seemed absolutely incredible; insomuch that a lord present, on whose hand the king leaned, asked if it were possible by opening the windows of heaven to make such a thing to be. It came to pass, however, precisely as Elisha predicted; for the Lord caused the Syrians to hear a sound as of approaching chariots and horses, on account of which they took fright and fled by night, and left all their baggage and provisions behind them; so that the people in Samaria passed at once from the horrors of famine to the possession of plenty. The mixture of judgment and mercy on this occasion was so very singular, that it should have produced a deep and lasting impression upon Jehoram and his people; and, coupled with other things that had gone before, should have led them to recognize all their abominations for the pure worship and service of Jehovah. It failed, however, in doing that; the old sins and pollutions were never thoroughly abolished. Elisha, as a man of God, certainly rose in public estimation; even the king came to regard him with profound respect, and is presented on one occasion as insinuating at Hazael into all the great things he had done, ch. viii. 1; but there was no sincere turning to the Lord, or general reformation of abuses. Judgment, therefore, still hung like a dark cloud on the horizon; and the prophet, who had been the instruments of giving so many wonderful proofs of the divine forbearance and mercy, had to close his more public career by calling into exercise the rod of divine vengeance. For this two special instruments were to be employed—Hazael in Syria, and Jehu in Israel; who had been long before, indeed, indicated by the Lord to Elijah at Horeb, ch. xix. 15, 16; but the measure of severity was delayed till measures of a Elisha had properly no successor. Several prophets followed him in the kingdom of Israel. Jehoahaz, Amos, and Hosea were the last great representatives of that type of prophetic agency to which he belonged. Minimally, working hand in hand with the kings and the people, he had the support of the people through the authority he derived from the Scripture. He gave a somewhat fuller insight into his own purposes of judgment and mercy, and the bearing these were destined to have on the tribes of Israel. This was in truth the higher species of prophetic administration; but, from the false political position of the kingdom of Israel, it could not be so much exercised as in connection with the kingdom of Judah. In a great degree therefore, Elijah and his successor Elisha may be said to have stood alone in the kingdom of Israel; alike in the general nature and respect of their work, though each with his own characteristic peculiarities, and each suited to his proper time and sphere. So that here also wisdom was justified of her children.

ELISHAH, the name of one of the sons of Javan, Gen. x. 1, from whom it is supposed "the isles of Elisha" took their designation, which trafficked with Tyre in fabrics of purple and scarlet, Ezk. xxiv. 7. Elisha is very commonly identified with it, which may have been peopled by the descendants of Elishah. Others understand it for the Zelians. But there is no certainty.

ELISHA MA (Ahon, a type of hokhâ), 1. A prince in Ephraim, 2 Sam. i. 19. 2. A son of David, born to him in Jerusalem, 2 Sam. iii. 16. 3. A descendant of Judah, 2 Chr. ii. 21; 2 Kings xxv. 4. A priest in the time of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chr. xviii.

ELISHAPAH (shemo tâl judges), a captain of hundreds in the time and service of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chr. xviii.

ELISHEBA (tsa hâm sa rah), the daughter of Amanahiah, of the tribe of Judah, and the wife of Aaron, Ex. vi. 22. So that the descendants of Aaron were closely allied to the tribe of Judah, though they actually belonged to the tribe of Levi.

ELIZAPHAN (shemo tâl hîdâh), 1. A Levite, and head of the family of the Kohathites, when the census was taken in the wilderness, Num. iii. 29. 2. A leading person of the tribe of Zebulun, who took part in the distribution of the land of Canaan, Num. xxi.

ELKANAH (shemo tâl provided), 1. One of the sons of Korah, Ex. vi. 2. The family of Korah did not perish with himself, Num. xxxvi. 2. Several other descendants of Korah bore this name, 1 Chr. six. 2, 3, 7. ix. 36, 37, but the only one known to history was the father of Samuel; and of him we know nothing more than that he lived at Ramathaim Zophim in Mount Ephraim, and had two wives—Hannah and Peninnah, and by the former became the father of Samuel the prophet, 1 Sam. i, ii.

ELKOSITE, applied as a designation to the prophet Nahum, ch. i, 1, and apparently describing him as a native of Elkosh. There was a place of that name in Assyria, near Mosel, and some have contended for this as at once the birthplace and the grave of the prophet. The modern Jews are of this opinion. But it is not generally ascribed to. The more probable opinion is, that Elkosh was a town in some part of Palestine, Jerome, in his comment on the prophet, assigns it to Galilee, and says it was pointed out to himself. No further reliance, however, can be placed on this testimony, than as affording evidence of the prevailing belief in Jerome's time of the region where the Elkosh of Nahum was to be sought. (See Nahum.)

ELLAS, the country and kingdom of Arach, one of the four kings that invaded Canaan in the days of Abraham, Gen. xiv. 1. Nothing certain is known of it; but being associated with Elam and Shinar, there can be no doubt that it indicated an Asiatic region, somewhere in the same neighbourhood. It is very commonly identified with Thelasar.

ELM, the translation given us in Hos. iv. 13 of adâh (ʼādāh), which everywhere else is rendered oth (which see).

ELNATHAN (shoôn God pray), 1. Maternal grandfather of Jehoichin, and probably the same with the son of Azbor, who lived in Jehoiakim's time, 2 Kings xxiv. 3; 2 Kings xxvi. 22. 2. Certain Levites in Ezra's time, Ezra viii. 19.

ELOHIM, tenth, or gods. See God.

ELON [ark]. 1. A Zealot, who judged Israel ten years, Acts xvi. 11; but of that distinctive character of his administration, or how he attained to the authority implied in it, Scripture is entirely silent. 2. A Hittite chief, the father of one of Esau's wives, Gen. xxxvi. 21. 3. One of the wives of Zebulun, Gen. xxxvii. 11.

ELOTH, a border town of the tribe of Dan, whose site has not been identified, Josh. xiv.

ELOTH. See Eloth.

ELPAAL, the name reserved is God, the founder of a family among the Benjaminites, 1 Chr. viii. 25.

ELUL, the sixth Hebrew month. See Month.

ELYMAS, a derivative of the Arabic alâma, wise, and hence corresponding to ἅγιος, the euphemistically wise man, the man skilled in mystic lore, the magician. So it is explained in Ac. xiii. 8, where it is applied to Bar-jesus, a magician of the lower caste, who by his arts withstood the apostle Paul, and sought to turn away the prescind from the faith.

ELYMEANS. See Elam.

ELZAPHAN, a contraction of Elzaphan.

EMBALMING, the dead appears to have had its origin in Egypt, and comes into consideration here only as having been practised upon the bodies of some of the covenant-people during their sojourn in that country. We have no specific notice of its having been employed in any case but that of Jacob, their common father, and Joseph—although it is highly probable that the like practice was followed with the whole of the twelve patriarchs, whose bodies are reported to have been carried into Canaan, and buried in the field Jacob bought of Schemesh, Ac. viii. 12. The simple fact of Joseph's embalming is mentioned, Gen. xli. 45, but of Jacob it is said with more particularity, that "Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father; and forty days were fulfilled for him; for so are fulfilled the days of those who are embalmed: and the Egyptians mourned for him three days and ten days," Gen. xl. 2, 3. There are several things remarkable in this statement; and the first is, the mention it makes of physicians as being in the service of Joseph, and having it as a part of their proper employment to look after the embalming of the dead. We know of no other country of antiquity in which such a state of things existed: but there can be no doubt of its existence at a very remote period in Egypt. Herraraus expressly testifies of the Egypt of his day, that there "every distinct distemper has its own physician, who confines himself to the study and cure of that alone: so that all places are crowded with physicians." Hence, as Warburton has remarked (ix. 150, b. 153), a body of such domestics, however extravagant it might appear now, even in a minister of state, was unavoidable then, when each distemper had its proper physician. So great a name had the Egyptian physicians, that both Cyrus and Darius are reported by Herodotus to have had them always in their service (iii. 1, 129).

Understanding this, however, it may still appear somewhat strange, that the physicians should have had to do with the embalming of the dead, as well as with the cure of the living body. The physicians in the two cases, however, would not be of the same class. The subdivision generally that was made of the medical art in Egypt would certainly lead to the appropriation of the process of embalming by a separate class of practitioners; and as the process required both a knowledge of the human frame, and an application of proper medi-
EMBALMING

The process of embalming was under the direction of the ordinary physicians. Ultimately, the embalmers became a distinct and regularly organized class, with their own separate departments of the work. But as, according to Pliny (vi. 3), certain examinations took place during the process, which enabled them to study the disease of which the deceased had died, they must still either themselves have been proficient in the medical art, or have been under the direction of those who were such.

In regard to the process of embalming itself, according to the accounts of Herodotus and Dioscorus, there were three different forms of it, varying in regard to the extent of the operations performed, and the relative expenditure incurred. When the highest scale was chosen by the relatives of the deceased, the embalmers commenced by extracting the brain through the nostrils by means of a curved iron probe, after which they poured in certain drugs. For the purpose, in like manner, of extracting the intestines, they made an incision in the side with a sharp Ethiopian stone; and having thus drawn them out, the intestines were properly cleansed, then enclosed in spices of different sorts, and at last deposited in vases not thrown into the river, as Porphyry and Pliny relate. The cavity of the body was filled with powder of pure myrrh, cassia, and other fragrant substances. After these processes were finished, the body was salted, being kept in natron, Dioscorus says, for upwards of thirty days or so, but Herodotus for seventy or so. By the seventy days of Herodotus, it is now generally agreed, is to be understood the whole period of mummification, or the time during which the body was in the hands of the embalmers; while the thirty and upwards of Dioscorus relate only to the period during which the application of spices was made to the body, which, in the stricter sense, constituted the embalming. This view perfectly accords with the account of Moses, which assigns forty days to the embalming, and seventy to the entire period of mummification. When the embalming was completed, the body was washed, wrapped up in bands of fine linen, which, on the interior, were plastered with gum, and which sometimes extended to the enormous length of four thousand yards. After all this, the body was delivered over to the relatives, who placed it in a stone or wooden coffin.

Such was the nature of the higher and more expensive style of embalming, which, according to Dioscorus, cost a talent of silver (£250); and it was, no doubt, the form of it applied to Jacob's body, and the bodies of the other patriarchs in Egypt. The second style left the intestines in the body, but by injecting a strong oil of cedar, and letting it remain for a certain time, the bowels became dissolved, and ran out along with the oil. Natron and spices were then applied to the body. This process cost about twenty-two minas (£600).

By a third mode, which cost comparatively little, and was adopted by the poor, the body was merely cleansed by an injection of opoponax, and salted for the same period as in the other cases. Wilkinson (Ancient Egyptians, p. 546 seq.) states that from an examination of the mummies, the gradations, as to elaboration and expense, must have been much more varied than the above account from ancient writers would lead one to suppose, and also, that the incision into the side for the purpose of extracting the bowels, was not always confined to those of the first class, but that some of a comparatively inferior class appear to have been subjected to that species of operation. It would seem, too, that the features of the face, as well as the other parts of the body, were covered over with the bandage, and that it was only through this, and latterly through the coffin, which commonly took the form of the features, that these

The reasons which may have led the Egyptians to resort to all this care for the preservation of the dead body, have never been conclusively ascertained. Several have been assigned, which are altogether conjectural and improbable. With the greatest appearance of probability it has been ascribed to a distinctively religious aspect of the doctrine of the soul's transmigration current in Egypt. "There is reason," says Sir G. Wilkinson, "to believe that the Egyptians preserved the body in order to keep it in a fit state to receive the soul which once inhabited it, after the lapse of a certain number of years; and the various occupations followed by the Egyptians during the lifetime of the deceased, which were represented in the sculptures, as well as his arms, the implements he used, or whatever was most precious to him, which were deposited in the tomb with his coffin, might be intended for his benefit at the time of this reunion—what at the least possible period was fixed at 3000 years." What chiefly serves to throw some doubt upon this solution of the problem, is the fact of the process of embalming having been applied also to certain animals; so that possibly after all, as the same author suggests, it may have been mainly attributable to a feeling of respect for the dead.

EMBROIDERY. This word does not occur in the English Bible, but we have the verb embroider once used, Ex. xxv. 20, and embroiders twice, Ex. xxvi. 29, xxxvi. 23, so that, if these passages are correctly rendered, the Israelites must have known the art of embroidery. In several passages also an equivalent expression is used—needle-work—and used so as to imply, that not plain sewing, but ornamental work, was evidently meant, Ex. xxv. 20, 23, 26, 34. In all the passages the Hebrew word is the same—roden (םד) for the artist, and vûketh (绿色发展) for the workmanship produced. Another word frequently used in connection with it, and so much of the same general import that there is some difficulty in distinguishing exactly between them, is choshah (נשת), for which the rendering in the English Bible is "running workman." The explanation of the rabbis is, that the work of the roden was embroidery or needle work, hence appearing only on one side, perhaps sewed on to the cloth; while the work of the choshah was textile, or a sort of tapestry, presenting a face on each side. Gesenius (Thes.) shows in this view, and thinks, that while the embroidery of flowers and figures was of two sorts—the one woven, the other performed by the needle; the latter sort is the one to be understood as that done by the roden, and the other by the choshah. Whether this distribution may be admitted or not, and there is still room perhaps for dispute, there can be no reasonable doubt, that embroidery of both sorts was practised among the Israelites in pretty remote antiquity, though that done by the braid was probably both the more ancient and the more common. It was in Egypt that they first learned the art; and, whether in connection with the bond-service they had to perform there, or of their own choice, certain families, it would appear, at the time of the exodus, had risen to distinction in the arts of weaving and embroidery; some, especially, in the tribes of Judah and Dan, Ex. xxv. 20, 22, 34, 37, c. 31. These were exhorted to turn their acquired skill in this department of handicraft to a sacred use, and to prepare ornamented fabrics, in tapestry and needlework, variegated also with diverse colours, for the curtains of the tabernacle and the robes of the priesthood.

The notices of Egyptian history, confirmed by the monumental remains, give reason for believing that at a comparatively early period they had made wonderful attainments in this line. For example, a coral is mentioned by Herodotus as having been presented by Amasis, king of Egypt, to the Macedonians, which was of linen, each thread composed of 369 finer threads, and ornamented with numerous figures of animals, worked in gold and cotton. This was many centuries indeed after the exodus; but its testimony reaches back to a much earlier time, as such a beautiful and elaborate piece of workmanship could not have been produced without ages of study and application to the art. Wilkinson says, "Many of the Egyptian staffs presented various patterns worked in colours by the loom, independent of those produced by the dyeing or printing process, and so richly composed that they vied with cloths embroidered by the needle. The art of embroidery," he adds, "was commonly practised in Egypt" (iii. 129)—referring in proof, however, simply to passages in Scripture, and taking them in the sense put upon them in the authorized version, sanctioned as we have seen by Gesenius and the rabbinic authorities. The authority of Pliny has sometimes been appealed to against such early employment of the needle in embroidery; for he says that the Phrygians (of comparatively late origin as a people) were the inventors of needle embroideries, which were thence called phrygiones (xxxiii. 3). But little dependence can be placed on Pliny's authority in such a case may be inferred from another thing he states in the same connection, viz.—that Attalus of Pergamus, a great encourager of the arts, was the first who invented the weaving of cloth with a gold thread, while a finely wrought specimen of such weaving is mentioned by Herodotus in the fact just noticed respecting the Egyptian consel of Amasis, fully 2500 years before the time of Attalus the one having lived in the sixth and the other only in the second and third before Christ. In No. 243, an illustration is given from Champollion of the Egyptian embroidered dresses. They are all evidently the production of the loom, and exhibit patterns of the kind called by the Latin scautulae—diamond or lozenge-shaped, chequered. We also give (No. 244) an engraving of the dress of a lady, in which the embroidery is of a more varied and ornate character than usual. In regard to the Assyrian region, with its centres of trade as well as dominion in Nineveh and Babylon, we have not also the unbiassed evidence of their having cultivated with great success, even in early times, the art of producing embroidered as well as richly coloured clothing. The Babylonians certainly were most noted for their skill in weaving cloths distinguished for their colours; and the Babylonish garment which attracted the eye of Achan, and drew after it such disastrous results, Jos. iii. 22, was in all probability of that description. Its beauty must have been of a kind that was fitted to dazzle and catch the eye. But it is scarcely to be supposed that an art which flourished at Nineveh should have been unknown in the not very distant Babylon; and we are now in possession of specimens of beautifully-embroidered dresses from the remains of Nineveh. That seen in cut No. 244 is the upper portion of the dress of Sardanapalus III. Assyrian sculpture, British Museum.

alternating. As given here, the dress appears as worn by the king in a warlike attitude riding in a chariot; but in a sculpture of the same king in the British Museum, where he appears entering with his queen, he is seen in much the same costume. The other illustration, from the same quarter, also presents one attire in a very ornate dress, covered with various yet regular alternations of figures, and tastefully fringed down the side. It has also a broad border of embroidered work, consisting of a pattern of lotus and honeysuckle flowers, or of symbolical figures. The person wearing the dress is uncertain; but being found among the sculptures of Nineveh, the fabric represented is of unquestionable antiquity. The specimens before us clearly show that embroidery as practised among the Assyrians was of a more elaborate character, and in its patterns much richer, than any we are acquainted with from Egypt.

How far the Hebrews might cultivate such arts after they were settled in Canaan, we have no means of properly ascertaining. But as their general habits were such as grew out of the possession and cultivation of land, the probability is that they knew little or nothing practically of at least the higher kind of this skilled handicraft. They would perceive it to be hopeless to compete with their more artistic and commercial neighbours, whether in Assyria or in Egypt; and to the wants of these neighbours they would naturally repair when they sought the materials of finely woven and curiously figured or richly coloured garments. Hence, in Ezekiel's enumeration of the manufactory traffic of Tyre, while refreshments of embroidered work are twice mentioned, in neither case are they associated with the people of Israel, but merely with the old centres of such productions - Egypt and Assyria; the latter however, coupled with some related cities, Eze. xxviii. 23. The peculiarity too is noticed in regard to Egypt, of extending this taste for ornamental work to sails, which we know from other sources to have been their custom (Wilkinson, iii. 210).

EMERALD is the equivalent in the English version for נֵעַרָק (ne'ærāq), one of the gems in the high-priest's breastplate, and one also of the articles of Tyre's extensive traffic, Ex. xxviii. 18; Ex. xxvii. 18. But there is no certainty that this was the gem actually meant. Josephus and the Septuagint understood by it the diaphanous, carnelian, or Indian ruby—a gem of a fiery red colour. The emerald, on the contrary, is of a bright green, and was well known to the ancients. Gesenius expresses himself as unable to define anything respecting the precise import of the original.

EMERODS, understood to have been some sort of tumours with which the Lord visited the Philistines, on account of their indignity toward the ark of the covenant, 1 Sa. v. 2. Such, undoubtedly, was the ancient Jewish opinion; and modern conjectures on the subject deserve no attention.

EMMIM, a race of people distinguished for their gigantic stature and warlike proclivities, who originally occupied a portion of the territory to the east of Jerusalem, which afterwards fell into the hands of the Moabites; they were in existence so early as the time of Abraham, Gen. x. 10; Deut. ii. 9. (See Giants.)

EMMANUEL. See Immanuel.

EMMAUS, the name of a place, distant from Jerusalem about 60 stadia or 71 Roman miles. It is mentioned only once, and in connection with the interview held by our Lord and two of the disciples on the day of the resurrection, Luke xxiv. 13. But nothing is said as to the direction in which it lay, nor for what purpose the two disciples were journeying toward it. That there was a place of that name, and at the distance of 60 stadia from Jerusalem, is also noticed incidentally by Josephus (Wars, vii. 6, 9). The monks identified it with El Kubelsch, but without any valid ground; and notwithstanding that it lies at too great a distance, Jerome and Eusebius mistook it for the Emmaus, called also Nicopolis, which stood half-way between Jerusalem and Ramleh, on the Philistine border, but which is 20 Roman miles from Jerusalem—a proof, if how early a period all certain trace was lost of the Emmaus of St. Luke. Robinson has attempted to revive this view (Researches, iii. 65, 66).

EMMOR. See Hamor.

EN, or AIN, the Hebrew term for fountain, and occurring frequently in compound names. The word also signifies ego, and when applied to springs of water, was doubtless meant to denote these as the open, living eyes of the landscape. (See Ain.)

ENCAMPMENT. The word corresponding to this in Hebrew, habach (חכתב), is from a root that signifies to sit down, to pitch a tent, and is hence applied to any land or company presenting a regular and settled aspect—for example, to a nomadic party at rest, Gen. xxi. 21, or even to angelic bands, as seen by Jacob, who therefore called the name of the place where such appeared to him Mahattain, Gen. xxxii. 2. But in by far the most frequent use of the term it denotes the encampment of Israel as a body, or of its armed host when assembled for military purposes. Our word camp, which is the rendering usually adopted in the English Bible, corresponds to it in all those cases where the host assembléd was a strictly military one, but is stretched beyond its usual meaning when applied to the encampments of the congregated host of Israel. Yet it is of these latter alone that we have any detailed account in Scripture; of military encampments nothing but incidental and partial notices are given. During the sojourn in the wilderness, when the entire people had to be kept for many years together within a comparatively narrow space, it was necessary, for the sake of order and propriety as well as safety, that the several tribes and families should have their respective positions assigned them, and that as little as possible should be left to personal rivalry or individual caprice. As the tabernacle of the Lord, with its consecrated ministry and instruments of service, formed incomparably the most important part of the whole establishment, so these had fitly appropriated to them the central place. The tabernacle itself opened toward the east, not without reference probably to the east as the quarter of sur
ing, the region whence light perpetually breaks in upon the brooding darkness of the world; and hence the east naturally came to be regarded as the position of highest honour—those who occupied the first rank, both in the manner and the wider circle, were stationed on the east. Such was the position of Aaron and the priests (including also Moses in the narrower circle)—after whom were the Kohathites on the south, the Gershonites on the west, and the Merarites on the north, the other stem-divisions of the tribe of Levi, Num. iii. Outside this interior circle, at a considerable distance from the tabernacle, but still looking toward it, and having it in front (for they were to be all round about it) by the other tribes in order:—First, on the east Judah, having associated with him Issachar and Zebulon; on the south Reuben, with his associates Simeon and Gad; on the west Ephraim, with his associates Manasseh and Benjamin; on the north Dan, with his associates Asher and Naphtali, Num. x. Nothing is said as to the relative positions of the three tribes which severally occupied those four sides, as to nearness to the tabernacle, or juxtaposition to the division coming next in order. But the probability is, that as the particular tribe under which the other two were ranged, was to form the kind of advanced guard in marching, it would also, in ordinary circumstances, have the place of priority, both with reference to the tabernacle and to the line of march. Everything of this sort, however, must be in great measure conjectural; as is also the very common idea that the camp as a whole took the form of a square. It may possibly have done so; but there is nothing in the descriptions given which distinctly implies that, and the oval or circular form may just as readily be assigned to it. The more probable supposition is, that the actual positions would vary according to the nature of the locality on which the encampments were made; as this must usually have had a regulating influence on the subordinate arrangements. (For the specific charge in respect to the furniture of the tabernacle, and its distribution among the families of Kohath, Gershon, and Merari, see under the several names.)

In its ordinary and habitual state, the encampment of the children of Israel, being that of the Lord's host, and with the Lord himself symbolically resident among them, was ordered not merely, nor even most directly and prominently, with a view to the preservation of health, but for the sake of keeping up the impression of that sanctity, which it most especially beloved the people in all their relations to cherish and manifest. Some of the things prescribed were undoubtedly of a healthful tendency, such as the order to bury the dead outside the camp, Deut. xv. 21, and the carrying out thither all the refuse connected with sacrifice, and whatever was fitted to create efficacious efficacious efficacious un- cleanliness, etc. viii. 11. 12. viii. 11. But it is the incor- rectness of such things, in their symbolical and moral aspect, with the character of a region which ought in all respects to have reflected the purity and incorruption of Jehovah, which is assigned as the reason for the prescriptions in question, De xxiii. Hence not the dead merely had to be carried out of the camp, but even those who had come in contact with the dead, or had incidentally touched a dead bone, must for a time also take their place outside, till they had undergone the required purifications, Nu. 19. 14. 15. In like manner those who were afflicted with any issue, and persons smitten by the leprosy, were obliged to remove out of the camp, not from there being anything infectious in such disorders (for they were not properly of that nature), nor from regard to the general healthfulness of the congregation, but because of the defilement which they symbolically imparted to a region wherein nothing that defiled should have been found. Nu. vii. 3. 4. 5. 6. God was to be known by his people, and again made known through them, as emphatically the Living One, whose hand had been extended with death, which is the expression of his curse, or with the things which might more peculiarly be regarded as its signs and fore-runners. He must be known also and manifested as the Holy One, who cannot look on sin but with abhorrence, and in whose presence nothing should be permitted that bore on it the impress or image of corruption. And on these accounts especially it was necessary that the occasions and sources of defilement referred to should be excluded from the place which was hallowed by heavenly blessing, and the habitation of the people on whom he had put his name, under CLEAN, HEPHER (Kid, xxi. 1. LEVITICUS, xvii. 24).

The burning of the carcass of certain kinds of sim- ilarly these, namely, for the high priest or for the whole congregation without the camp, Le. xi. 21. le. xiii. had its reason in considerations essentially different, connected with the ritual of sacrifice. (See EX-OFFEREN.) And it was by no means, as very often stated, because of some special defilement attaching, or supposed to attach, to offerings of that description.

In regard to the military encampment of Israel in later times, as already intimated, we are without any definite information. Formed merely for the occasion, and as circumstances might admit, they could scarcely be brought under very precise or stringent regulations. They were pitched, as appears from the history, in any suitable or convenient situation that presented itself—sometimes on a height, Js. vi. 11. 18. xii. 5. 6. sometimes in a valley, Is. xii. 1. 2. and no doubt very frequently beside some copious spring or running stream, without easy access to which no force could have long subsisted in so hot a climate, Js. vii. 1. 8. 11. xxv. 13. 14.

That some sort of entrenchments or external defences would be thrown around the extremities of the camp, when it was expected to be located for a considerable time in one place, or was in danger of a hostile attack, may be inferred from the nature of the case, and also from certain incidental notices, Is. vii. 8. 10. xxxi. 5. 7. 8.

But on these and other points connected with camping operations in Israel, our information is extremely scanty, and nothing of any moment depends on them for the elucidation of the historical portions of Old Testament scripture.

ENCHANTMENTS. See DIAVINATION.

ENDOR (foundation of bow or horn), a town of Manasseh, though within the territory of Issachar, and situated at a considerable distance from Mount Tabor, on the south, Jos. xvi. 21. It is chiefly memorable as the place where Saul in his distress went to consult the female necromancer, immediately before the disastrous battle of Gilboa; but is also mentioned in connection with the victory of Barak and Deborah over Sisera, Ex. xvii. 7; Jos. iii. 11. It existed as a considerable village in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, but has long since disappeared.

EN-GOLDAI (foundation of two colored), a town in Menashe, supposed to have been toward the north of the Dead Sea—site not known. Not shewn on the Map.

EN-GANIM (foundation of gardens). The name of several places in Palestine. 1. A town of Judah, of which nothing is known. Josh. xvii. 15. 2. A town in Issachar, appropriated to the Levites, Josh. xxii. 5, generally supposed to be perpetuated in the modern Jenin, which lies about fifteen miles south of Mount Tabor, and which still has a fine stream of pure water running through it, and excellent gardens in its neighbourhood.

And a town of the same name is mentioned by Jerome on the coast of the Araba, near the town of Jericho, as shewn on the Map.
serving as a hiding-place to David and his men, when pursued by the hot rage and vengeful mirth of Saul. Caverns are still found there which have sides recesses that are capable of hiding in the closest secrecy hundreds of men; and from cliffs, separated by intervening gullies, men to this day hold such converse with each other, as David did with Abner in the ancient times, i.e., v. 11. Speaking of what occurred in this same region, a recent traveller writes: "As we were riding cautiously along the face of the hill, our attention was suddenly arrested by the voice of a shepherd, who was evidently calling to some one whom we could not see, but whose answer we distinctly heard. The dialogue went on. Another and another sentence was slowly and sonorously uttered by the shepherd near us; and as often the response was distinctly given. At length, guided by the sound, we descried far up the contronting hill, the source of the second voice in the person of another shepherd, and herded from our Arab attendants that they were talking to each other about their flocks. Between these two men was the deep crevice formed by the valley of the Kedron, walked in by lofty precipices which no human foot could scale. It would probably have taken a full hour for one, even as fleet and as strong-winded as an Assail, to pass from the standing-place of the one speaker to that of the other, and yet they were exchanging words with perfect ease."

(De Buckman's General Portfolio, p. 289.)

In times considerably later still than those of Saul and David, the primary hermits of Palestine, the Esseins, had their chief seat at En-gedi; and at no great distance from it stood the earliest Christian monastery of Palestine—that of Mar-Saba. But no mention is made of it in the history of the crusades. Only in recent times has attention been again drawn to the place and its remarkable spring.

ENGINES OF WAR. See Fortification.

EN-HADDAH [spring fountain]. A town on the border of Issachar, which has never been identified. Jos. xix. 27.

EN-HAKKORE [fountain of the crier]. A name given to Samson at a place where a spring burst forth in answer to his cry. J. xiv. 19.

EN-HAZOR [fountain of the village]. A fenced city in Naphtali, but site unknown, Jos. xvi. 37.

ENMISHPAT. Another name for Kadesh, ge. xvi. 7 (which see).

ENOCH [dedicated] occurs first as the name given to Cain's eldest son, ge. iv. 17; but it is chiefly associated with the son of Jared. He was the seventh in the chosen line from Adam, and his history is thus briefly recorded by the sacred writer: "And Enoch lived sixty and five years and begat Methuselah and Enoch walked with God, after he begat Methuselah, three hundred years, and begat sons and daughters; and all the days of Enoch were three hundred and sixty-five years; and Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him," ge. v. 22-24. The expression used to characterize the life of Enoch, "he walked with God," indicates the closest fellowship, and is applied only to another son of Adam, and he also an antediluvian patriarch—Noah, ge. v. 29. Later saints are often spoken of as "walking before God," or "walking in the ways of the Lord," but never explicitly as walking with himself. It is properly a paradoxical expression, and points to that state of primeval blessedness and purity when man could look unabashed on the appearance of God, and hear his Creator's voice as he walked amid the trees of the garden. Not that Enoch actually attained to the same intimate communion with heaven, but he nearly approached it; and as already in a sense with God, so God took him: it is not said where, but the natural inference is, to the more immediate presence of God—-to where the communion Enoch sought after and delighted in might be more fully enjoyed and more uninterruptedly maintained. Such a taking could not be a passing by death into another world, for it is expressly contradistinguished from the case of all the other believing patriarchs, who, after enjoying God's favour during an extended life, finished it by dying. Enoch, on the contrary, was taken by God as a living saint, he "was translated, that he should not see death," and this expressly because, in his walk with God, he had already obtained "the testimony that he pleased God." Heb. x. 37. Various ends were doubtless to be accomplished by this suspension of death in the case of Enoch. Taking place, as it did, in the comparative infancy of the world, when all revolution was embodied in the facts of history, it taught, by means of a palpable proof, the important truth that while, by reason of sin, God has subjected mankind to the law of mortality, he has not bound himself in every case to execute the law, that unbroken continuity of life may be occasionally granted as the reward of distinguished grace. It set, too, in the most emphatic manner, the seal of Heaven's confirmation and approval upon the faith Enoch had exhibited, and the kind of life he had maintained. And finally, viewed in connection with the growing wickedness of the world, against which Enoch had by his life protested, and the coming judgment of which he had prophetically announced, it proclaimed, as with a voice from heaven, the greatness of the evil that was proceeding amongst men, and the fearfulness of the gathering storm that was preparing to break forth on the world. It was already, in God's judgment, better to be taken from the world than to be continued in it as matters then stood, and still more as they threatened to become. Such considerations lighten the mystery of Enoch's translation, though they cannot be said altogether to dispel it.

No notice is taken in the history of any prophecy of Enoch; the only record that is found of it in Scripture is in one of the latest books of the New Testament—the epistle of Jude. There, speaking of the evil characters that were rising up in his day, and in their depravity and wickedness assimilating themselves to those of antediluvian times, St. Jude says, "Enoch, also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." It has been a question where this prophecy was obtained, or how it was preserved? Had it been handed down by tradition? Or did it exist in some ancient, though uninspired, apocryphal production? It is one of the questions connected with the history of the remote past, which cannot be quite satisfactorily answered. The words substantially exist in a writing of some antiquity which goes by the name of the Book of Enoch, and professes to have proceeded from that holy patriarch, but which is certainly apocryphal in character. A passage occurs in this book, which so nearly resembles the one found in the epistle of Jude that there can be no doubt that, if the two were rival and not a common authority before them, the one must have borrowed from the other. It runs thus:—"Behold, be ye kind unto one another, merciful, courteous; not repaying evil for evil, or railing for railing." It is possible that some common authority containing the words was in the hands of both—a writing of much higher antiquity than either the epistle of Jude or the Book of Enoch, in which the prophecy of that patriarch, though omitted in the genealogical abstract of Genesis, had found a veritable record. It is also possible that, however the knowledge of the prophecy may have been preserved, Jude did not borrow from the Book of Enoch but rather that the author of the Book of Enoch may have borrowed from Jude. For whether this author was a Christian or not, there is good reason in the book itself to believe that the author was at least acquainted with the character and pretensions of Christ, and spake of the Messiah in a way which no simple Jewish writings of the apostolic age, though written in the genealogical abstract of Genesis, had found a veritable record. This view has been well exhibited by Moses Stuart in his Commentary on the Apocalypse (v. 1. c. 32.). It is not, however, concurred in by the two chief editors of the Book of Enoch, viz., Dr. Laurence in this country, and A. G. Hoffman on the Continent. These writers both contended for the priority of the Book of Enoch to that of the epistle of Jude, as is done also by Dr. S. Davidson, and Enock [Elohim] Codex. But, Prof. Velmar of Zurich has lately deprecated this view, and has urged strong reasons for assigning it to the period of the Jewish impostor Barochesius, whose solution took place about A.D. 132., with whom Alford concurs. The first writer who refers to the book by name is Tertullian, at the beginning of the third century; in Irenaeus and Justin Martyr there are apparent allusions to some things in it. There is no real evidence of its existence prior to the Christian era; and that St. Jude derived from it the prophecy of Enoch is an assertion which is quite as plausible as that, viz.: also the Book of Enoch the Prophecy of Dr. Laurence, third ed. 1858; Das Buch Enochische Kabbalah, f. a, a, Z., von Andres G. Hoffmann, 1858 and 1859.

ENOC was also the name of a son of Madian, and of the eldest son of Reuben, e. xvi. 36. 39.

ENON, or E. NON [episina]. A place on the west side of the Jordan, near Sichem, not far from both Shechem and Shechem, where John for a time baptized, Jn. iii. 23; and probably ascended from the Jordan stream it passed. (See SAMAR.)

EN ROGEL [fountain of foil], called by the rabbinical Fuller's fountain, because fullers who trod the cloth with their feet need to frequent this fountain. The name first occurs in the description given in Joshua of the boundary line between the territories of Benjamin and Judah. Starting from the northwest border of the Dead Sea, this line went up through the mountains of Em-Shemesh, thence to En-rogel, and up the valley of Rimmon, on the south side of the Japhites, ch. xvi. It again noticed in connection with the rebellion of Absalon, as the place adjacent to the city where Jonathan and Ahimaaz waited to hear tidings of what passed within, 2 Sa. xvi. 15; also as the place near which Adonijah, when going to have himself proclaimed king, assembled his friends and made a feast, described by Josephus as being "without the city, at the fountain which is in the king's garden." (1 Ki. i. 33.)

The situation of En-rogel is thus plausibly enough fixed to be in the precincts of Jerusalem, and somewhere about the southern extremity of the valley of Hinmon. And there precisely is the site of what is now called by the Franks the well of Scheinahim, and by the natives that of Jebel-Eloheih Robinson describes it as "a deep well situated just below the junction of the valley of Hinmon with that of Jeho-daphath. The small oblong plain there formed is covered with an olive-grove, and with the traces of former gardens extending down the valley from the present gardens of Siloam. Indeed this whole spot is the prettiest and most fertile around Jerusalem. The well is very deep, of an irregular quadrilateral form, walled up with large squared stones, terminating above in an arch on one side, and apparently of great antiquity. There is a small rude building over it, furnished with one or two large troughs or reservoirs of stone, which are kept partially filled for the convenience of the inhabitants, over 125 feet in depth, 50 feet of which was now full of water. The water is sweet, but not very cold, and is at the present day drawn up by the hand." (Robinson, i. 116). In winter it is usually full, and sometimes overflows.

EN-SHE MESH [fountain of the snow], a spring which lay on the border between Judah and Benjamin, and apparently between Adonijah and En-rogel, ch. xxvii. It is usually identified with Jor-Hed, a spring lying on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, about a mile from the latter town.

ENGLISH: 80. BANNER.

EPÆNETUS, a Christian, residing at Rome when the epistle to the Romans was written, and designated by the apostle "the first fruits of Asia," ch. xvi. 3, as one of the leading authorities he has in that part of the Christian world, the most important people of Asia Minor, the first in that part to embrace the gospel on the testimony of Paul; but the precise place where his conversion took place is not more nearly defined.

EPAPHRAS, probably a member and original officer among the church of Colossae, mentioned by the apostle Paul in his epistle to the Colossians as "his dear fellow-servant and a faithful minister of Christ," (Col. iv. 12) also that laboured in prayer for them even when with the apostle in Rome, ch. i. 23. He is again mentioned in the epistle to Philemon, and is there characterized by the apostle as his "fellow-servant and a faithful minister of Christ," Col. iv. 21. On what special grounds he suffered imprisonment is left altogether unnamed; it may have been simply from his connection with St. Paul, but may also have been on the score of his own active exertions in behalf of the propagation of the gospel.

EPAPHRODITUS, an officer in the church at Philippi, and the messenger whom the church deputed to go to Rome with certain contributions to the apostle Paul for his support during the time of his imprisonment. While fulfilling the ministry he was seized with a dangerous illness, which for a time awakened the deepest concern in the apostle's mind. But he was again restored, and bore with him, on his return to Philippi, the previous epistle which the apostle addressed.
to that church. That Epaphroditus was a person of high Christian worth, and of singular self-denial in the labours of the gospel, is evident from the epistles Paul applies to him, and the whole tone and current of his remarks regarding him. Paul's passion for his servant:—first, De Wette finds in the epistle "a good deal both in the language and the ideas that is inconsistent with a Pauline origin." With respect to the former, it is now established as a rule of sound criticism that no argument can be drawn from the employment of words not used elsewhere by a writer (ἀργὰ λέγοντος), unless they are manifestly inconsistent either with the writer's style as gathered from his other works, or with the dialect of the age to which he belongs. So far, in the present instance, from their appearance existing suspicion, the scanty number of St. Paul's epistles, compared with the intellectual influence of the writer and the variety of subjects upon which he treats, renders it quite natural that in each of these compositions some such words should be found; as indeed is the case. And De Wette has not attempted to prove that those occurring in this epistle (such as ἐγκαταστάσας, ὧν ὑπάρχει, ἐγκαταστάσας, ὧν ὑπάρχει, ἐγκαταστάσας, ὧν ὑπάρχει, ἐγκαταστάσας, ὧν ὑπάρχει) are in themselves expressions which the apostle would not be likely to use. Under the head of "the foreign to the Ephesians," De Wette specifies the "demonology" of ch. ii. 2, and especially ch. vi. 12; the expressions, "foundation of the apostles and prophets," ch. ii. 2, "holy apostles," ch. iii. 5, and "my knowledge in the mystery of Christ," ch. iii. 9, as inconsistent with a proper spirit of humility; the "allegorical application" of Ps. lxi. 18 in ch. iv. 8; the "allegory" of the marriage bond as illustrative of the union between Christ and the church, ch. v. 22-23; the "hardness" of such admonitions as "Let him that stole steal no more," ch. i. 28, and "Do notrink with water," ch. iv. 17; with other instances of similar character. Objections resting merely upon the individual taste or private impressions of the objector it is impossible and needless to refute; and of this description are those just mentioned. To the "ideas" excepted against, corresponding or analogous ones may be found in the other writings of St. Paul; and if such could not be found, it would, as Olshausen justly remarks (vol. iv. 127), be simply a case of singular conceptions (ἀργὰ μανάς), which in themselves have no greater weight than singular words (ἀργὰ λέγοντος). The second ground of doubt in De Wette's mind is the alleged "verbosity" of the epistle, coupled with "great poverty of thought." In this common readers are not likely to concur with him. The fulness of the sentences and the complexity of the construction have indeed from the first been subject of remark with commentators; but this ornamental swelling of composition, and those grammatical difficulties, proceed, as in the parallel case of Thucydides, from the concomitance, not the poverty, of thought; the writer meaning to labour under the vastness of his conceptions, and heaping idea upon idea in his attempt to describe the blessings of the gospel. Thirdly, it is alleged that this epistle "presents nothing peculiar," and is little more than "a diffuse expansion of that to the Colossians." That, as compared with most of the other epistles of Paul, the epistle to the Ephesians is remarkable for the absence of local allusion or polemical discussion is true; and the reason of this peculiarity will demand our attention in the proper place. But the peculiarity itself imparts an air of originality to the epistle. Specific errors introduced by Ephesians first visit to Ephesus (1:19, Acts 19:1); some see, in the Works of Athenaeus).

The doubts thus suggested by the structure of our epistle might be dismissed, or regarded as of little importance, were the external testimony wholly without a flaw. This however is not the case. The Cod. B (the Vatican MS.) renders the words "at Ephesus," ch. ii. 1, to the margin, though it must be added that they are from the same hand as the rest of the MSS.; and Cod. 67 omits them, though the circumstance might be of little weight, did not passages occur in some of the early fathers which proved that in one of the MSS. they interpreted, the words in question were not found. Marcion, it appears from a passage in Tertullian (Ad. Marc. iv. 11), considered the epistle as addressed to the Laodiceans; and though the African father charges his opponent with systematic depreciation of the sacred text, it does not appear what doctrinal advantage the latter could have gained by the mere substitution of Laodicea for Ephesus: it is more probable that he actually possessed MSS., in which, to say the least, the words "at Ephesus" were omitted. That in the fourth century such MSS. existed is placed beyond doubt by an observation of Basil the Great, who, in his controversy with Eunomius (see above, p. 257), formulates a dogmatical argument upon the absence of the words addressed—Christians, he says, are in the epistle to the Ephesians called "the saints which are in Ephesus, and in Laodicea, and in Hierapolis," i.e., who derive substantial existence from their union with Christ the eternally existing Son; "for, so he continues, the ancients have handed it down to us, and we ourselves have thus found it in the ancient MSS."

It has been remarked, finally, as singular circumstances, that the name of Timothy, which is joined with that of the apostle in the greeting to the Colossians, ch. i. 1, does not occur in the corresponding passage in the epistle before us, and that it contains no salutations to individuals at the close. Various hypotheses have accordingly been framed respecting the original destination of the epistle. Of these which regard it as the "epistle from Laodicea" mentioned in Col. iv. 16 (Grot, Hammond, Mill, Wetstein, and others), is considered with insuperable difficulties. With the exception of the two MSS. above mentioned, all our existing ones have the words "at Ephesus," and ecclesiastical tradition is equally unanimous to the effect that the epistle was addressed to the Ephesians, for even Basil entertains no doubt upon this point, how could the real destination have been so completely lost sight of? or is it likely that it was preserved by the heretic Marcion alone and his followers? Nor does this hypothesis lessen the difficulty arising from the perfectly general character of the epistle. St. Paul, as appears from Col. ii. 1; iv. 15, felt a deep interest in the Laodicean church; he must have gained an accurate knowledge of its state from Epaphras, col. ii. 1, that no allusion therefore to local circumstances should occur in an epistle to that church is nearly as strange as that none should be found in one addressed to the Ephesians. The apostle's direction, moreover, to the Colossians, to "salute the brethren which are in Laodicea," col. iv. 13, seems incompatible with the notion of his having written an epistle to the latter at the same time, or nearly so; for why should he not have saluted them with his own pen? We must

Ver. 1. The person to whom it was addressed. Upon this subject a well-known controversy exists. Both on internal and external grounds critics have been led to question the correctness of the common tradition that this epistle was addressed specially to the Ephesians. With the single exception of the allusion to the writer's captivity, ch. vi. 20, it contains nothing of a personal or of a local character. Now when we recollect the length of time which St. Paul spent at Ephesus, the great success of his preaching in that city, and the trials and dangers which he there underwent, it seems strange that he should not have taken occasion to remind those to whom he wrote of what had passed before their eyes as he does in the epistles to the Thessalonians. To this must be added that expressions occur in the epistle which, at first sight, seem to imply that the writer was not personally acquainted with his correspondents. Such are, "wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus," &c., ch. i. 14; "since ye heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to youward," ch. ii. 21; as I wrote afore in a few words, whereby when ye read ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ," ch. iv. 1. (Did the Ephesians then need a written epistle to acquaint them with St. Paul's knowledge of the gospel?) So strongly was the discrepancy between the insertion and the contents of the epistle felt by some ancient writers, that the totally groundless supposition was advanced, that it was written by St. Paul before his conclude then that "the epistle from Laodicea" was one of the many that doubtless St. Paul wrote during his ministry, but which were not intended to form part of the canon, and therefore were permitted to sink out of sight. (See the remarks on the last epistle to the Corinthians, in the article on the Epistles to Corinthians.)

More plausible is the theory first suggested by Usher, that the epistle was a circular address to the churches of Asia Minor, but to none of them particularly. The prepossession of it rely mainly upon the fact of some uncial MSS. having omitted the words "at Ephesians," and suppose that a gap was purposely left by the apostle after the words οἱ ἔργαι, to be filled up either by himself or Tychicus, according as each church received a copy. Or it is conceivable that some copies were provided with names of places, while others, without such specification, were given to Tychicus, to be distributed at his discretion (Benson, Parops, p. 619). But the solution is too ingenious to be substantial. If the epistle was to be merely ecumenical, how can we suppose the author to have intended to alter its character by the insertion of particular names? or given Tychicus permission to do so? Or how can we suppose that the apostle would have extolled the faith and love of his readers, ch. i. 1, without knowing who the particular readers were? or affirm that he had "heard" of them, ch. 1. 15, without having in his mind a specific society of believers? Moreover, it is against the analogy of the other epistles of St. Paul, that the word ἐπιστολα should stand without the name of a place or a province following it.

Nothing remains but, deferring to ancient tradition and to the reading of existing MSS., to admit the correctness of the common designation of this epistle. At the same time, there can be no question of its ecumenical character. Under these circumstances, the most probable hypothesis is that the epistle was indeed inscribed to the Ephesians, but that it was intended for a larger circle of readers, and therefore purposely contained nothing but what was common and interesting to all. What this larger circle consisted of, whether the sister churches of Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colossae, or the smaller bodies of Christians in the immediate vicinity, or none of Ephesus, it is impossible to say; but the latter seems the more probable supposition. And thus Beza's observation, quoted by Harless (Einb. p. 25a, "Si quis nomen aut epistolas ipsis propriis missam epistolam quam Ephesum, ut ad eum ecclesias Asiaticas transmitteretur," may—if we somewhat limit the meaning of the word Asiaticas, i.e. to the daughter communities which had sprung up around Ephesus itself—conduct us to the right solution. At all events, the consistent tradition of the church must outweigh internal difficulties. These latter, too, have been somewhat exaggerated. About six years had elapsed since St. Paul's sojourn at Ephesus; time enough to bring about considerable changes both in the number of those to whom he had been personally known, and in the extension of the church beyond the limits of the city. It might well be, therefore, or the apostle might not unnaturally suppose it to be so, that many of the existing Christian communities were strangers to him personally, under which impression he might be induced to use the expressions which have appeared somewhat strange, ch. i. 1: iii. 2, 1. As regards the omitted salutations at the end, it is by no means the universal practice of St. Paul to append such to his epistles, as will be seen from the instances of the epistles to the Galatians and Thessalonians. The absence of Timothy's name at the commencement of the epistle may be accounted for either by his not having, at the time it was written, any special connection with its circle of readers, or by his absence from Rome on a temporary mission.

Time and place of writing.—The remarks which, under this head, have been made upon the epistle to the Colossians (see article), belong equally to that to the Ephesians, since the two epistles were manifestly written from the same place, and within a short time of each other. The remarks for preferring the imprisonment at Rome, Rom. xviii. 20, to that at Cesarea, Acts xxiv. 27, as the period during which both epistles, together with those to the Philippians and to Philemon, were written, it is unnecessary to repeat; for them the reader is referred to the article just-mentioned.

The question which of the epistles was prior in point of time has been largely set at rest by Harless, who, in his commentary upon ch. vi. 21, "But that ye also may know my affairs," &c., has shown that this expression can only be explained by a reference to Col. iv. 7, "All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you;" but that ye also [as Ephesians as well as the Colossians] may know my affairs, &c., Tychicus, a beloved brother, &c., shall make known unto you all things;" whence it follows that our epistle was written after, but very shortly after, that to the Colossians. The most probable date for both is A.D. 62.

Contents.—The topics upon which the apostle enlarges prove at a glance that the epistle was primarily intended for Christians of heathen origin, yet so as to lead believing Jews, to an insight into the spiritual meaning of the Mosaic pedil and ordinances. It consists of two main divisions—one dogmatic, ch. i.—iv., the other practical, ch. iv.—vi.

The apostle commences his doctrinal exposition with an exhortation of the spiritual blessings—election from all eternity in Christ, redemption through his blood, and adoption into the family of God confirmed by the sealing of the Spirit—which the gospel reveals for man's acceptance, ch. i. 3-4. Pressing then to the case of his readers, he declares that the apostle shall "be a pattern unto all that are in Asia," ch. i. 21. By way of enhancing the merits they had received, he proceeds to point out the inexpressible state in which they, in common with all men, were by nature, ch. ii. 13; a state from which nothing but the unmerited grace of God could have delivered them, ch. ii. 14-18. They were formerly outside the circle of God's covenant mercies, and lived without hope: now in Christ Jesus Jew and Gentile enjoyed the same privileges; the distinctions of theocracy had given place to the unity of the Spirit: while that temporary structure itself had merged in its antitype, the spiritual temple composed of living stones, built upon the foundation of the doctrine taught by apostles and prophets, "Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone," ch. ii. 20-22. To him (the apostle) had the special commission been assigned of announcing the admission of the Gentiles to every blessing of the promised salvation; let not then his present words discourage them, while he, for his part, would fervently supplicate God to strengthen and deepen the work of grace begun in their hearts, ch. iii.
The principal city of the Ionian confederacy, on the western coast of Asia Minor, nearly opposite the island of Samos. Besides the name by which it is best known, it bore successively those of Sambra, Thrace, Ortygia, and Buko. Its origin reaches back to a remote antiquity, till it becomes lost in legend. By some writers the Amazing are said to have been its founders, at which time it was called Smyrna. According to Strabo many people the first inhabitants were the Lesbians and Carians, who were driven out by the Ionian seditious led by Anthe- dus, son of Celus (see Cramer's Asia Minor, p. 258). In the New Testament it is remarkable as one of the principal scenes of St. Paul's labours, and as occupying a conspicuous place among the churches mentioned in the Apocalypse, Rev. vi. 11:

Situation. Two large rivers, the Hermus and the Macander, flowing from east to west, intersect the central portion of Asia Minor. The space thus inclosed contains two mountain ranges, following the direction of the rivers, Taurus to the north, and Messogia to the south, at an average distance from each other of about thirty miles. Between these ranges lies the basin of a third smaller river, the Cayster, which, after watering an elevated region called the Caysterian Meadows, passes through a gorge formed by the hills of Caleus and Paeicus, enters an alluvial plain of about five miles in breadth, of which the sea is the western boundary. Ephesus was situated in this plain, on the south side of the Cayster.

The city stood partly upon the level ground, and partly upon gentle eminences, of which the most important were Prius or Phion and Coressus, the former lying to the north-east and the latter to the south of the plain. The ancient town seems to have been confounded to the northern slope of Coressus, for Herodotus (ii. 26) tells us that on the invasion of Coressus (B.C. 560) the Ephesians placed themselves under the protection of Dana, by fastening a rope from their walls to her temple, which was in that time seven stadia distant, and lay nearer the sea, or rather the sacred port called Paniumes, which was connected with the sea by means of a canal, and which is now filled up (see Ephesus's Plan of Ephesus). In the lapse of time the inhabitants advanced farther into the plain, and built around the temple, and in this manner a new town sprang up, which subsisted until the time of Alexander the Great.

After the time of Alexander Ephesus fell under the rule of Lysimachus (B.C. 281), who surrounded the city with a wall surmounting the ridge of Coresus, and including that of Prius, the remains of which still exist. The port of Ephesus was called Paniumes, and the site is still marked by a swamp formed by the alluvial deposit of the river Cayster (Cramer's Asia Minor, ii. 36).

From an early period it seems to have been affected by disadvantages from this source, and Attalus Philadelphus, when succeeded to the rule of Lysimachus and his successors, endeavouring to remedy the evil, but his measures being injudiciously planned failed of success. Such, however, were the natural advantages of the site, that Ephesus rapidly grew in commercial importance, and in the time of Augustus it was the chief emporium of Asia on this side the Taurus. Here the Ionian proconsuls usually landed on their progress to their eastern provinces; and by this route the trade from Greece and Italy passed into the interior. Convergent roads connected Ephesus with the more remote districts in Thrace and Lydia, and on the south to Miletus (see Kupper's notes, A. D.). A district covered with pine groves, called Ortygia, skirted the shore to the south of the Cayster; and in the plain to the north of that river were several lakes, still existing, called Salinus. These lakes abounded with excellent fish.

Hoburg. The history of Ephesus presents little that is remarkable. Being founded by Androclus the legitimate son of Celus, it enjoyed a preeminence over the other members of the Ionian confederacy, and was denominated the royal city of Ion. The climate and country which the colonists from Attica had selected as their future abode surpassed, according to Herodotus (ii. 112), all others in beauty and fertility; and had the martial spirit of the Ionians corresponded to their natural advantages, they might have grown into a powerful independent nation. The softness however of the climate, and the case with which the necessities of life could be procured, transformed the sturdy inhabitants of the rugged Attica into an indolent and voluptuous race; hence they fell successively under the power of the Lydians (B.C. 560) and the Persians (B.C. 525); and though the revolt of Histiaeus and Aristagoras against the Persian power was for a time successful, the contest at length terminated in favour of the latter (Herod. ii. 27). The defeat of the Persians by the Greeks gave a temporary liberty to the Ionian cities; but the battle of Mycale transferred the virtual dominion of the country to Athens. During the Pelo-Ephesus, that some of these asylum... the enraged multitude in the theatre.

On the coins of Ephesus the γυμνασίων, ἀφθονίας, and Ἀσίας, frequently appear. (See Akerman, Num. Hist. p. 47-53.)

Acts and sciences.—In an intellectual point of view, Ephesus has but few claims to consideration. The two great painters, Apelles and Parmidas, were natives of this city; and among philosophers there occur the names of Heraclitus, summed the Ossian, and Hermodorus, from whom the Romans borrowed a part of their code. Antiquity makes mention of the poet Hipponax, the geographer Artemidorus, and Lyceus, an orator and historian. Ephesus, however, was one of the principal seats of those occult sciences of which Asia Minor, and especially Phrygia in after times, was the fruitful parent. The Ἐφέσιος ἡγουμένων, supposed to have been inventions written on pieces of parchment and worn as amulets, are frequently mentioned by ancient authors. To what an extent these pursuits always the characteristic of a depraved age, prevailed at Ephesus, may be gathered from Ac. xix., from which we learn the fictitious value at which the books containing the principles of the magical art were estimated. The first effect of a reception of the gospel was the renunciation of all such forbidden practices.

Religion.—The religion of Ephesus centres in the worship of "the great goddess Diana." The worship of Artemis, or Diana, as practised at Ephesus, was evidently of eastern, and not of Greek origin. Greek polytheism never would have conceived a representation of the goddess, "the image that fell from heaven," such as was enshrined in the temple at Ephesus. Instead of the superb Diana of the chase, this idol consisted of an image of wood, sometimes, as in the statue in the museum of Naples, with handsome features; it had many breasts, and was in shape like a mummy, terminating in a point which rested upon a rule block, and covered with mystic symbols. Upon the head was a mural crown, and each hand held a bar of metal. (See Ak. Num. Hist. p. 43.)

The whole was evidently symbolical of the productive powers of nature. Like the old statue of Minerva Polias in the Acropolis, the Ephesian image was an object of profound veneration.

This image was lodged in the most magnificent temple of the ancient world. According to Pliny (H.N. xix. 79), the temple of the Ephesian Diana was burned and rebuilt no less than seven times, the structure which he describes being the eighth. But since the three last temples occupied the same foundations, at the head of the Sacred Port, it is probable that the injury occasioned by the latter conflagrations was but partial, and that the temple was repaired after each, rather than rebuilt. These foundations were laid by Theodorus, about 500 B.C., on marshy ground, to obviate the effect of earthquakes; they consisted of immense masses of stone from Mount Prion, over which was laid a deep bed of charcoal and wool, well rammed down. The first temple on the new site was commenced about 500 B.C. by the architects Ctesiphon and Miconus. It was burned down in the year 490 B.C. The second temple, seventh of the whole series, rose upon the ruins with such magnificence as to inspire a fanatic named Herostratus with the idea of perpetuating his name by destroying it; which accordingly he effected by fire in the year B.C. 356, the same night on which Alexander the Great was born. The inhabitants exerted themselves to the utmost to restore the principal ornament of their city on a still more enlarged whole period, from the laying of the foundations to the completion, the date of which would thus be about 250

B.C. It was justly accounted one of the wonders of the world. It exhibited the most perfect example of the graceful Ionic style. In length it was 125 feet, and in breadth 229, so that it was the largest of known Greek temples. The columns, according to Pliny, were 127 in number, but as Leake (Asia Minor, p. 371) observes, this is probably an error, as the number could not have been odd. The words of Pliny are, "Columnae centum viginti septem singulae recubae factae," Mr. Falkener (Ephesus, p. 283) adopts the reading of those who place a comma after viginti, thus making Pliny say, "The columns are 127, seven of them the gifts of kings," which, besides rendering the number even, removes the improbability of the whole 127 having been royal offerings. Each column was sixty feet high, and thirty-six were edile, i.e., ornamented with inlaid metals.

The religious services of the temple were conducted by a hierarchy of eunuchs and virgin priestesses, the former of whom were called Megalyzæ and the latter Melissa, literally a swarm of bees, either from their number, or because the bee was sacred to Diana. A high priest, who bore the title of Essam, and sometimes Rex, preceded over the eunuchs, and the priestesses in like manner served under a superior. No arms were permitted to be worn within the precincts, and no bloody sacrifices were offered. In the decoration of the edifice the most celebrated artists were employed, and no expense was spared. The gates were ofypress, highly polished, and the roof of cedar; the steps leading up to it of vine. The altar was almost entirely the work of Praxiteles, and the sculptors Thrasos and Seusis lent their aid in embellishing other parts of the building. Perhaps the most precious of these monuments of art was the picture of Apelles, representing Alexander wielding a thunder-bolt, for which the painter is said to have received the large sum of twenty talents of gold, or about £3755 of our money. An ample revenue from endowments supported the splendour of the establishment; and so great was the security which it derived from its reputed sanctity, that both by the state and by individuals it was used as a bank for the safe custody of treasure. Of more questionable character was the privilege which, in common with some other Greek temples, it enjoyed of an asylum, within the limits of which criminals were safe from arrest. By Alexander this asylum was extended to a stadium, and by Mithridates somewhat further: Mark Antony nearly doubled the distance; but the abuses hence arising became so mischievous, that Augustus was compelled to abolish the privilege, or at least restrict it to its ancient boundary.

With such attractions, it is no wonder that the Ephesian temple became one of the chief centres of ancient polytheism. The Ephesians might without exaggeration boast that the worship of their goddess was celebrated throughout the world, "Asia xii.; and for their city no title was more eagerly coveted than that of Neoreum, or Apparitor of Diana; a title which, origi-ally denoting the menials who swept the temple, afterwards became applicable to communities, and was adopted by such as desired to place themselves under the patronage of a particular deity. The celebrity of the temple, and the vast concourse of devotees which thronged its courts at the annual festival, gave rise to a flourishing and lucrative trade in the manufacture of portable shrines, models of that in which the idol was enthroned; worshippers would naturally wish to carry away with them a memorial of their visit to socelebrated a spot. These shrines were made of wood, gold, or silver—most commonly of the latter material. As sacred, and a large body of workmen was supported by the manufacture. It was easy therefore for Demetrius, by representing to these men that the preaching of Paul was injuring their craft, to raise the violent tumult which compelled the apostle to quit Ephesus. The worship of Diana did not long survive the introduction of the gospel into Ephesus; as the purer faith prevailed, the former naturally sank into insignificance.

Nero is said to have plundered the temple of many of its treasures; yet in the second century it must have remained entire, since it then received some additions from Damianus, a celebrated benefactor of his native city. At a later period it was ravaged by the Goths and other barbarians; and so complete has been the devastation that no traces of the fabric have been ascertained with certainty, The stones were probably carried away to serve as materials for the rising city of Constantinople.

Remains, &c.—Of Ephesus it may emphatically be said that “the candlestick has been removed from its place.” Of few ancient cities, of equal size and importance, do scantier remains exist; and these it is by no means easy to identify. Of the existing ruins, the most detailed accounts are given by Chandler, who visited the place in 1764, and by Falkener, in his recent work, Ephesus and the Temple of Diana. Entering Ephesus from Ayasoluk, the former writer discovered on Mount Prion the remains of a stadium, resting on one side on the slope of the hill, and on the other, next the plain, on racks of stone faced by a strong wall. This stadium is 687 feet long. The seats, which were arranged in numerous rows one above another, have all been removed; and of the front only a few marbles remain, with an arch which terminates the left wing, and was one of the avenues provided for the spectators. Upon the key-stone of the back front is a small mutilated figure. This part of the fabric was restored, or repaired, when the city had declined in splendour and was partly ruined; for it is composed of marbles which have belonged to other buildings. A bas-relief, rudely carved, is inserted in it, together with several inscriptions, effaced or too high up to be read: besides, fragments some with Roman letters. Further on the side of the same mountain are the vestiges of the theatre. This building, the largest one of its kind ever constructed, measured in diameter 240 feet, and could accommodate 55,000 spectators. The seats and the ruins of the front are removed, but the pedestals and bases of the columns which once supported the portico still stretch along the hillside. Proceeding still in the same direction, the traveller arrives at a narrow valley formed by Mounts Prion and Corosus; and here on the slope of Prion broken columns and pieces of marble indicate the site of an odeum or music-hall. This, which was not a large structure, is stripped of the seats and naked. Beyond the odeum, the remains of a large edifice, one of the gymnasia of the city, are visible. Opposite the portico of the theatre lies a vacant quadrangular space, with many bases of columns and marble fragments scattered along the edges. Here probably was the Agora Civilis, or forum, round which were placed the courts of law and other public buildings. To the south of this Agora lies a mass of ruins, which Falkener conjectures to belong to the Agora Venusia, or marketplace of the city. A gymnasion appears to have been attached to each of the principal public buildings; the remains of the largest, long mistaken for those of the temple, lie at the head of the inner or city port, an adjoining basin of water formerly connected with the Panormus by the stream Salmus, but now a marsh. The best-preserved portion of the ancient city is the boundary wall of Lymanarchus, which may be traced from behind the stadium, over the valley and along the heights of Corosus, almost perfect until it ceases at a precipice formed by the abrupt termination of one of the roots of the mountain, on which stands a square tower, which tradition assigns as the prison of St. Paul. The quarries on Mount Prion, whence the white marble used in the construction of the public buildings was extracted, still exhibit chippings and marks of the tools.

The site of the great temple of Diana was for a long time a matter of controversy. "To our great regret," says Chandler, "we searched for the site of this fabric to a little purpose as the travellers that have preceded us" (Chandler, i. xxxiv.). Arundell (Visit to the seven churches of Asia Minor, p. 209) suggests that the entire remains of the temple are buried under the accumulation of soil brought down by the Cayster; an opinion comfirmed by Hamilton (Asia Minor, p. 27), who justly urges against it the facts that other ruins remain unburied, and that the soil in the vicinity is but little above the level of the sea. The latter traveller considers the massive ruins near the western extremity of the town, overlooking the swamp, to indicate the site; but Mr. Falkener has advanced weighty arguments for regarding these as the remains of a gymnasion. He places the temple at the head of the Port Panormus, a situation which on the whole accords best with the statements of ancient writers; but it is more distant from the city, between two rivers flowing from different parts, but both bearing the name of Salmus. In Falkener's plan, both streams are represented, the upper one flowing from the Cayster into a marsh on the north-west of the city, the lower connecting the city port and the Panormus. The question, however, can hardly be considered as definitively settled. (See Falkener's plan.) Nothing can exceed the desolation of the place. "A few unintelligible heaps of stones," writes Mr. Arundell (p. 27), "with some mud cottages unanted, are all that remains of the great city of the Ephesians. Even the sea has retired from the scene of desolation, and a pestilential morass, covered with mud and rushes, has succeeded to the waters which brought ships laden with merchandise from every country."

Introduction of the gospel at Ephesus. — It was in the course of his second missionary circuit that Paul first visited Ephesus. After his lengthened sojourn at Corinth, on his way to Antioch, he stopped at Ephesus, and, as was his wont, commenced teaching in the Jewish synagogue. He appears to have experienced a more than usually favourable reception from his countrymen, for they requested him to prolong his stay: a request which, wishing to be at Jerusalem for the feast of Pentecost, he was compelled to decline. Promising, however, to return should his life be spared, he set out. After a brief interval of repose, the apostle continued his third missionary journey, and after traversing the interior parts of Asia Minor (as described above) in the year 55, or, as some think, in 56, he once more arrived at Ephesus, A. D. 56. The first thing that engaged his attention was the reception of certain of John's disciples into the church. These disciples of the Baptist, who seem to have admitted the claim of Jesus to be the Messiah, but were satisfied with the baptism of water into repentance, formed a considerable body; and the time, and were only gradually absorbed in the Christian community. While twelve of them on this occasion encountered Paul, who, discovering that they were wholly ignorant of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and that the cause of their ignorance was that they had received John's baptism only, administered to them the Christian rite, which was followed by the imposition of his hands, and its usual accompaniment, the miraculous gifts of the apostolic age. The attention both of Jews and Gentiles must have been attracted by this occurrence, and for three months Paul was permitted to preach Christ openly in the synagogue, as it should seem with considerable success. At length the fanatical spirit of the unbelieving Jews threw such obstacles in his way that he was compelled to withdraw from them, and forming the disciples into a separate community, transferred his labours to a building belonging to one Tyrammus. For two years he taught there un molested, and since Ephesus was the great place of resort to strangers from all parts of Asia, the gospel became known throughout the provinces. After, as we have Remarkable manifestations of mirac- ulous power accompanied the apostle's preaching; even articles of dress which had been in contact with his person proved efficacious to heal diseases and expel evil spirits. The celebrity of these miracles induced certain Jewish exorcists, who, like modern fortune-tellers, travelled from place to place exercising their pretended art, to make use of the sacred name of Jesus in cases of demoniacal possession, expecting that results similar to those which followed from the apostle's invocation of the Holy Spirit, would ensue; but they were met with a signal disappointment. The unhappy subject upon whom they made the experiment, ended with supernatural strength, assailed them with such violence that they were glad to escape out of the house where the scene took place, "naked and wounded," A. D. 56. As might be expected, this produced a great sensation: the professors of magic and astrology, among whom, curiously to say, there were some believers, A. D. 56, felt themselves in The presence of a superior power; and stricken with remorse, publicly confessed their guilt, and gave the best evidence of their sincerity by committing the volumes containing their acts for the last 50,000 pieces of silver, to the flames. And now the growing influence of the gospel began to excite opposition from a different quarter, and the storm which doubtless had been long gathering, at length burst. Christianity, not less than Judaism, is the storm foe of idol-worship under every form; and it could not be extensively embraced without proportionately diminishing the number of the votaries of heathen gods. Christ or Diana, one must prevail, to the destruction of the other. The ancient superstition did not yield without a severe struggle: in the first instance, however, the opposition arose from interested motives. Demetrius, a silversmith, who employed a number of operatives in the manufacture of the silver shrines before mentioned, began to feel, in the diminution of his profits, the effect of the new religion. Summoning his workmen together, he first explained how the preaching of Paul was injuriously affecting their temporal interests, and then artfully appealing to their national pride, expatiated upon the contempt into which the worship of their patron goddess was likely to be brought. Having thus excited their concerns, he succeeded in gaining a hearing. He then addressed his audience that no one could dispute their intense veneration for Diana, and that in point of fact neither Paul nor his companions had directly spoken against the popular idol—a remarkable testimony to the admirable discretion with which the apostle pursued his labours. If Demetrius or his followers had any complaint to make, it was so far from the present circumstances being then held; let an information be lodged in due form. They had better disperse as speedily as possible, for the same government, always suspicious of breaches of the peace, was not likely to investigate the cause of the tumult, and to visit it, if proved groundless, severely. Reason prevailed, and the town became quiet. The apostle, who had desired to confront the danger in person, but had been dissuaded from doing so by the disciples, now seized the opportunity of carrying out his previously formed purpose, and bidding farewell to the brethren, took his departure for Macedonia. As far as appears from the inspired record, Paul never visited Ephesus again. That he had intended to do so may be gathered from Acts xx. 18; but the journey through Macedonia had been so prolonged that, if he was to accomplish his purpose of being at Jerusalem at the approaching feast of Pentecost, it was necessary to forego the intention. Passing therefore by Ephesus, on his voyage down the coast of Asia Minor, he stopped at Miletus, and from thence summoned the elders of the Ephesian church to a farewell conference. He reminded them of the trials and the labours which he had undergone during his residence amongst them, and foretold impending dangers of a still more formidable kind, "bonds and afflictions abidconfirms the view thus given at the outset of his tribal ascendency;—though not without such occasional variations as might seem to bring it for a time into doubt.

At the period of the exodus Ephraim numbered 46,500 men capable of bearing arms, while Mannasséh had only 32,200. But at the close of the wilderness journey the proportions were reversed; Ephraim then mustered but 32,500, while Mannasséh had risen to 52,700; the one having decreased by 10,000, while the other gained upwards of 20,000. This argues ill for the spirit and behaviour of the tribe of Ephraim during that trying period, as it must have been their singular share in the judgments sent to chastise impiety which reduced them so low. At the time of the conquest of Canaan they were the smallest of the tribes excepting Simeon. Yet even then nothing was abated of the high anticipations formed of the future greatness of Ephraim; for in the blessing of Moses upon the tribes, pronounced immediately before the conquest, while Mannasséh is coupled with Ephraim as together destined to share in the rich heritage of good settled on the house of Joseph, it still is with a marked indication of superiority on the part of Ephraim. After enumerating all the precious things which were in store for them—those of the heaven above and the earth beneath, of the sun and moon, of the everlasting hills, and the mighty deep—it is added, "His glory is like the splendour of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns, with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth; and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Mannasséh." De xxviii. 17.

Ephraim as a tribe showed no lack of faith in these prognostications of its relative greatness; indeed, the predominant sin of the members of the tribe lay in building too confidently on the prospects of material power and prosperity before them, as if these were to be realized apart from any moral qualities cultivated among themselves, and, as if by a kind of hereditary right, they might claim a certain superiority over the brethren. The history of the tribe, therefore, is marked fully as much by its overweening pride, its offensive arrogance, and disappointed ambition, as by the greatness of its achievements and the fertility of its resources. At the very first they got a degree of consideration beyond what their numbers might have warranted them to expect from Joshua, the commander of the entire host, having been of their number. But even he failed to satisfy their ambition; for after their inheritance had been assigned them, which possessed several mountain-ridges covered with forests, they came to him (apparently in company with the half tribe of Mannasséh), and said, "Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto?" They had been able, it would seem, to get possession of little more than the hill portion of their territory, while the rich plains of the district remained still in the hands of the Canaanites. Joshua, therefore, told them that they should not expect to hold the compact of the whole. He answered them, "saying, Thus art thou a great people, and hast great power: thou shalt not have one lot only; but the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood (or forest), and thou shalt cut it down: and the outgoings of it shall be thine: for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong." Jos xvii. 14, 15. What he meant to tell them was, that in having got possession of the mountainous parts of their territory, they had obtained a secure and strong position, from which, if but rightly used by the clearing away of the forests, and issuing in well-conserved suffices against the adversaries, would form a vantage ground from which to subdue the whole surrounding country. So it proved in reality: the mountains of Ephraim continued for many a day to be the stronghold and rallying place of the people against the common enemy. Elimelech, the Benjamin, when he sought to rescue his countrymen against Moab, "blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim, and the children of Israel went down with him from the mount," and utterly discomfited Moab, Jg xvi. 7, 20, Deborah, who next acted as a judge, established her seat in Mount Ephraim, between Ramah and Bethel, Jg xiv. 3, and within that hilly region the army was mustered with which Barak sallied forth and defeated the host of Sisera, Toba, at a later period, judged Israel in the same region, and Samuel, though of Levite parentage, was both in the place of his birth, and in his settled residence, an Ephraimite, 1 Sa iv. 1; 18 a, 12.

During that earlier period of Israelitish history the religious distinction of Ephraim kept pace with his political ascendency. Shiloh, which at the period of the conquest, was chosen for the seat of the tabernacle, was within the bounds of this tribe; chosen apparently more from its central situation, and perhaps from the security connected with the mountains of Ephraim, than from beauty of situation or associations of a more sacred kind. But for nearly four hundred years it continued to be the religious centre of the covenant people, where they met to celebrate the stated feasts and perform their vows to the Lord. The privilege, however, appears to have been little prized by the Ephraimites, who were rather prone to be proud of the distinction, than disposed to turn to proper account the spiritual advantages it afforded. Shiloh itself became a place notorious for its shameless depravity and corruption, and could not fail to exert a contaminating influence to the surrounding country. The natural fertility also of the region (when it came fully into the possession of the tribe), comprehending the fine plain of Eschelon, and some of the most select portions of Palestine, tended to foster the carnal spirit of the people, and gave rapid development to the worst features of their character. The result was that "God refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim; but chose the tribe of Judah, the mount Zin which he loved, as His dwelling place, clear as the indications were, that this selection of the tribe of Judah, and the sanctuary of Zion, was the determined purpose of the Lord, it seems never to have been properly acquiesced in by the house of Joseph, and in particular by the tribe of Ephraim. The haughty spirit of the people could not brook the personal rejection implied in the proceeding, and the consequent elevation of a rival tribe to the distinction so long held by them. That spirit had even broken out in jealous animosities andcontentious strivings against the kindred tribe of Mannasséh, when this tribe rose to a temporary supremacy under the prowess first of Gideon, and again of Jephthah, Jud xi. 1 sq.; xii. 1, sq.; much more may we conceive it to have chafed under the growing, and at length somewhat oppressive dominion of the house of David. Jeroboam, who headed the opposition that arose against that house in the time of Rehoboam, EPIPHRAIM was himself an Ephrathite, who had been raised by Solomon to be "ruler over all the charge or revenues of the house of Joseph," 1Ki. xi. 26.7. And we can have no doubt, that what gave such force to his future opposition, and tended most materially to perpetuate the decay it occasioned, was the opportunity thereby presented of evoking the old spirit of rivalry and inordinate self-puffation, which had poised itself in the tribe of Ephraim, and to some extent pervaded the whole house of Joseph. It would now be satisfied with nothing less than the establishment of an independent kingdom, which unfortunately came to be settled on principles that rend it, not only a blame in government, but an apostasy in religion. Ephraim's envy toward Judah grew into rebellion against God, bringing in his train manifold disorders in the moral and spiritual, as well as the political spheres; and as the final upshot the curse of Heaven came down, smiting the "crown of the pride of Ephraim," turning his "fat valleys" into desolation, and scattering the thousands in which he trusted to the ends of the earth. Instead of making good the ascendency it coveted, the tribe lost even the secondary place which would really have been its, according to God's original design.

EPIPHRAIM, WOOD OR FOREST OF. Mention has been made in the preceding article both of the mountains of Ephraim, and the forests upon them.
But what bears in Scripture the name of the Wood of Ephraim, a place rendered memorable from being the scene of Absalom's defeat and death, 2Sa. xiii. 6, must have been in a quite different region, on the east of Jordan, and not far from Mamre. David and his party are expressly said to have crossed the Jordan, to have pitched in the land of Hecten, and made Mamre their head-quarters, 2Sa. xvii. 25, 26, xviii. 2.

In that neighbourhood, therefore, must the field of battle have been, and consequently the wood in which Absalom met his death. Why a wood in that direction should have obtained the name of Ephraim is a matter of uncertainty. The idea has been suggested that it may have arisen from the slaughter of the Ephraimites by Jephthath, which took place somewhere in that direction (Stanley, p. 220), a not improbable conjecture, but incapable of being sustained by any historical evidence.

EPIPHRAIM, by or beside which Absalom had his sheep-shearing, and one may naturally suppose his sheep-pastures, 2Sa. xii. 23, must have been some place at no great distance from Jerusalem: otherwise an invitation to David and all the royal family to go and attend the sheep-shearing feast must have appeared either supremely ridiculous, or justly fitted to excite suspicion. Nothing certain however is known about it; but it has been, with some probability, supposed to be the same with that Ephrath in which our Lord withrowned when threatened with violence by the Jews, after the resurrection of Lazarus, Jn. xi. 54. And this again has been supposed to be the same with the ancient Ophrah of Benjamin, 1Sa. xiii. 17—a place about twenty miles north from Jerusalem, and perched on a conical hill.

It goes now by the name of Tel-Trephah (Robinson, 141; Stanley, p. 215). On the east, between it and the Jordan, lay the upper part of the Wilderness of Judah; and hence the evangelist John speaks of it being in "a country near to the wilderness." This is what seems to have been called in earlier times the Wilderness of Bethaven, Jn. xiii. 12...
personal feeling and affection with the varied exhibition of Christian doctrine—the freshness, the point, the fulness of instruction, consolation, and comfort, which the actual circumstances of the sacred penmen naturally imparted to their epistolary communications— all contribute to invigorate the epistles of the New Testament with a charm, and endow them with a value, which they could never have possessed if thrown into a more abstract and dignified form. Thus, finally, writing so originating and so constructed suited best the character of Christianity as a grand historical development: for we thus see how the seed of the gospel took root in the world, and how the mode of its distribution by the ambassadors of Christ, and the fruits bore among men, acted and reacted on each other. The epistles of the New Testament are in this respect the fitting complement of its historical books, that together they form the life-penurature of the gradual and progressive evolution of Christian faith, worship, and polity.

ER [prefatory] 1. The eldest son of Judah, who, for his extreme wickedness, was visited with excommunication. 22 xxvii. 22. 2. A descendant of Shelah, another son of Judah, 1 Chr. 4:2.

ERASTUS, the chamberlain of the city of Corinth, and one of St. Paul's converts there, 2 Tim. 4:20. The office he held was one of great dignity and importance; so that the conversion of such a man to the faith of the gospel was itself a proof of the wonderful success of the apostile's labours in that city. Erastus not only received the gospel, but became one of its most devoted adherents; he is mentioned as, along with Timothy, ministering to Paul, and accompanying him in some of his visits to other places, 2 Tim. xix. 22. The last notice we have of him represents him as abiding at Corinth, which probably continued to be his settled home, 2 Tim. ii. 26.

ERECHE, a city in the land of Shinar, and so ancient as to be connected with the name of Nimrod, 6 Ge. 10. By Jerome and the Targumists this place was identified with Blosa, in the northeast of Mesopotamia; but recent inquiry has taken a different direction. Colonel Taylor, formerly British resident at Bagdad, who devoted great skill and discriminating abilities to the geography of the Babylonian region, satisfied himself that the place formerly called Ochlas by the Greeks, and now known as Wasra, is the true site of the ancient city. Warka is situated on the Euphrates, 22 miles south, 43 east from Bagdad, and is celebrated for its immense mounds, which are believed to be the ruins of Ereh (Ezra's Nimrod, p. 69).

ESAILAS, so Isaiah.

ESARHADON, a king of Assyria, son and successor of Sennacherib, the same probably with the Sargon of Isaiah, and, as is supposed, with the Sargon of profane history, 2 K. xiv. 27; Is. vi. 1. (See Assyria)

ESAU, F.1001, the first-born of Rebekah's twin children. The account given of his birth is, "And the first came out red, all over like a hairy garment, and they called his name Esau," 6 Ge. 25. From the special attention drawn to his hairy appearance, one would suppose that the name Esau (אֶזָּע, or Ewaw, was intended to give expression to that quality. And so many learned men in recent, as well as former times, have held, though they are obliged to resort to the Arabic for the etymological explanation; a word very similar in Arabic, signifying hairy. The older Hebrew commentators, however, derived it from the verb, אָזָּע, to make hairy, and explained the word as signifying "made," or "complete," or "full-grown," viewing the hair as an indication of prematurely manly vigour. But the Jew at the present day seems more disposed to fall in with the other derivation (e.g., Raphael in loc.). The unusual covering of hair, which not only distinguished Esau as a child, but kept pace with his growth, and in mature life gave his skin a kind of goat-like appearance which, was undoubtedly meant to be indicative of the man; it was a natural sign, devoid of his very birth, by which his parents might discern the future man, as one in whom the animal, should greatly preponderate over the moral and spiritual, qualities of nature; a character of rough, self-willed, and untamed energy. From the word designating his hairy aspect, "Ewaw," it is not improbable, that the mountain-range, which became the possession of his descendants, was called Mount Seir; though it is also possible, that the rough, wooded appearance of the mountain itself may have been the occasion of the name. It was not long till Esau gave proof of the characteristic tendencies which were so remarkably to distinguish him from his brother: "The boys grew, and Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field;" of a roving and restless disposition, where the fulness of animal spirits, as Abarbanel judiciously remarks, impelled to seek excitement in change of scene and hazardous enterprises (Et. Jud.). One would have thought this was not the disposition or the manner of life that would have most commended itself to the peaceful, contemplative, and God-fearing Isaac; they were certainly very different from his own, and, if viewed by themselves, would probably have occasioned dissatisfaction rather than delight. But Isaac in his old age appears to have fallen into a kind of soft and luxurious repose, and Esau knew how to minister to this inmost of his aged parent by supplying him with delicate and savoury food. He therefore loved Esau, it is said, "loved him in preference to Jacob." Avarice, envy, and envy of all, with the desire of the very cream of life; he neither knew nor cared for anything better. His brother Jacob perceived this, and certainly took an unerring advantage of it. On returning one day from the field faint and hungry Esau found Jacob busy with a mess of pottage—a sort of dish prepared by boiling, and of much about the consistence of gruel. It is made of various kinds of grain, which are first beaten in a mortar. In the present case this was lentiles, or small beans, which Robinson tells us, are common in Egypt and Syria under the name of ḫāla. He adds that he found them "very palatable, and could well conceive, that to a weary hunter, faint with hunger, they might be quite a dainty" (Researches, p. 236). They were certainly esteemed such by Esau; and he said with eager desire "Let me have of that root"—xious, understood, pottage made of lentiles having a relish coherent, but Esau used no more words than were absolutely necessary, for he was faint, as he himself added, and on this account was impatient to be satisfied. Jacob then urged that he would sell him his birthright; he did not say for what consideration, but it was plainly with respect to the pottage, then in the power of his hand to give or withheld. This was so small a boon compared with what he sought that it seems strange at first sight how Jacob should have thought of proposing such an offer. But it is this very discrepancy between the price and the purchase, which, as proposed by Jacobs, discovers the insight he had obtained into Esau's character, and, as accepted by Esau, shows the predilection that sense with him had acquired over faith, the present over the future. Esau said, "Lo, I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this birthright do for me?" He felt as if his very life depended on the dish, as if he should presently die did he not get refreshment, and he might therefore throw the prospective advantages of his birthright to the winds. This seems plainly the meaning, and not, as some Jewish and also Christian authorities would put it, "I am ever exposed to death from my preconceived mode of life, and must soon die anyhow, so that I need not set so much by this birthright." Such a line of thought was quite alien to Esau's character, and implied too reflective a cast of mind. He looked simply to what was before him, cared for nothing but the removing of a present trouble and the enjoying of a pleasant entertainment. So much was this his temper that Jacob could not have set with him were word, but insisted on having also his oath. "Swear to me," he said, "this day; and be aware of him; and he sold his birthright unto Jacob. Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentils; and he did eat and drink, and rose up and went his way: thus Esau despoiled his birthright.

Whatever may have been included in the birthright here spoken of, the desire shown toward it by Esau was evidently meant to be characterized as the evidence of a light and reckless spirit, which brooked only of present things and temporal delights. So it is interpreted by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, who warns the churches against harbouring profane persons like Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright, He xii.16. And the same thing appears from the proverbial use to which the incident came to be applied in the current language of the East. "When a man," says Roberts in his Illustrations of Scripture, "has sold his fields or his gardens for an insignificant sum, the people say, "The fellow has sold his land for potage." Derided a father gives his daughter to a low estate man, it is observed, "He has given her for potage. Does a person by base means seek for some paltry enjoyment, it is said, 'For one leaf (leaf-fall) of potage he will do nine days' work.' Has a learned man stooped to anything which was not expected from him, it is said, 'The learned man has fallen into the potage pot.'" The very name given to Esau—the nickname, as it must be reckoned—on account of the part he acted in this memorable transaction, is also a conclusive proof of the light in which it was regarded by the ancients. "Therefore was his name called Edom"—El gib the Hebrew for red, which as embodied in the potage he so euphemistically pronounced and so earnestly desired. It was fixed on him, Mendelssohn justly notes, "as a term of reproach for his folly and sensuality." And because it was of such a nature, the designation Edom was applied chiefly to his posterity and land, while Esau was still regarded and used as his proper name.

In respect to the birthright itself, and what the two brothers conceived to be involved in it, it is impossible to speak very definitely. In the earlier history of the covenant-people nothing specific is connected with it, but the double portion in the father's inheritance, De xlii.17. And in respect to Jacob's own family the text specifies that his eldest son Reuben for his incontinence lost the birthright, which was given to the sons of Joseph, Gen. xlix.1; that is, the double portion in the inheritance of Israel, which is here resolved into the birthright, was on spiritual grounds taken from the eldest, and given to a younger son. But while this is all that seems to have been specifically connected with the birthright in patriarchal times, we cannot doubt that it would be associated, especially in Jacob's mind, with the more distinctive covenant-blest. He who had the birthright would naturally be regarded as stepping more peculiarly into the room of Isaac, and standing in a closer relationship to the higher designs and purposes of God. So that to despise a birthright which linked its possessor in some special manner to interests and prospects of so lofty a nature, was a manifest indication of a profane and gawbling disposition.

The brief notices that are given of Esau's subsequent history only serve to confirm the impression which this first-recorded act gives of his character. At the age of forty he took to him wives of the daughters of Canaan, "which were a grief of mind to Isaac and Rebecca," Ge. xxxii.24, 55; in this again showing his disregard of the higher considerations which should have been uppermost in a child of the covenant, and seeking only the gratification of his own carnal propensities. Such things should have awakened his father Isaac to the conviction that the more special blessing of the covenant could not be destined for Esau, and should have enabled him to realize the oracle that had been pronounced respecting him before his birth, that "the elder should serve the younger." But Isaac was himself blinded and misled by a carnal partiality, and so he fell into the grievous error of resolving to bestow on Esau the distinctive blessing—to assign him the higher place and destination that belonged to the person who stood first in the household of faith. The providence of God defeated the purpose, and brought Isaac himself to see that he had been culpably blind to the intentions of God's will in the matter. It was an act of procedure that, from its foul deceit, must have greatly aggravated the pain of the discovery. But of the fact itself, that he had purposed to bestow the peculiar blessing upon one who, by his whole life and behaviour, had clearly shown that he was not the proper subject of it, Isaac could not entertain the shadow of a doubt, and therefore the blessing pronounced unwittingly upon Jacob was irretrievably settled as his proper inheritance. Esau found no place for repentance (i.e. for producing a change in his father's mind, though he sought it carefully with tears; his own measure in divine things was now noted back to him, He xii.17.

We cannot wonder that Esau should have felt irritated at the part acted by Jacob in the matter of the blessing, but he should, like his father Isaac, have seen the hand of God in the turn things took; and knowing that there is no unrighteousness in God, he should have charged upon himself whatever grieved him in the actual result. Instead of this, however, he gave way to the bitterness of wounded pride, and vowed vengeance against the brother who had supplanted him, by determining, after their father's death, to take away his life. This led to the exile of Jacob to Mesopotamia, and his abode there for upwards of twenty years. Still, at the close of that long period Esau's revenge continued as strong as ever; and when he heard of his brother's approach to the family home he sallied forth with an armed band of 400 men, manifestly for the purpose of falling upon him and destroying him. But the cunning prayer and nobly fortified As it was by the tokens of love to his brother, which he went on before him in drove after drove of flocks and herds, fairly overcame the lion-hearted Esau; his rough but impulsive and irresistible nature yielded to tenderness under such touching manifestations of a brother's regard; and by the grace of God the two men met not again as in their youth they had often met in their father's tent; they fell on each other's neck and terminated their long quarrel in the embrace of brotherly affection, &c, &c.

The reconciliation thus effected appears to have been lasting so far as the two brothers personally were concerned. They are only once more mentioned in actual intercourse, namely, on the occasion of their father's death. Isaac lingered on till he reached the extreme age of 189 years, "and his son Esau and Jacob buried him," themselves at the time about 120 years old, Gen. xxv. 19. Before this, however, though it occurs later in the history, Esau had withdrawn to some distance from the district, which was occupied by Jacob after his return from Paddan Aram; "he went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob, for their riches were much more than that they might dwell together; and the land where they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle," Gen. xxx. 7. The country to which Esau, with his immense family and flocks retired, was the tract of Mount Seir, from which they gradually dispossessed the thinly scattered population that preceded them in its occupancy, and which they continued to hold for many generations. It was a region entirely suited to the nomadic and roving character of the race. But in regard to the relations between them and the seed of Israel, the remote descendants of Esau possessed less plant or power than their progenitor; for from the time that Israel left the land of Egypt, when the two families again came into contact, the superiority of Esau seemed to remember only the bidding quarrel between the respective heads of the races, and to forget the brotherly reconciliation. A spirit of keenest rivalry and sibilant characterised their procedure toward Israel; through many a bloody conflict they strove to regain the ascendancy which the decease of Heaven had dis-enriched in the other direction; and in the times of Israel's incredulity and weakness, they showed themselves ever ready, according to the prophetic word of Isaac, "to break his yoke from off their neck," and to drive the evil to the uttermost. But it was a fruitless struggle; the purpose of Heaven stood fast; the dominion remained with the house of Jacob; and in the course of the Maccabean wars the children of Esau finally lost their independent existence, and became substantially merged in the house of Israel. The decree of Heaven, as we have said, had so fixed it; but that decree did not relieve itself arbitrarily, the preference for Israel and his seed was no senseless favouritism; from the first the qualities were there which inevitably carried along with them the superiority in might and blessing; while, on the other hand, in Esau's carnalism, sensuality, godlessness, the destiny of his race was already indicated.

ESDRAELO.N. Son JEZREEL.

ESDRAS. Son Ezra.

ESIK [i.e., the name given by Isaac's men to a well, dug by them, which the men of Gerar strove to obtain, Gen. xxvi. 25.]

ESHBAL [Esba], the name of Saul's youngest son, according to the first given in 1 Chr. xxix. 31, &c. It is another form of Ishbosheth, which means "son of XBOOLE." Both Ishbosheth is used for an idiom, as a thing that causes shame, Ps. xxxii. 7; xxxv. 26.

ESCOL. [i.e., brother]. An Amorite chief, brother of Manasse, who stood on friendly terms with Abrahah, and accompanied him in his warlike expedition against Chedorlaomer and his confederate kings, Gen. xiv. 20.

ESCOL. [Valley of]. A valley or wady in the south of Canaan, and the neighbourhood of Hebron, so called from the rich cluster of grapes which the Israelitish spies carried away from it, Num. xiii. 23. But as the name existed in the neighbourhood so early as the time of Abrahah, it is probable that the same reason which led the Israelites to apply to the valley such a designation, had operated also among the original possessors of the soil. It is to this day full of vineyards, and the grapes produced in it retain their ancient character. They are the finest and largest in the country (Layard, Researches, iv. 399.

ESHTAIOL [probably a rel'idat], a town, along with Zarah, allotted to Dan out of the territory of Judah, Josh. xv. 39. It was on the borders of the Philistine country, and was placed by Esarhaddon and Jeremias between Azotus and Akelon. It has long since vanished; but it was anciently noted as the place where Samson spent his youth, and the burying place of Manach his father, 1 Sam. xix. 25, 26, 31.

ESHTEMOH [read also ESITTEMEOA], a city in the hill country of Judah, 1 Chr. xxi. 19. It was included among the towns to which David sent presents, and must therefore have been a place frequented by him, 1 Chr. xxv. 8. Robinson has identified it with a village named Swatha, which stands a little over a mile west of Mount Hebron. In 1 Chr. iv. 17 it is connected with a person, Jiblah, as its father or founder.

ESSENCES [etymology unknown]. The name of a Jewish sect that arose nearly 200 years before the Christian era. Though they are never noticed in the writings of the New Testament, yet it is necessary to present some account of them here, as their views and practices are constantly referred to by writers who treat of the commencement of Christianity and the character of the gospel age. Some have even gone so far as to identify John the Baptist with the party, although the idea is without any real foundation, and is likely to meet with few advocates in the present day. The information that has come down to us upon this peculiar sect is of a somewhat fragmentary character, and not perfectly consistent with itself. What is stated respecting the party by one writer does not entirely harmonise with what is stated by another. Hence, indeed, one of these writers, could hardly be expected to be very minutely acquainted with the fraternity, and accordingly his brief account of their peculiarities must be taken with some qualification. Speaking of the Dead Sea he takes occasion to say, "On its western shore dwelt the Essenes, at a sufficient distance to escape what is noxious in its vapours. They are a solitary class, and indeed the most wonderful people in the world—without wives, abstaining from sexual intercourse, without money, associating only with palm-trees. Their numbers are replenished by fresh accessions daily, many repairing to their settlements when the returns of fortune have rendered weary of life, and inclined to their manners. Thus it comes to pass, what might seem incredible, that a community in which no one is born, yet continues to subsist for centuries" (Nat. Hist. i. 9. 10). Comparing this with the fuller account of Josephus, we find that what is said respecting marriage held only of a portion, not of the whole of the Essenes; the stricter part alone abstained from it. He says expressly that there was an order among them who "agreed with the rest as to their way of living, and customs and laws, but differed from them in the point of marriage." They did so, he adds, because to abuse marriage were to cut off the principal part of human life, and, if all were to follow the same course, the "whole race of mankind should fall" (War ii. s. 1 s. 11). The practice of celibacy was so alien to the spirit of the Hebrew polity, that it is matter of surprise any party, or even section of a party, should have arisen within its pale who embraced that form of asceticism, and constituted it a special ground of merit. It plainly indicated the influence of a foreign teaching upon their mind, commingling with that of Moses, and leading them to entertain ideas of perfection which found no commensurate in the law and the prophets. That influence, there can be no doubt, was derived from the oriental philosophy, which with its fundamental doctrine respecting the inherent evil of matter, led men, wherever its spirit prevailed, to aspire after an ethereal virtue by working themselves free from corporeal affections, rising above the aweful wants of nature, and the ordinary relations of life. Hence, in their religious belief, the body was regarded as the prison-house, rather than the temple and instrument of the soul (Jos. War. ii. s. 1 s. 11).

This spirit, however, though it had its share in moulding the views and practices of the Essene fraternity, was kept in check by another—the reverence for the teaching of Moses. He was their paramount authority: "what they most of all honoured," says Josephus, "after God himself, is the name of their legislator, whom if any one blaspheme, he is punished capitaly." Yet, like mystics generally, they used great freedom with the prescriptions of the authority they professed so rigidly to follow; and, if viewed with respect to the letter of the command, their mode of life seemed to be as remarkable for its disregard of some of the institutions of Moses, as for its compliance with others. Their system was a compound of the mystic and ceremonial elements, jumbled together in a manner that appears arbitrary and inexplicable. If any part of the Mosaic legislation might be regarded as more explicit and binding than another, it is the Euphrates respecting attendance at the stated feasts and the presentation of sacrifices at the temple. Yet the Essenes took no part in those. They sent offerings to the temple, for the purpose probably of discharging their stated and hereditary obligations as Jews, but not, as Josephus expressly states (Ant. xiv. 11. 1. 5), "for the presentation of sacrifices, because they have (i.e., think they have) purer instructions of their own; on which account the adds) they are excluded from the common court of the temple, but offer their sacrifices themselves." The passage of Philo, in which he represents them as not sacrificing animals, but dooming it incumbent to present their minds as holy offerings (op. Orig. p. 17, n. 14), "as in accordance with the nature and character of human sacrifices (περὶ ἀγώνων, περὶ τινὸς σοφίας καταλήγων, § 12), most either have proceeded on a mistake, or, as N confer (Ant. xiv. 11. 1. 5), not only import that they laid the chief stress upon the spiritual element in sacred worship—accounted the outward service nothing apart from the preparation and service of the heart. They therefore offered the local sacrifices, but not after the legal manner—not in the place which God had chosen from this: they stood abed on account of the delictum which they conceived it to be ever contracting from the multitude of impure worshippers who trod its courts. They claimed it better, more in accordance with the spirit of the Mosaic legislation, to remain by themselves, and sacrifice within the holier sanctuary of their own dwellings. How, indeed, could the stricter Essenes mingle in the common crowd of the temple-worshippers, when they looked upon even the juniors in their own select fraternity as so far beneath them, that if they accidentally came into contact with these, they thought it needful to wash themselves, as if they had been defiled by the touch of a foreigner (Jos. War. ii. s. 1 s. 11).

But while thus in one direction scrupulously enforcing the restraints of monasticism, and in many of their regulations freely chalking out a path for themselves, the Essenes in other things belonged to the strictest sect of ceremoniasts. They knew nothing of the liberty of the gospel, nor had they ever penetrated through the shell into the spirit of the Mosaic legislation. They adhered, for example, so rigidly to the letter of the law of the Sabbath, that they would kindle no fire, nor allow any food to be prepared on it; they would never partake of victuals except such as had been cooked by the hands of their own fraternity; nay, counted it such a pollution to do so, that death was to be preferred instead; they religiously abstained from spitting, especially on the right side; they betook to corporeal ablations whenever they happened to receive the touch of an unclean person, or even (as has just been stated) of one belonging to an inferior grade in their own party; such slaves were they to form, and so much did externalism encircle and overlay their mysticism.

There were, however, amid all these peculiarities, traits of excellence in the Essenes as a body, which honourably distinguished them from the mass of their countrymen, and must have greatly tended to win for them the esteem and admiration of thoughtful minds. Notwithstanding their formal separation from the temple, they were most regular and frequent in their exercises of devotion; every day was begun before sunrise with prayer and praise; every meal was hallowed with grace before and after meat; and so religiously did they adhere to the truth, that they disallowed the use of cares: "for they say, that he who cannot be believed without swearing by God, is already condemned." They were also distinguished for their temperance in food, having only one dish set before them at each meal; for their habits of industry, spending the hours of the day (except in so far as required for devotion, childbirth, and refreshment) in some kinds of handiwork and labour; for their unselfish and brotherly spirit, having all things in common, and making it a part of their stated employment to relieve the wants of the discussed. They were not only lovers of peace, but were on principle opposed to war, and abstained from any of the arts that ministered to its use. Great strictness was observed in admitting members. The applicant was obliged to live one whole year outside the community, but practising its rules, and receiving as laborers, an axe, an apron, and a white garmant. On the first day of one year well, he was permitted to share in the distributions, but not in the common repasts and meals. And after another probation of two years, he was admitted as a full member, and being so was taken solemnly bound to exercise piety toward God, to observe justice toward men, to hate the wicked and assist the righteous, himself to injure none, to speak the truth, avoid theft and robbery, and keep the rules and secrets of the society. If any of their members fell into flagrant sin, they were expelled from the community, and sometimes were allowed to perish for want, or, if received back, it was only when they were suffering the last extremities of hunger. By their general spirit and moral discipline they were a witness against many of the more crying iniquities and corruptions of the time; but they had neither depth of discernment nor largeness of view to work out anything like a thorough practical reformation, or bring in a spiritual religion.

Their numbers have been variously estimated. Both Philo and Josephus speak of four thousand of them being in Syria and Palestine; but this number seems only to include the stricter portion of the sect. Engel appears to have made the counts of their settlements; but they were also scattered through some of the more desert parts of Palestine, and occasionally appeared in cities. For the most part, however, they were to be found in solitude; and by the very nature of their asceticism, they were excluded from the haunts and intercourse of ordinary society. This sufficiently explains the absence of all notice of them in New Testament scripture; and it shows, at the same time, how far the spirit, not only of Jesus Christ, but even of John the Baptist, was unknown from that of the Essenes. In his regard of the world, his severe discipline of his simple members, his severe denunciation of the corruptions of the times, John might be said to have something in common with them. But in his insight into the mind of God, his exaltation above the letter of a rigid ceremonialism, his free and energetic working upon the masses around him, he stood on a greatly higher level than the Essenes, and belonged indeed to an entirely different school—the school of men who receive their teaching directly from heaven.

Some of the Essenes, it is understood, embraced Christianity; and the Essene mentioned by Epiphanius (Iren. xi.) was probably but another form of Essene.

ESTHER, BOOK OF

This is the shortest of the historical books in the Old Testament, with the exception of the book of Ruth, from which however it differs, as having reference to more than a mere family history, being, in truth, the account of the preservation of the whole Jewish nation from destruction.

The story of the principal transactions is "Shushan the palace," namely the royal city of Susa; the date is the reign of Ahasuerus, king of Persia. Without encroaching upon the article Artaxerxes Nebuchadnezzar, it is necessary to speak of the different opinions which have prevailed as to the individual monarch designated by this name. A very wide difference of opinion has existed; but now the probability is admitted, almost if not absolutely by unanimity, to be that either Artaxerxes Longimannus, who reigned from B.C. 464 to 421, or his father Xerxes, who reigned from B.C. 485 to B.C. 464, must be the person meant. The chronology of our English Bible indeed adopts the opinion that he is the father of Xerxes, Duria L., who acceded the throne in B.C. 521. But Duris has in Scripture a well established name of his own; and to apply the title Ahasuerus to him is only to bring confusion into the history, whereas the Hebrew form of the name, Ahsheveros, answers to the term in the old Persian inscriptions which has been deciphered by modern scholars, and identified with the name which the books referred to Xerxes; of which, again, it is no violent supposition to regard Artaxerxes as a modification or abbreviation. Those who make Duris to be this king Ahasuerus consider his favour for the Jew-account of his wife Esther to the explanation of his friendly intercourse in the matters of the Jews, as related in the book of Esther. But precisely the same use may be made of the first mention of Artaxerxes (in Hebrew, Artachashshanu, as related in the seventh chapter of that book, who is identified with Artaxerxes Longimannus by most critics, though by some identified with Xerxes; so that we should be brought back to the very two monarchs, one or other of whom has been generally, and by almost all important authorities, esteemed the Ahasuerus of Esther. Possibly the chronology of our English Bible may seem to suit best with the statement, etc., "In Shushan the palace, there was a certain Jew whose name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite, who had been carried away from Jerusalem, with the captivity which had been carried away with Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away. And he brought up Hadassah, that is, Esther, his uncle's daughter. "Jeconiah's captivity took place about B.C. 590 or 587; and if Mordecai was then carried captive, the earliest date which can be assigned is the most natural. But the language is ambiguous, according to the Hebrew idiom, quite as much as the English, and may be understood to assert either that Mordecai, or that his great-grandfather, was the person carried away; and other cases of analogous ambiguity occur in Scripture. Hence no weight is to be given to this passage as if it determined the chronology.

Modern critics have in general inclined to think that Xerxes was the Ahasuerus of this book; and such eminent men of the last and the present generation as John, Gesenius, When, Havernick, Rittinger, and Keil, are witnesses to the agreement in this point of different schools of thinking. The character of the monarch described in Greek history which tallies well with the description in this book of Ahasuerus, as vain, imperious, sensual, cruel, thoughtless, and under the influence of favourites, yet not incapable of feelings of compunction and sympathy for his subjects, whom he had been the instrument of oppressing or otherwise injuring. The notices of this, such as they are, may also be easily adjusted to the known course of events in Xerxes' reign. The most memorable event in it was his expedition into Greece, with an armament of such magnitude that the details presented by historians would be rejected as incredible but for the overwhelming strength of evidence in their favour. This expedition is plainly indicated in the prophecies of Daniel, ch. xii. 2. And though it is not spoken of directly in this book—whose narrative is strictly confined to the one great subject of which it treats—not the enormous feasting "to all his princes and his servants, the power of Persia and Media, the nobles and princes of the provinces, being before him; when he showed the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honour of his excellent majesty," during an entire half year, in the third year of his reign, ch. 3, 4, 5, would be the natural prelude to his vast expedition, as it would be in exact conformity with the account which Herodotus gives of feasting during the course of it. Again, Vashti the queen was divorced at this time; but Esther was not made queen till the tenth month of the seventh year of his reign, ch. ii. 16. This delay might surprise us, did we not know that during a great deal of the intermediate period Xerxes had been absent on the Grecian expedition, on returning from which, we also know that he plunged into every excess of voluptuousness, on purpose to bury his disgrace in oblivion. Moreover, the attempt has been often made since the time of Scaliger, to identify Esther with his queen Amestris, on account of a certain similarity of the names, and also on account of a presumed similarity of characters. But we reject the imagination that Esther was cruel and vindictive, as Amestris notoriously was, and since the characters are so opposite, the likeness of the names is not evidence on which to rest. And, moreover, the supposed identity is negatived by the express testimony of common history, that the father of Amestris was Oanes, a Persian, not a Jew; and that she was married to Xerxes so long before the Grecian expedition, as to have a son by that time of marriageable age, and therefore born years before Xerxes ascended the throne.

While the prevailing opinion is thus in favour of Xerxes, even without strain of the evidence by such weak arguments as the name of his wife, there are still critics of good authority who prefer to believe that the monarch in this book is Artaxerxes. They have certainly the advantage of early tradition on their side, namely, the authority of the Septuagint, and of the writer or writers of the apocryphal additions to the book, and of Josephus.

The age in which this book was written would be determined more easily if we had the least trace of the authorship. But this we have not. The only testimony of a very direct kind either of these points, is at the end of the apocryphal edition, that it was brought into Egypt by Dossithen in the fourth year of Ptolemy (generally supposed to be Philometor) and Cleopatra, or about B.C. 185. But we do not know how much credit is to be attached to declarations in these concluding notices; nor, granting the accuracy of this one, does it appear to apply to our eternally book of Esther; nor yet, though it should apply to that, would it point to anything more than the date of the Greek translation. We are willing indeed have inferred that not one other than Mordecai was the author, and in proof of this has appealed to the language of the book itself, ch. ii. 24, 25, 32, while others have alleged that a connected reading of this passage furnishes internal evidence that Mordecai was not the author. For this latter assertion we see no warrant whatever; but we also maintain that the other is at least not decisively supported by the verses quoted. The Talmud asserts that Ezekiel, the twenty (minor) prophet, Daniel, and Esther, were written by the men of the great synagogue. But if we are to attach any weight to this testimony, as we are willing to do, it is difficult to take the words in any other sense than that for which Hillel contends, that these men "wrote it" into the canon. And as the last of these, Simon the Just, was high-priest about B.C. 310-291, this tradition would imply that at the very latest it was received into the canon by that time, but without giving even a hint how much earlier, far less a hint of its date of composition. There would be little advantage gained by detailing the conflicting statements of the Christian fathers and the Jews of the middle ages.

As for internal evidence, this is a very uncertain guide. On the strength of it John asserts that the book must have been written before the fall of the Persian monarchy, B.C. 330, and probably soon after the facts which it records. Do Wette, again, assigns it to the period of the Greek monarchy in Syria, which was not founded till B.C. 312, and continued till about half a century before the birth of Christ. There can be no question that the writer either actually lived during the Persian monarchy, or else, if he lived later, had made that period the subject of his careful study; for the most microscopic investigation has resulted in the assured conviction of his intimate knowledge and accurate description of Persian life, both in its domestic features and in its political aspects. In choosing between these two opinions, again, it is undeniable simpler to suppose that he lived in the period which he has described with such accuracy, especially as he has referred to the registers or chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia in such a manner, ch. x. 2, as implies that they were well known and commonly accessible to his readers, which they were less likely to be after the Persian monarchy had been overthrown by that of Alexander and his successors. There are only two considerations which seem to have any weight in favour of a later age, though neither of them is really of importance. The one is connected with the language, as it is said to bear the marks of a period of greater corruption and decay than that in which Ezra and Nehemiah were written. To this the simple reply is, that there has been a great deal of rashness displayed in drawing inferences with such confidence, from such extremely narrow premises; but that a calm examination gives evidence of a style of language not seriously differing from that of these two books. In some respects we might say that it is purer and better; in others, in which it is worse, this deterioration might be a proof, not that the writer lived in a later age, but that he lived among the Persians, whose language belonged to a totally different class from the Semitic, which includes both the Hebrew and the Chaldee, as these appear mingled in Ezra and Daniel. The other consideration is, that Persian customs are explained, as a writer might be expected to explain them, not while they were in use, but after they had passed away and become forgotten. Yet the instances of this are few and uncertain, namely, ch. iv. 11, 18, about the king reigning from India to Ethiopia over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, no very great explanation, and necessary perhaps to distinguish this Xhasanerns from another and earlier one, the father of "Durins the Median," with whom, in spite of this distinctive characteristic, he has been confounded; and, ch. xiii, "Then the king said to the wise men which knew the times (for so was the king's manner towards all that knew time and judgment; and the next unto him was Carshena, &c., the seven princes of Persia and Media, which saw the king's face, and which sat the first in the kingdom) words that are chiefly descriptive of a habit of this individual king, and which, in so far as they speak of the seven princes who saw the king's face, certainly do speak of this in order to explain a fact that was familiarly known to everybody. Should the traces of explanation prove even more distinct than they seem to be, it is easy to see how natural this would be in a writer who conceived his book for the use of the covenant-people scattered throughout regions in the remotest parts of the Persian empire, and even beyond its limits.

There have been objections made to the canonical authority of this book, but without substantial reason. Modern critics, at least in Germany, may have been influenced by some depreciatory remarks of Luther. But some of these are incorrectly quoted or misunderstood, as has been shown by Hertz and in respect of one passage, where he seems to say that it is more worthy of being excised from the canon than the two apocryphal books of Enoch, Judith, and Susannah, and the Dragon, granting that this cannot be explained, we should still have to say that it deserved no more deference than the rash depreciation of the epistle of James to which at another time he gave utterance, of ancient authority for its exclusion from the canon, there is nothing worthy of notice. The fact of its not being mentioned by the Jewish writer Philo, would be an equally strong argument against eight or nine other books of the Old Testament; and an argument from the silence of the New Testament adepts of a similar reply. There is not a shadow of proof that it was absent from the canon acknowledged by the Jewish church in the time of our Lord, and accepted by him and his apostles. The only early Christian writer whose silence might cast a doubt on its reception by the church, is Melito, Bishop of Sardis, A.D. 170, in whose list it does not occur. But there are grounds for thinking that, under the name of Ezra, he included our three books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. The fact in reference to the Jews is, that they esteem this book of Esther nearly as much as the Mosaic law; and account of the description which it gives of the signal vengeance taken on their enemies, and the favour which was lavished on Mordecai and Esther, and through them on the whole people of the Jews. They could not entertain the notion that this unwavering train of events could be ascribed to anything else than the special providence of God watching over his own people according to his promises, and making men feel that those who touched those touched the apple of the eye, as it were, and were destroyed; and those who will not receive such a doctrine any driven, like De Wette, especially in his earlier writings, Bosh, Ewald, and some others, to take refuge in an assertion from which others of a kindred sceptical tendency have shrunk, to assert that the book is a fictitious narrative. But this is a monstrous supposition, since the great event, and that which chiefly might occasion difficulty, is abundantly confirmed by the observance of the feast of Purim, with especial honour, by all Jews throughout the world. It could not be an unparalleled event if this feast originated in and rested on mere fable; all the more so it is well known that serious difficulties were felt and expressed by many Jews at the introduction of a feast which was unknown to the law of their fathers; these scruples can have been overcome by nothing less than the marvellous nature of the deliverance experienced. And we know from 2 Mac. xx, 36, that "the day of Purim" was already a feast observed on the fourteenth day of the month Adar, in the time of Judas Maccabees; and we may contrast the early form and lasting hold which this feast of Purim has had upon the Jewish people, with the entire oblivion of the festival in memory of the death of Nieman on the previous day, though so holy and so popular a hero of the faith as Judas Maccabees established it by a common desire of the people who supported him. No other instance can be produced of a sacred feast being established among the Jews posterior to the age of Moses, when they conquered the land of Canaan; and it is impossible how this could have been universally received by them after their dispersion, unless there had been a felt unquestionable divine authority for its institution. Ewald's supposition, that it came instead of the passover, as arbitrary and unsupported as many of his other hypotheses.

The objections that have been felt by some minds to the canonical authority of the book have had their rise in either its matter or its form. As for the matter, some have spoken of the importance attached to such outward things as the refusal of Mordecai to bow and do reverence to Haman, and the three days' fasting before Esther would go into the presence of the king; but objections of this kind are surely too trifling to deserve refutation. Others, with much more reason, have spoken of the bloodless device for the destruction of the enemies of the Jews, consigned as this was in the death of 55,000 persons, and accompanied by the public hanging of Haman's ten sons upon their father's gallows. It is not necessary to attempt a vindication of all this, any more than of some cruel notions of David in his wars, and other things recorded in Scripture without any comment, and which are by no means to be justified on account of the holiness really belonging to those to whom acted such: rather we might draw an argument from this in regard to the truthfulness of the Word of God in the pictures which it gives of his best saints. Nevertheless we are to judge these men literally while as yet there had appeared no living embodiment of the law of God; our circumstances are very different from theirs, seeing that we have the record of the life of our Lord. Particularly we know that the Persian punishments were fearfully strict and summary, and we need not doubt that the Jews suffered from the habits of the age in which they lived. Yet, as we read the history of this seemingly merciless slaughter, we must take into account the great self-restraint that restrained externally to restrain them which prevented the Jews from laying their hands on any of the spoil: the frightful provocation under which they acted, when for months the same fate had been hanging over themselves without the slightest cause, except the refusal of Mordecai to bow to Haman; the hereditary hatred between two races, connected with the curse of God which doomed the Amalekites to destruction, on the supposition that Haman the Agagite was of the blood-royal of that nation, a supposition which has strong probability in its favour; and nothing whatever against it: the absurd and clumsy arrangements of the Persian jurisprudence, which plunged the empire into something like a state of civil war, while “the city Susian was perplexed,” in order that the king might have a resemblance to the divine perfections, “without variances or shadow of turning,” instead of simply repeating the foolish jest; and the distinct statement that the Jews acted wholly on the defensive, which is emphatically declared both in the decree and in the history of the actual event, chs. vi. 11, x. 2, 16. Even the hanging of Haman’s sons is probably to be explained, as in one or two parallel cases, by the consideration that they were partners in their father’s guilt; and this view is confirmed by the fact that the gallows were prepared for Mordecai at the instigation of Haman’s wife, and “all his friends” assembled at his house, ch. x. 11.

In respect of the form of the book, it is impossible to conceal or overlook its peculiarity, inasmuch as the name of God never occurs in it, nor any express reference to anything supernatural. Yet there are parallels to it in other books of both the Old and the New Testament, namely, the Song of Solomon and the third epistle of John. The peculiarity here consists in the extreme prominence given to the facts of the history, fully charged as these are with evidence of God’s overruling special providence toward his church and people, while not one statement is made in all this respecting his presence and working. We need not plunge ourselves to any explanation of the phenomenon, which is startling to most readers, whatever theory of the object of the book be adopted by them; whether to give an account of the origin of the feast of Purim, or to demonstrate the special Providence which watched over the Jewish people. Some have explained the matter as if this book were very much an extract from “the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia,” to which express reference is made, ch. x. 2; and it is said that the argument for God’s gracious guidance and defence of his church is thus presented in the most emphatic form, when it comes out of the mouth of unbelievers, or men at least ignorant of him. Others prefer to say that the writer, though an Israelite and God’s believer, well acquainted with God’s character and promises, did not wish to set forth the occurrences “in a point of view which would have seemed strange to his contemporaries, and foreign to the subject itself, inasmuch as Jehovah, the God of Israel, had not revealed himself among the people.” There is no ground for positively rejecting this as unsatisfactory, though Dr. Davidson has done so: for the theocracy was now past and gone, in that outward shape which had made the kingdom of Israel a wonder to the world, but in its essence and inward spirit it remained as much as ever; and by such events as these recorded in this book of Esther it was silently forcing itself on the attention of all nations, and calling them to notice the fulfillment of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream of the little stone which broke the image. Certainly the difficulties are increased considerably if we transfer the date of composition to a later period, under the Greek kings of Syria, as Dr. Davidson is disposed to do; for the outward opposition of Judaism to everything Greek became more and more strongly marked, and found means continually to give articulate expression to itself. Accordingly, in the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther, which are preserved in the Septuagint, the name of God occurs frequently: and it is inserted several times in that translation of the genuine book; it is so at least twice or thrice where it might seem to us very appropriate. Thus, ch. iv. 20, Mordecai’s charge to Esther includes this, “to fear God and keep his commandments.” In ch. iv. 8 he bids her call on the Lord as well as speak unto the king. And in ch. vi. 12 Zeresh tells her husband why he must fall before Mordecai, “because the living God is with him.” Also, Haman is transformed into a Macedonian, and it is alleged that he perishes by transferring the sovereignty to the Macedonians from the Persians who were favourable to the Jews. But these apocryphal additions certainly have conclusive internal evidence against them: and they are destitute of external authority, for the Septuagint version of the book is plainly careless in many passages. These additions are chiefly a dream of Mordecai with which the book closes, and at the end an explanation of this dream as applying to himself and Haman: the two effects of the king, first for the destruction of the Jews, and next for their deliverance; the prayer of Mordecai, and the act of Esther, in reference to the appearance and conduct of Esther, when she first came into the presence of the king. The Council of Trent however has pronounced all these to be of canonical authority.

[1] A fair arrangement of the materials connected with the discussions in this book is given in Keil’s Introduction to the Old Testament, A view from the vertical side is given in the translations of De Wette and Beik. Two learned works have been published in the present century whose very object has been to search out everything connected with the antecedents of the historical truth of the book, and to depict it against them: one by Keil, Friedrich Esther (Frib. 1829); and another by Biirnhammer, Dr. Erich Biirnhammer (Halle, 1830). Explanations of the book have repeatedly been published: none better, on account of comprehensiveness, lucidity, and niceness, than that of the late Dr. McCrie.]

ESTHER, the queen of Ahasuerus, whose history is given in the book which bears her name. Referring for other matters to the preceding article, it is enough here to mention the leading actions of her life, as exhibited in that history. She was a Jewess, of the tribe of Benjamin, of that part of the captivity which had just been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar along with king Jeconiah: but plainly she herself was born in captivity; and probably her family was one of those which preferred to remain in their adopted country, as we find her at Susian the royal city of the Persians. Here she lived under the care of Mordecai, her father’s nephew, who had taken her under his protection and training when she was an orphan. At that time her name was Hadassah, which signifies a myrtle; but on some occasion unknown to us she received that name which alone is familiar to us, Esther, a Persian word according to Gesenius, of the same form and meaning as the Greek Αισθή and the English star. In this view he says he is supported by the second Targum on Esther: and perhaps the name in Persic indicated good fortune, as Venus did in Greek, and it might be given to her in consequence of her aspiring to the throne or her success in the competition. The divorce of queen Vashti, and the gathering of the most beautiful maidens throughout the empire, were the two prominent events which led to her elevation: and whatever disgust and repulsion may be felt or expressed in reference to these so far as the king was concerned in them, Esther has no blame chargeable upon her. Far from this, it would seem that she was passive in the whole matter, and that all around her were delighted with her on account of her simplicity and superiority to artificial advantages. Her character also makes another good impression on us, account of the respectful attention which she continued to give to Mordecai, just as she had obeyed him during her earlier years spent in a humble station. In the absence of anything to the contrary, we are entitled to argue from this that his training had been solid, wise, and godly: and our favourable opinion is confirmed by the readiness with which she exposed herself on behalf of her people, though at the peril of her life. For she did not run this risk in a foolhardy spirit, but only after careful deliberation and conviction that she might have come to the kingdom for this very service at such a crisis; and she actually ventured on it, only after preparing herself by three days' fasting on her own part and that of her maidens, while a similar course of humiliation on her behalf was used and crowned by Mordecai and all the Jews assembled in Shushan. Her patriotic feelings continued until her object was fully accomplished, when, at a later time, she fell down at the king's feet, and besought him with tears to put away the mischiefs of Haman. Other good qualities are to be observed in her conduct towards the royal favourite Haman, whom she must have hated and despised, and yet dared, but to whom she showed the utmost prudent forbearance, until such time as he himself discovered his worthlessness to the king; and in the modesty with which she reported Mordecai's service in frustrating the treason of the criminals, without asking or obtaining any reward for her counsellor's service. On the other hand, there is a certain vindictiveness which shocks us in a woman, as we read of her asking the king to hang the dead bodies of Haman's sons upon the gallows on which their father was hanged; and still more, her asking that the Jews in Shushan should be permitted to carry on the civil war for a second day, when 250 of their enemies had fallen the first day. The article on the book of Esther, however, presents some considerations fitted to modify our unfavourable estimate. The last circumstance relating of her is that she co-operated with Mordecai in writing to her people the history of these transactions, and impressing her authority to confirm the resolution which the Jews had imposed upon themselves to keep the fast of Purim.

ETAM [place of common woe]. 1. A town in the land of Judah, apparently not very far from Beth-horon, in connection with which it is mentioned as a place that was built or repaired by Rehoboam. 2 Chron. 16, 8, compare 1 Kings 15, 22. Josephus represents it as a favourite resort of Solomon as well as Rehoboam, and states that the former used often to take a morning drive to it, that he also adorned it with fountains and gardens (Ant. viii. 7, 1). The rabbis have a tradition, that water was even brought from it by aqueducts to Jerusalem; but this can scarcely be reckoned sufficient testimony. Williams, however, in his Holy City (vol. ii. p. 150), fully accredits it, and also states that the old name is still perpetuated in a Woodly Etng, which is on the way to Hebron from Jerusalem, and that there are still connected with it the largest and most beautiful gardens to be met with in the hilly region of Judah.

2. Etan, the rock to which Samson on one occasion withdrew, Judges xi. 11, though often connected with the Etan above noticed, is quite uncertain as to its locality. Modern research has failed as yet to obtain any definite clue to it.

ETHAM, one of the early stations mentioned in the sojournings of the wilderness, and from which a portion of the wilderness derived its name, Nu xxviii. 31. It could be at no great distance from the Red Sea, but its exact site is unknown.

ETHAN [Greek, Eusthenes], the name of a person to whom Ps. lxxix. is ascribed. He is called in the title to the psalm "Ethan the Ezrahite." And the immediately preceding psalm, of which Ps. lxxxix may be regarded as the complement, is designated a Maschil of Haman the Ezrahite. Haman is often mentioned in connection with the psalms, and the sacred music of the temple, but Ethan's name only occurs here. It occurs, however, in a very honourable connection at 1 Ki. iv. 31, where, speaking of Solomon's pre-eminent wisdom, it is said, that "he was wiser than all men; than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Haman, and Caleb, and Darda, the sons of Mahel." But the same names, with only an insignificant variation in the case of one of them, are found elsewhere, and coupled apparently, with a different punctuation. In 1 Kings iv. 31, Ethan, and Haman, and Caleb, and Darda are called the sons of Zerah, the grandson of Judah. We know for certain of Haman, that he belonged to the Kohathite branch of the Leviites, 1 Chron. vi. 27; and Ethan also is expressly said to have been a Levite of the family of the Merarites, Numbers vii. 71. The probability is, that these Levites were associated as citizens with the house of Zerah, or dwelt in it as sojourners. Levites in this way were not improperly assigned to the tribe or family wherein they resided, as Samuel's father is called an Ephrathite, and a priest in the book of Judges is said to have been of the family of Judah, 1 Sam. xiv. 6. Ethan the Ezrahite is all one with Ethan the house or family of Zerah (see Numbers vii. 73, xxxvii. 11 et al.). Though little is said of this Ethan in sacred Scripture, yet that his name should be connected with such a Psalm as the lxxxixth, and especially that it should have been thought worthy of characterizing Solomon's wisdom as greater than his, are clear proofs of his distinguished excellence as a man, and of the superior gifts which distinguished him.

ETHBAAL [with lend, i.e., having lead for guide and protector], the father of Jehoshaphat, and king of the Sidonians. Probably the same with the Ethbaal of Megiddo.

ETHIOPIA [Herb. 272]. With only one exception, 1 Kings xi. 1, the Hebrew word ChaChek, when used of a country, has been rendered in the English Bible Ethiopia, and the rendering undoubtedly should have been uniform; if Ethiopia was commonly preferred, as it is that of the ancient versions, it should have been so always. But Chacek being once employed, the question has been discussed under that term, what is its proper application? Whether there is an Adsalie, as well as an African country, that goes by that name in Scripture? and the decision there given was, with the great majority of biblical critics, in the affirmative. It is admitted, however, that in by much the greater number of cases, the Ethiopians of Scripture is that also of the Greeks and Romans, namely, the country that stretches southwards above the estuaries of the Nile, comprising the modern Nubia, Sennar, and Northern Abyssinia. The word is too frequently coupled with Egypt to admit of any reasonable doubt of this; it sometimes even appears in such close conjunction with Egypt that one might almost think the one name was interchanged with the other, or
The Ethiopia in question included the river island Meroe, one of the most remarkable regions in that part of Africa, to which, according to the traditions of the Ethiopian priesthood, the most ancient state of Egypt owed its foundation, and the monumental remains of which have excited the curiosity and wonder of modern travellers. It has even for some time been a question with antiquarians whether civilization ascended from Egypt to Meroe, and Ethiopia in general, or did descend from this higher region to the valley of the Nile. Latterly, the course of investigation has put this question to rest, but so as at the same time to establish, in conformity with the occasional notices and allusions of Scripture, that Ethiopia stood in very close connection with Egypt in its history as well as its geographical position. "We have," says Heeren (Ethiopica, ch. ii.), "historical evidence that rulers of Meroe were at certain periods likewise rulers of Egypt, at least of Upper Egypt; and, on the other hand, that many of the Pharaohs extended their dominion over Ethiopia." His conclusion from this, and from the character of the monuments, is, that it was rather the occasional dominion and policy of the Pharaohs which left its impress on Ethiopia, than the civilization of Ethiopia which became the parent of art and science in Egypt. Such also is the judgment of Wilkinson, who may be said to give the general opinion of the most competent inquirers, when he affirms not Ethiopia, but the Thebaid, or Upper Egypt, to have been the parent of Egyptian science, which was peopled and cultivated when the greater part of Lower Egypt was a marsh; and also when he says that the word "Ethiopia," as used by ancient authors, appears to have been intended to designate the Thebaid, or that the one was confounded by them with the other. "The expression of Pliny," he adds, "Ethiopia was evidently renowned and powerful, even to the time of the Trojan war, and extended its empire over Syria" (ch. vi. 33), though he is speaking of Ethiopia proper, can only have been borrowed from a tradition relating to the Thebaid, since the Diospolite (Theban) monarchs ruled and received tribute from Ethiopia, and actually did extend their dominion over Syria, which the Ethiopians could not have done without first obtaining possession of Egypt, and that too at a period when the Pharaohs were in the zenith of their power. Nor is the assertion of the prophet Nahum, that Ethiopia and Egypt were the strength of Nos, less remarkable—Nos, or as the Hebrew gives it, Na-Antou, being the name of Thebes" (Ancient Egyptians, i. p. 6, 11).

The connection which thus appears to have existed, both in respect to position and government, between Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, sufficiently accounts for the close relationship in which they are sometimes represented in Scripture as standing to each other. It also explains, what might otherwise have appeared strange or incredible, how kings of Ethiopia, of a more adventurous and warlike turn, should have penetrated into Syria, and even come into contact with the affairs of the covenant-people. Two occasions of this sort are mentioned in Scripture, one in the reign of Asa (about 955 B.C.), when Zerah the Ethiopian came against him with a mighty host, and was defeated and driven back at Marethari, in the extreme south of Palestine, where it lies nearest to Egypt; and another in the time of Hezekiah, when Tirhakah, or Tirhawo, having come forth to war against Sennacherib king of Assyria, helped to divert the attention of the Assyrian monarch from the little kingdom of Judah, and even gained, it is supposed, some advantages over him. (See TIRHAKAH.) These Ethiopian incursions in the Syrian direction are to be understood of Upper Egypt and Ethiopia combined, and of periods when probably Upper and Lower Egypt were presided over by distinct rulers; and it is hence to be accounted for that the name of Tirhakah is found on the walls only of a Theban temple (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i. p. 140). Not a few also of the monuments in Ethiopia are ascribed to him, so that his connection with both regions may be regarded as certain.

Almost the only other allusions made in Scripture to Ethiopia have respect to the natural characteristics of the country, and the commerce in which its people engaged. The prophet Isaiah, for example, refers to its well-watered condition; he speaks of "the waters of Ethiopia" as familiarly known to people at a distance, even to the highest among the nations; and the slightest glance at the map will show how justly it was so characterized, that part of it especially which composed the ancient Meroë; and articles mentioned, to Meroë, which was the centre of the whole Ethiopian trade, and in which alone the merchants, properly speaking, had their abode (Hieron, Ethiopia, ch. ii.). After collecting the various notices to be found in ancient writers on the subject, and comparing them with the accounts of later times, the author just referred to thus sums up: "It appears, therefore, that the districts of Gherri and Shendi, that is, of the ancient Meroë, was, and still continues to be, the place where the caravans are formed which trade between Egypt and Ethiopia, or the point at which they touch in passing to and fro. But a commercial connection being established between Egypt and Meroë, it scarcely needs to be mentioned that the trade of the latter must necessarily have stretched much farther into the south of Africa. Meroë was the emporium where the produce of the distant southern lands was collected together in order to be transported, either on the Nile or by caravans, into North Africa. The great end of this commerce was the rich gold countries, much farther to the south." A trade of this sort could not fail to bring along with it many of the arts and advantages of civilized life; and among other things of this description we find the early and extensive use of writing attributed to the Ethiopians (Pref. i. p. 75), namely, hieroglyphic or picture-writing, the invention of which has even been ascribed to them, but this probably from confounding, as in other respects, Ethiopia with the Phœnicians.

EUNICE, the mother of Timothy and a pious Jewess, though married to an unconverted Greek. She became a believer in Christ, and is spoken of with commendation as a faithful minister and guide to her son, 2 Tim. 1:5.

EUNUCH, the English form of the Greek eunuch, which simply means had been. Eunuch, therefore, in the strict and proper sense, were the persons who had charge of the bed chambers in palaces and larger houses. But as the jealous and dissolute temperament of the East required this charge to be in the hands of persons who had been deprived of their virility, the word eunuch naturally came in common usage to denote persons generally of that "artificial sex." But as it was not unusual in eastern countries for eunuchs to rise to high consideration and influence about the court, to become confidential subjects of their royal masters or mistresses, the word appears to have been occasionally employed to denote persons in such a position, without indicating anything as to their proper manhood. Thus Potiphar to whom Joseph was sold, is designated "a eunuch of Pharaoh's captain (translated officer in the English version of the guard)," Gen. xxxviii. 16; while, from what is afterwards stated, there can be no doubt that he was a married man. It is hence quite possible that by the name eunuch in Act. viii. 27, applied to one of "great authority under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians," should, as many suppose, be understood simply a person high in the confidence and employment of the queen; and it had, perhaps, better been if the word had been rendered châtelain, so as to indicate nothing definite respecting virility. Eunuchs in the stricter sense were frequently employed in later times about the kings of Israel and Judah, but they were probably of foreign birth, 1 Ki. xx. 22, 25; xxv. 14; xxvi. 24. The term is employed figuratively by our Lord in Mat. xvi. 12, with reference to the power, whether possessed as a natural disposition, or acquired as a property of grace, of maintaining an attitude of indifference toward the solicitations of fleshly desire.

EUODIAS [goddess or prosperous wife], the name of a female member of the church at Philippi, mentioned with commendation by St. Paul as one who had "laboured much with him in the gospel." Th. ii. 4.

EUPHRATES [Heb. פֶּתַח, Peath, Greek Εὐφρατῆς, modern name Fert], a well-known river in Western Asia, both in volume of water and in commercial importance, surpassing all others in that part of the world. The name occurs first in Is. ii. 14, as that of one of the four rivers which had their common origin in Edom, but as this notice has respect to the principal earth, which subsequently underwent considerable change by the action of the deluge, nothing very definite can be inferred from it respecting the Euphrates of postdeluvian times. (See Canaan.) But the reference to it in Scripture is greatly more numerous than might be supposed, if one were to judge by the simple occurrence of the name; for it is not infrequently styled merely "the river," by way of contrast, or "that great river," being so much the largest with which the Israelites were acquainted, that in certain connections it was indicated with sufficient definiteness by such a general designation, Ezr. ix. 10, 16; Ps. xxxii. 7; xxxiii. 11; Is. viii. 7; xi. 13, etc.

In the prophetical writings particularly it is often thus named, whether the reference be to it in its simply natural aspect, or as employed in a symbolical sense.

The river itself, though confined throughout to Asiatic soil, yet in the earlier part of its course takes so much of a westerly direction, and approaches so near to the shores of the Mediterranean, that it served from remote times an important purpose in connecting the commerce of Asia with that of Europe. Its entire course is about 1,750 miles, calculating from the most easterly of its two sources. These both lie in the mountains of Armenia—the one in the Anti-Taurus, 25 miles north-east from Erzeroun, which alone at first bears the name of Frat, the other, called Murad Chai, more easterly and also more remote, in the range called Ali Tagh, not far from Arrarat. These streams unite after receiving various smaller tributaries, at a ferry called Kebam-Maden, which is 270 miles from the one source, and 400 from the other. The united streams now form a considerable river, and it is only here that the Euphrates properly begins. A little below the point of junction it measures 120 yards wide and is very deep; the direction it takes is about south-west, or sometimes W.S.W.; but as it has to force its way through mountain chains and rugged passes, it has many windings in its course, and not a few rapids. It only becomes properly navigable at Sunisat (the ancient Susasata), and continues to be so till it reaches the Persian Gulf, a distance of very nearly 1,200 miles. After passing what is called the Zeugma of Sunisat it changes from a south-west into a south direction; by and by it turns a little to the east, and south, when nearly opposite the mouth of the Orontes, distant at this point only 135 miles from the Mediterranean, it finally quits the direction of the Mediterranean, and makes in a north-easterly course for the Persian Gulf. At the ancient Carrhae, or Ctesiphon, it is joined by a large tributary, the Khabur, the ancient Chabara (or Chelbar), where it comes to possess an average breadth of 400 yards, and an ordinary depth of 18 feet. After reaching Wady, a distance of 731/2 miles by the course of the river, it contracts into a width of about 350 yards; and farther down still, about 70 miles in a direct line, though twice as much by the river, at the island of Harisib, it becomes only 300 yards, and has a depth of still only 18 feet. By the time it reaches the site of ancient Babylon it has decreased to 200 yards, with a depth of 15 feet; and at old Lamlum, 56 miles in a straight line lower still, it measures only 120 yards wide, and 12 feet in depth. Below this it divides into two branches, and appears for a time as if it were to be lost amid the marshes it forms, and the canals that are taken from it for purposes of irrigation; but the main stream again collects its resources, and after 40 miles below Lamlum increases to 200 yards in breadth, which by and by become 250; and when, lower still, the river is joined by the Tigris, the united stream swells out to near half a mile in width; and at 40 miles above where it empties itself into the Persian Gulf it has become 1,200 yards broad and 50 feet deep. The remarkable circumstance of so great a diminution in the stream of the Euphrates from a considerable space above the site of ancient Babylon till its near its junction with the Tigris, was not unnoticed by ancient writers; but we owe our most exact knowledge of it, and of the course of the river generally, to modern research, and in particular to the accurate details given by C. Cushee, in his Expedition for the Survey of the Rivers Euphrates and Tigris, 1859, from which the preceding outline has been taken. The explanation of the decrease of volume arises from the comparatively flat and arid nature of the country which it for a time traverses. During that part of its course the river receives no tributaries worth naming, and is subject to a constant drain from evaporation, and still more from the swamps and canals it has to feed. The tendency in this direction is greatly increased by the negligence of the Turkish government, which has allowed the embankments to fall into decay; and in the existing state of matters it is doubtful if even the smallest stream, that might be available for purposes of commerce, could make its way through the marshes which extend for 200 miles above its confluence with the Tigris. (Cassell's Babylon and Nineveh, P. 63.)

The river is subject to periodical floods, which swiftly proceed from the melting of the snows on the mountains along the upper part of its course. The rise usually commences about the beginning of March, and reaches its height toward the end of May. For thirty or forty days the flood is deep and rapid; after which it gradually subsides, till in the months of September and October its waters are about their lowest. There is an occasional increase subsequently from the rains which fall at the close of summer and during the winter months; but no regular floods. There can be no doubt that in the more flourishing periods of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires, advantage was taken of the periodical rise, in order to feed canals, and thereby fertilize the country. Mechanical appliances for this purpose are among the works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar; but no specific information concerning them has reached us. And it may perhaps be doubted if for any length of time the course of the river between Euphrates: the junction with the Tigris was kept in a properly navigable state. Herodotus has given us a description from his own observation of the kind of navigation that was carried on in the parts above the great city. A sort of boats, he tells us, 10, were used by the people, of a circular form, made of comparatively slender materials—the ribs consisting of willows, the external covering of hides of leather, and there was an internal lining of reeds. In these frail barges, some of them, however, carrying a burden of 5000 talents worth of goods, they sailed with their merchandise as far as Babylon, always carrying an ass with them, and the larger boats, more than once, for the purpose of conveying back the hides of which the boats were made. These were stripped off at Babylon, and the willows and reeds that formed the remaining part of the materials were parted asunder, and sold for what they would bring. This was done as the cheapest and readiest way of getting home; since they found it impossible to call up to Armenia against the stream. It was certainly a very simple style of navigation; but probably it is to be understood, not of the entire trade soled, but only the part of the produce that was conveyed in writing with the higher and more distant regions. It is certain, from other ancient notice, that a traffic was conveyed up as well as down, from the Persian Gulf to Babylon, where the city received a constant supply of Arabian and Indian productions; and we have the testimony of Strabo, that of these productions a surplus portion was regularly conveyed by the river from Babylon as far as Thapsacus, nearly 100 miles up, whence the goods were distributed over the surrounding countries. This was an important trade, and that the transmission of merchandise upwards from the Persian Gulf to Babylon was, in part at least, conducted on the river, though there is reason to believe that caravans were also employed (see Heron's Ancient Babylonians, ch. ii. and the authorities there cited). On the whole, therefore, and considered in a commercial respect as well as with a regard to its uses in agriculture, the Euphrates manifested itself as much in the same relation to Babylon and the surrounding region as the Nile did to Egypt; it was the source, to a large extent, of its prosperity, and the most important of its greatness.

It is on this relation that the symbolical use of the Euphrates in Scripture proceeds, and by keeping it in view the several passages will be found to admit of an easy explanation. Contributing so materially to the resources and wealth of Babylon, the river was naturally taken for an emblem or representative of the city itself, and of the empire of which it was the capital. In this respect a striking application is made of it by the prophet Isaiah, ch. xliii. 5, 8, where the little kingdom of Judah, with its circumscribed territory and its few earthly resources, on the one hand, is seen imaged in the tiny brook of Shihob; while, on the other, the rising power of Babylon is spoken of under the emblem of “the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria and all his glory.” And he goes on to expose the folly of Israel's trusting in this foreign power, on account of its material greatness, by declaring that in consequence of this mistaken trust, and in chastisement of it, the mighty stream would, as it were, depopulate its proper channel, and turn its waters in a sweeping and desolating flood over the holy land. In like manner the symbolical action of Jeremiah, ch. xxi. 18, is going to hide his garlick in a cavern by the river Euphrates, points to the evil that was destined to come upon the covenant people from the power which had its representative in that river. But when Babylon's own doom comes to be the theme of prophetic discourse, then, quite naturally, and by a simple reversing of the figure, the waters of the river are spoken of as suffering under a perpetual drought, and being even dried up, Jer. 1:12; Zec. xii. 11; so also, v. xvi. of the Nile; but one should no more think, in this case, of a decay of the natural stream, than in the other of its overflow; in both cases alike it is the kingdom spoiled by the river, which is really the subject of discourse. In the book of Revelation, where Babylon is employed as a symbolical designation of the corrupt system which stands opposed to the pure church and kingdom of Christ, the Euphrates also comes into view as an emblematic representative of the powers or agencies from which the mystery of iniquity should derive its principal support, and which are there explained to mean “peoples and multitudes, and nations, tongues,” Rev. xi. 10; so that to make account, in such a connection, of the literal Euphrates, or of the countries which it waters, were as much beside the purpose as it would be to understand by Babylon the ancient city and kingdom which bore the name. For, in interpreting such language, a due regard to the relations of things, and a consistent use of the terms employed, is indispensable to our arriving at a satisfactory result. Hence, as in the case of the literal Babylon, the saying up of the waters of the Euphrates signifies, in prophetic language, the diminution or failure of the city's resources; the same expression, when applied to modern relations, by xx. 12, can be understood of the case as though the truth and power or failure of the support which mystical Babylon was to derive from the nations and kingdoms of the earth.

Considered simply in its natural relation to Palestine, the river Euphrates had no other significance than that of the extreme boundary of territorial dominion on the north-east. It was mentioned, as already noticed, in that connection in the promise to Abraham; was repeated in De. i. 7; Josh. i. 13; possessions to that extent are reported to have been actually held by the tribe of Reuben, namely, from Gibeah onwards to Euphrates, Josh. x. 15, and to the same extent both David and Solomon appear to have claimed dominion, 2 Sam. viii. 2, 10th ch. 21; 1 Kings x. 28, but the claim was manifestly of a much less important kind than that by which they held the land of Canaan: it was a claim of superiority merely over petty states or wandering tribes, which were too small and divided to form properly independent kingdoms, not of tribal occupation, which for the higher ends of theocracy would have been a less rather than a gain. A right of pasturage through the vast desert lands, or an annual tribute from subject tribes, was all that was sought; and the land of the covenant, strictly so called, was still that which was comprised within the bounds of Canaan and the conquered regions to the east of Jordan. (See Canaan.)

EUROCLYDON. a tempestuous wind, anciently well known in the Aegean Sea, and the occasion of the disastrous voyage and shipwreck of the vessel in which Paul sailed, Acts xxvii. 1. The term is made up of the two words which signify east and nor'; so that, as applied to a wind, it must have been in the active sense of an Oeao-torbo, a wind that raises such waves as come from the east. One, however, of the more ancient MSS., viz. the Alexandrian, read Eoao-EUTYCHUS, a young disciple at Troas, who fell asleep while Paul continued his discourse far into the night, and having fallen over into the pavement below, "was taken up dead." There seemed no reason to doubt that actual death, and not a mere swoon, befell him; and Paul consequently did with him, as in certain cases of death had been done by Elijah and Eliezer of old, fell upon him, to see if the Lord through this instrumentality would restore the suspended animation. The desired result was attained, and the apostle restored the young man alive to his friends, Acts xx. 8; Luke, ix. 28; John, xi. 44. That some degree of blame attached to the latter for having gone to sleep under such preaching as Paul's must have been, there can be little doubt. At the same time, the length of the service, and the lateness of the hour, to say nothing of other possible contingencies, afforded some excuse. And the granting of a special exercise of power for his restoration to life would come as a merciful interposition to Paul himself and the church at Troas, as well as to the sufferer.

EVANGELIST, the English form of the Greek ἀποστόλος, which means bearer of good tidings, a messenger of good. In a general sense the term might be applied to any one who made proclamation of the mercy and grace of God, especially as unfolded in the person and work of Christ—therefore pre-eminently to Christ himself, and to the apostles whom he commissioned to preach his truth and establish his kingdom. But in reality it came to be employed as the designation of a distinctive class in the early church, as in the following enumeration of St. Paul: "And he (i.e. Christ) gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers," Eph. ii. 20; iii. 9.

It is nowhere stated what was the exact province of an evangelist, or wherein precisely his calling and office differed from those, for example, of a pastor or a teacher. We are left to infer them from the nature of the work, and from the instances to which it is applied. The word itself implies, that those who bore it as a term of office, must have had to do especially with the facts of redemption, with the announcement of things already accomplished or provided, and capable of being made known as tidings of good to men. Hence, in their work they would naturally approach nearer to missionaries than to stated labourers in a particular place, or overseers of a fixed congregation; they would find their more specific employment in spreading abroad the good news of the kingdom. In short, the evangelist might be regarded as the preacher of the apostle, who was to plant the church in any locality, or of the settled pastor, who was to preside over and feed it. And this is borne out by the application made of the term to particular individuals. Philip, one of the original seven at Jerusalem, who were appointed to fill the office of deacon, is the first who is called an evangelist; and he appears to have derived the name from his wonderful fitness for proclaiming in an impressive and convincing manner the great truths of redemption—first in Samaria, and then in other and more distant places, Acts viii., xii. Timothy, in like manner, and Titus, had much of the same kind of work to do, and are commonly called evangelists, only they stood in a somewhat closer connection with the apostle; and the one at Ephesus, the other in Crete, had to do, as regards the execution of that commission, the part of apostolic delegates. This, however, was still doing what the apostles had done, i.e., the work of an evangelist, Acts xx. 19, 21; and both the two in their ordinary ministries appear to have been his assistants and fellow-labourers in the general dissemination of the gospel. Luke, Silas, Mark, Apollos, and several others, are to be assigned to the same class. So that, from the various notices which occur respecting the evangelists, the description of Schaff (Apostolic Church, p. 299) may be taken as substantially correct: "They were not congregational officers, nor stationed like the prophets and later bishops at particular posts, but travelled about everywhere where their services were needed. The apostles employed them as messengers for various purposes to all points of their vast field; sending them, now for the further propagation of the gospel, now to carry letters, now to visit, inspect, and strengthen congregations already established; so that the evangelist also, like the apostles themselves, served as living bonds of union, and promoters of fraternal harmony, among the different sections of the church. In short, they were in some sense the vicereguents [or viceroys] of the apostles, acting under their direction and by their authority."

From the general nature of the function of an evangelist, one can easily understand why the name should have been peculiarly appropriated to the four inspired writers of the gospel history. These were for the church of all times the publishers of the facts which constituted the ground and basis of blessing to the people of God. In that respect they all did the part of evangelists, although only two of them stood in the rank indicated by the name, and the other two occupied the higher position of apostles. But the work itself of an evangelist, and the relation which it held to the apostolate, rendered it quite fitting, that one or more of these called to it should be endowed with supernatural gifts for preparing an inspired record of the great facts of gospel history. This higher part of their work, however, might with equal propriety be assigned to the prophetic office; since the gifts which constituted them to narrate aright those all-important facts, so as to enable their record an infallible and trustworthy guide to the church, were essentially the same with those of a prophet. In doing it the evan gelists act as divinely taught and authorized revealers of the mind of God; and in the statement of St. Paul respecting the New Testament church, that it is "built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets." Eph. 2:20, this prophetic agency of the evangelists is undoubtedly to be included.

EVE. See Adam.

Evenings. The phrase between the two evenings is a peculiar expression in the Pentateuch, used chiefly with reference to the slaying of the paschal lamb, although it is given only on the margin of the English Bible. The lamb was to be killed between the two evenings, Ex. xiii. 6, 11. Originally this period had been a question, between what points these two evenings were to be made to lie. The Canaanites, with whom also the Hebrews agree, and the Samaritans, held it to be the interval between the sun's setting and the entrance of total darkness; i.e., between about six o'clock and seven or half past seven, by our reckoning. But the Pharisees of the apostolic age, and the Talmudists, understood the first evening to be when the sun was seen to decline, and the second when it actually sank under the horizon—or from about three in the afternoon till six, or a little after it, in the evening. The former explanation certainly seems to be the more natural of the two, and most in accordance with the intimations of Scripture upon the subject. For the expression between the two evenings is once and again interchanged with that of in the evening, Ex. xxxi. 19; Deut. vi. 14; and in I Kings, vii. 3. An explanatory clause is added, "in the evening as soon as the sun went down," Ex. xiii. 6. It would seem, therefore, that the general designation of time was in the evening, and the more specific one in the evening between its actual commencement by the sun going down and its termination by the entrance of night. This view also is confirmed by the consideration of Israel's position at the first institution of the passover; for, situated as they were, they could scarcely have gone about the service till the sun had either actually set, or was on the point of doing so. But there can be no doubt that the Pharisees had it prevailed in apostolic times; and it may be held for certain that the current practice was in this, as in other things respecting the Jewish feasts, followed by our Lord and his disciples.

The precise meaning, therefore, of the original phrase determines nothing as to the exact time of the last passover.

Evil-Merodach. He was the name of a Babylonian deity, the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. On his accession he released the captive king of Judah, Jehoiachin, treated him with marked respect, and set his throne above the thrones of the other subjugated monarchs, 2 Ki. xxv. 27, 30; 2 Esdr. iii. 31-34. The fact alone is recorded, and we have no eligible account of the motives that may have induced the king of Babylon to make such a distinction in his favour. A Jewish tradition ascribes it to a prison-acquaintancehip acquired with Jehoiachin, when Evil-Merodach was put in confinement by his father, on recovery from the temporary insanity which came upon him. He took offense at something that had been done by his son in the administration of affairs during Nebuchadnezzar's incapacity, and threw him into Jehoiachin's ward. The tradition, though noticed by Jerome (in loc, xvi. 29), had probably no other origin than a desire to provide some explanation of the fact respecting the favour shown to the captive king of Judah. But whatever may have been the immediate human occasion of it, when viewed in respect to God, it was certainly to be regarded as an indication of that mercy and loving-kindness toward his covenant-people which had not altogether failed, and a premonitory sign of that coming enlargement which was still reserve for them.

Exodus. The. That providence which, by a remarkable combination of causes variously operating, now on a moral family in Canaan, and again through the numbers of an Egyptian monarch, is seen at the close of Genesis conducting the Hebrews to Egypt, appears at the opening of the history of Exodus no less clearly preparing for their restoration to the land of their fathers' sojourning. This restoration had been a subject of promise as early as the time of Abraham, Gen. xxiv. xxvi. vii. viii., subsequently and more expressly renewed to Jacob at Beersheba, on his way to Egypt, God giving him this assurance, "Fear not to go down into Egypt, for I will make thee a great nation; I will go down with thee into Egypt, and I will bring thee up again," Gen. xli. 46, 47. In the full hope of this promise, Jacob and his son Joseph lived in the land of Egypt, the latter in particular taking an oath of his brethren that on their departure hence they should carry up with them his bones, Gen. xxvii. 2, 3.

The first part of the promise made to Jacob had, even prior to the birth of Moses, fully eighty years before the Exodus, been receiving such a remarkable fulfilment as to arrest the attention of the Egyptian government, which was naturally alarmed at the increase of this alien population within their dominions. Hence the various but indelible means resorted to for repressing this rapid growth, Ex. i. 1-25. The edict which directed that the Hebrew male infants should be cast into the river must have been issued shortly before the birth of Moses, as there is no reference to any trouble on this account at the birth of Aaron, who was three years older than Moses, Ex. vii. 7, and it was probably of short duration. However, this tyrannical decree was not without its fruits, were it only for the training which it was instrumental in securing for Israel's future leader; while at the same time it served, with the other seven trials to which the people were exposed, to wean them from their attachment to the land of their sojourning. How much this was needed appears from their subsequent history, particularly their murmuring in the wilds; and indeed the bond which it is thus seen Egypt had on their affections, owing partly to the facilities with which their animal wants were supplied, Ex. xii. 5, fully accords with what is still witnessed among such of the inhabitants of the desert as are led to settle in the valley of the Nile by the Egyptian financial (see vol. iv p. 229). Moses, when he first tried to rescue his brethren to a sense of their high destiny, found them quite unprepared for his friendly overtures, and a further period of trial was necessary for the discipline not only of the people, but of the deliverer himself. However, the time did at length arrive for the fulfilling of the divine promises, and but what the destined leader of Israel more reluctant, than he he had previously shown himself eager, to engage in this enterprise, though now expressly summoned to it by God. The change which in the inter-real had come over the spirit and inspirations of Moses is the object of easy explanation, and is itself an important confirmation of the truthfulness of this portion of the history. He however, after much natural, but, from the extent to which it was carried, sinful opposition, Ex. iv. 11, undertook the duty committed to him, and leaving the Arabian desert, busied the scene of his solitary, again to become that of his public, life and labours as the leader of his people, he returned to Egypt, accompanied by his brother Aaron, who by divine appointment met him on the way, Ex. iv. 27.

Moses first made known his mission as directed to the elders, or representatives of Israel according to the patriarchal form of government still subsisting among them, and having shown the signs which accredited his divine commission, he found a favourable reception—"the people believed," Ex. iv. 5-34. The brothers, for Aaron was associated throughout as "the prophet" or spokesman of Moses, next addressed themselves to Pharaoh, and although the request was at first of the most moderate kind, being only leave for a journey of three days into the wilderness to sacrifice to the God of the Hebrews, it need excite no surprise that it was peremptorily refused, and only led to the imposition of additional burdens upon the enslaved people. The appearance of these commissioners of Jehovah, it may readily be supposed, was not such as to inspire with feelings other than of contempt a haughty Egyptian ruler, particularly one of the character represented in this history; while their request, moreover, if at all deemed worthy of a moment's consideration, may have been thought to cover some ulterior design; just as a former Pharaoh feared the contingency of the Israelites leaving Egypt, Ex. i. 10. At all events the labours of these bond-men was of too great value to the crown to make Pharaoh favourably dispose to any proposals which involved its intermission. Hence the reply, defiant alike of Moses and Aaron, and of Pharaoh whose representatives they professed to be—"Who is Jehovah, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not Jehovah, neither will I let Israel go," Ex. v. 2-3.

And now commenced that series of wonders by which Moses exerted a relentless as from Pharaoh to demands, which in the course of the negotiations were presented in their utmost extent, having ceased to be, what they were at the outset, a conditional request for a journey into the wilderness for the purpose of sacrificing. The object of Moses was now most explicitly declared to be the absolute emanuation of the people from bondage, and their departure out of the land. It is of importance to bear in view this change in the relation of affairs, as a great complaint is sometimes made by parties unfriendly to the Bible, that Moses in his first request to Pharaoh practised a deception, and that in leaving Egypt with the Israelites as he did, he was guilty of a breach of faith. There is, however, nothing in the history of these transactions to warrant such charges. Pharaoh's refusal to entertain the first proposal led to its being withdrawn. It answered the only purpose therein contemplated—the manifestation of the man with whom Moses had to deal. It was made, too, with a pre-intimation to Moses that it would be rejected by Pharaoh, Ex. iii. 19, who should however in the end be brought to an absolute submission. Indeed this change in the position of affairs was fully understood by Pharaoh himself and his people, Ex. xii. 30-31; though afterwards "the heart of Pharaoh and of his servants was turned against the Israelites," a circumstance which led to the pursuit of the fugitives with a view to their reduction, Ex. xix. 5, to their former state of slavery.

In estimating the character of those powers which Moses employed in enforcing his demands, and which ultimately overcame the various obstacles which, as might easily be shown, an undertaking of this kind necessarily presented, it would be well to ask how the case really stands when the miraculous character of the Mosaic acts is called in question? Reduce the authenticity of the Pentateuch to the lowest degree, still the fact of the exodus remains, and along with it a period of sojourning in the wilderness previous to the entrance into Canaan, and other facts which are so impressed on the language, institutions, and in short the whole public and private life of the Israelites, that they can only be denied by rejecting all historical evidence, and the question is, How was this deliverance effected? The account given in the Pentateuch is at least simple and consistent. No doubt, it introduces a divine agency; but deny such, and in vain is a cause sought for adequate to the results produced. A shepherd long exiled in Midian presents himself at the Pharaonic court, without armies or alliances, and yet at length he overcomes the obstinacy of the most obdurate of monarchs. The pastoral staff which he carries in his hand must certainly have been made "the rod of God" when it is capable of working such wonders. But, on the other hand, it may be objected, if Moses was really armed with such power, why break these repeated refreshments, and delays, and what need of ten plagues, when one stroke of the Almighty would have sufficiently answered the purpose by overcoming all opposition? Objections of this kind have their origin in ignorance or misconception of the purposes which this controversy with Pharaoh was designed to serve in the scheme of divine revelation.

Had the deliverance of Israel, considered in itself, been the only object contemplated in the mission of Moses, it might have been sumptuously effected through divine interposition. But the great object aimed at, as repeatedly stated in the narrative itself, was the revelation of Jehovah both to friends and to foes—to the Israelites and to the Egyptians—though in different aspects. To the former it was declared: "Ye shall know that I am Jehovah your God, who bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians," Ex. vi. 7; and with respect to the latter it was said, "The Egyptians shall know that I am Jehovah, when I stretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel from among them," Ex. vii. 7. Pharaoh's refusal of Moses' request was accompanied, as already remarked, with a defiance of Jehovah. He knew and reverence his country's gods, but he knew not or cared for the God of the Hebrews—"Who is Jehovah, that I should obey his voice?" Accordingly, Pharaoh, on witnessing the first sign which Moses was directed to perform in his presence in answer to this question, called in "the wise men and the sorcerers of Egypt." These representatives of the powers of heathenism imitated to a certain extent not only the sign but also the first two plagues. At the third, however, their power failed; they acknowledged themselves foiled, and at length were forced to relinquish the contest, Ex. viii. 19, ix. 11. This was an important point achieved, though it had little effect as yet upon Pharaoh. But even as it was, the power put forth in opposition to Moses had been exercised only in aggravating the evils brought upon the land; for their removal or mitigation the magicians were altogether powerless. Any relief obtained was avowed by the monarch himself to be from Jehovah through the intercession of Moses, Ex. viii. 21; an avowal which went on increasing, and accompanied with various though frequently extracted concessions by Pharaoh, as the infections grew in severity or were temporarily intermitted. The plague of frogs induced Pharaoh to implore through Moses the aid of Jehovah, Ex. viii. 1-7; the plague of lice exerted a permission for Israel to sacrifice in Egypt, and then, though afterwards revoked, to proceed a short distance hence, Ex. ix. 25. The hail-storm—the seventh plague—was forth the confession: "I have sinned against Jehovah your God, and against you," Ex. x. 16; the announcement of this plague having drawn forth a permission for the adult males to go away to sacrifice, Ex. x. 17; while the ninth plague secured a further permission for the whole of the people to go, provided their flocks and herds were left behind, Ex. x. 21—conditions, however, to which Moses refused to accede. And now followed a judgment which brought matters to a crisis, and led on to the expulsion of the Israelites, Ex. xi. 1-11. Although the result was only a temporary and forced submission on the part of Pharaoh, the effects on the Egyptians were otherwise: some of them practically acknowledged the power of Jehovah, for on the announcement of the hail-storm a number took advantage of the warning to house their servants and cattle; and afterwards, on the announcement of the locusts, the very couriers urged the king to submit in this now evidently unavailing contest, Ex. xi. 7.

The impression thus made upon the Egyptians is further discernible in the notice: "And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians. Moreover, the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people," Ex. xi. 6. This, coupled with the anxiety felt for the Israelites' speedy departure, Ex. xii. 29, fully explains the readiness with which, on request, the latter were furnished with raiment and other articles of value, Ex. xii. 35-36. This transaction has been placed in an unfair light by the unfortunate rendering of 'segu (deod), and its·lithpil form 'segu (deod), by 'borrowing' and ' lending' respectively; the latter after the J.N.A., and 'regarding' and 'Vulg. 'out commendation cis,' Ex. xii. 36, whereas the simple meaning is, in the one case 'to ask' or 'request' (see Ex. xii.), and in the other, 'to cause or induce to ask,' that is, to comply with the request, or to give freely and gladly; as when Hannah dedicates the infant Samuel to the Lord, I Sam. i. 2, where the same term is also improperly rendered 'bought.' It was not purely for the mere purpose of enriching the Israelites, and by any means however questionable, that an arrangement so important that it is three times noticed in this record, and was also pre-intimated in the patriarchal history, was had recourse to, but rather for the elucidation of the principle exemplified in the exodus itself, and in all the acts which attended to it. What now occurred in Egypt was a type of all the future contests of Israel with heathenism: 'And they shall spoil those that spoiled them, and rob them that robbed them, saith the Lord God.' Ezek. xxviii. 18.

The effect on the Hebrew people themselves of these interpositions was designed to vindicate the personality and holiness of God, as well as the distinctness of his chosen people" (Hackett, Chris. and Other Masters, p. 198), appears in their response to Moses' song of deliverance: "I will sing unto Jehovah, for he hath triumphed gloriously; Jehovah is my strength and song; and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him," Ex. xii. 12. The divine purpose intended of Israel at the outset of these proceedings—"Ye shall know that I am Jehovah your God," Ex. xii. 12—is here seen to be realized; Jehovah is acknowledged to be Israel's God and the God of their fathers, to whom however he was known rather as Ex. xi. 7. As Jehovah, the Almighty, the name Jehovah entered into the composition of proper names, as in the case of Jochebed, the mother of Moses, Ex. vii. 12, and Bethiah, a daughter of Pharaoh, who married Mered of the tribe of Judah, rch. iv. 7. This last instance is remarkable, the assumption of this peculiarly Hebrew name must have been on her marriage with the Israelite, and if so, here is an Egyptian Ruth, declaring: 'Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God,' (see Kuenen, Geschichte Agypten, 1838, p. 322.)

Having this definite object—the revelation of Jehovah—the plagues inflicted on the Egyptians will be found in striking correspondence with its specific aim. They were not mere prodigies or arbitrary displays of power, but were directed to the promotion of particular truths and the subversion of the opposite errors. In particular they are found to bear a special relation to Egypt in respect both to the physical characteristics of that land, and to the kind of idolatrous worship then practiced—two things more or less related in all forms of heathenism.

The connection of the Mosaic plagues with certain physical characteristics and phenomena of Egypt did not escape the notice of some of the English deistical writers of the last century and others, who at once fancied that this circumstance sufficiently disposed of everything miraculous in their character. They maintained that the biblical narrative was only an invention of the unlettered mass of the people. But the plagues were preceded by the exodus; and this connection has an importance, were it only as a testimony to the minute acquaintance of the author of the Mosaic narrative with the land which forms the scene of his history, in the events of which he presents himself as personally participating. But with respect to the rationalistic argument deduced from this connection of the natural with the supernatural, let it be noticed, as remarked by Hengstenberg, that "the supernatural presents generally in the Scriptures no violent opposition to the natural, but rather unites in a friendly alliance with it," and that there were besides, in the nature of the present controversy, special reasons why the natural basis should be brought prominently into view. The object to which, as already remarked, all these occurrences were directed, was the revelation of Jehovah as God, not merely of the oppressed and despised Hebrews, but also as God over Pharaoh and over Egypt—"Jehovah in the midst of the earth," Ex. viii. 22, and on all its lands, v. 19. "Well-grounded proof of this could not have been produced by bringing suddenly upon Egypt a succession of strange terrors. From these it would only have followed that Jehovah had received a momentary and external power over Egypt. On the contrary, if the events which annually returned were placed under the immediate control of Jehovah, it would be appropriately shown that he was God in the midst of the land, and the doom of the false gods which had been placed in his stead would go forth, and they would be entirely driven out of the jurisdiction which was considered as belonging to them" (Hengstenberg, Egypt and the Books of Moses, p. 57, Edin 1844).

To these conclusions of Hengstenberg as to the extent of the natural in the plagues of the exodus, exception will of course be taken by the objectors. But if this be admitted to be the case as thus presented their objections at least are fully disposed of, while enough still remains to evince the miraculous character of the transactions.

Hengstenberg, indeed, and also Osborn (Dea in Egypt, 2d ed., Lond. 1850) extend this natural basis to an unwarrantable degree; for in order to find in the phenomena of Egypt something corresponding to the several plagues, they protract the time over which these events extended to a length not supported by any statement in the history. But however this may be, the supernatural is distinctly visible throughout. It is not at all a question of degrees or of fortunate concurrence. Had there been anything of this kind, it certainly would not have been lost on Pharaoh or on his advisers, whose interests it would have been, equally at least with the most sceptical of modern times, to resort for an explanation, if possible, to second causes. The great distinguishing fact however was, that these violations were under the control so far of Moses, the avowed messenger of Jehovah, that they followed upon his announcements, and were removed at his request; and further, that a line of demarcation was drawn between the Israelites in the district of Goshen and the Egyptians, and this more particularly in the case of so remarkable a phenomenon as the three days' darkness. Let the foundation in nature for this plague be as the writers last named, though with great improbability, maintain, the clausio, or hot wind of the desert, or whatever else it may, entire immunity from its effects by the Israelites in the immediate neighbourhood, or, in other words, thick darkness overshadowing Egypt, with light shining upon the Israelitish dwellings, is a phenomenon inexplicable on any principles of meteorology or other science. (See Hawkins' Monuments of Egypt, p. 258, N. York, 1841.)

The nature of these plagues is still further illustrated, and their adaptation to the object they were designed to accomplish, when they are viewed in relation to the various forms of Egyptian idolatry. Although this matter has been pushed to an extravagant length by Bryant (Observations on the Pharaoh's edict upon the Egyptians, 2d ed. Lond. 1838), there is undoubtedly much truth in his theory. His error lies chiefly in the specification of the several deities against which the plagues were directed. It is expressly stated that the controversy was with the gods of Egypt. "Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment; I am Jehovah," Ex. viii. 19, and the way in which it was decided is strikingly testified, apart from other considerations, in the impression which the events of the exodus produced on the priest of Midian. "Now know I that Jehovah is greater than all gods; for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly he was above them," Ex. vii. 11. But it is not only this general bearing of the plagues that is apparent; the specific application of several of them at least can be distinctly discerned. The object of the first two—the changing of the Nile water into blood and the production of frogs by the river—is exceedingly significant. The Nile was to the Egyptians a special object of regard, and even of worship. Being almost the only potable water in Egypt, and besides being of a most pleasant description, the impurity of the Nile water shall banish man from the water of the river," Ex. vii. 19, had a peculiar force. The worship of the Nile reached back to the earliest period. The monuments show the kings presenting oblations and paying divine honours to the river. A reference to this worship is contained in the directions given to Israel at the Red Sea, Ex. xiv. 2, "Stand in the midst of the sea," and, in the case as thus presented their objections at least are fully disposed of, while enough still remains to evince the miraculous character of the transactions.

The message of Jehovah was thus brought before him as he was preparing to bring his daily offerings to his false gods. In the second plague again, which was closely connected with the first, the river, which was locked off by the Egyptians as the source of all their blessings, was converted into a fruitful parent of the most loathsome creatures; and never was the impotency of their gods more palpably shown. It was to drive away the frogs, which were exceedingly annoying even in ordinary years, that in Egypt, p. 220, the river was put out in the morning to the water, Ex. vii. 20. It was to drive away the frogs, which were exceeding ever to remark, that notwithstanding the distinct specification of localities, which at the time most doubtless have been simply sufficient to identify their position, and which even now, in the estimate of such as are acquainted with the region, are indubitable proofs of the accuracy of the narrative, the line of march cannot be determined with any certainty. This arises in part from the absence of any definite information regarding the situation of Goshen, where the Israelites dwelt, or of Ramesses, where they took their departure, Ex xiii, 2, and partly from the want of any note of the time occupied on their journey, when Pharaoh overtook them enamped by the Red Sea. It is of the more importance to advert to the absence of any indications of time in connection with this part of the journey, as Robinson (Biblical Researches, i. 252) assuming that "three days is the longest interval which the language of the narrative allows," makes this an argument in support of his hypothesis as to the direction of the journey, and consequently as to the locality of the passage of the Red Sea. Into the minute consideration of this latter much-mooted question, it is unnecessary to enter. There are, not, in fact, sufficient materials to enable us to come to a conclusion. The Israelites crossed in the neighbourhood of Suez is the view held by Robinson (Bib. Res. i. 332, 333), but he has found an able opponent in Wilson (lands of the Bible, p. 193, 194, 195). But indeed the question would have been of little importance, save for the attempts of some writers to divert it to the purpose of reducing the miracle as much as possible to a natural level, by eliminating such difficulties of the case as necessitated recourse to other than second causes, as the agency of the wind and an ebb tide. These considerations unquestionably have a great influence in recommending the neighbourhood of Suez as the scene of the passage, rather than any more southern point, where the greater depths of the sea would not so easily admit of their being dried up by natural causes. Should the passage however really have taken place at Suez, the locality must have undergone great geological changes since that remarkable occurrence, for at present the Red Sea at this point does not at all conform to the conditions of the case as laid down in the history. Robinson indeed allows that anciently this area of the gulf was less. wide and deeper, but when a width and depth are found which will correspond with the historical narrative, the question may be regarded as settled so far as concerns the miraculous character of the transaction.

The passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites, with the destruction of their pursuers, completed the victory of Jehovah, which was celebrated in Moses' song of thanksgiving and triumph, Ex x. The more immediate result with respect to the Israelites themselves was, that "Israel saw that great work which the Lord did upon the Egyptians, and the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and his servant Moses," Ex xii. 29. It was not, as already observed, to secure any secular deliverance or political privileges for the enthralled seed of Abraham, that Jehovah engaged in that struggle with Pharaoh, the conclusion of which is here recorded. Its object was more in accordance with the nature of the covenant in which it was first announced, Ex xii, 13, and of the whole volume in which it is recorded, Ex x, 19; Deut. xiv, 1. Nor was it with Pharaoh in his individual capacity, or yet as simply ruler of Egypt, but rather as the representative of the world power, or heathenism, that this controversy was waged, and for the express purpose of morally and spiritually elevating and sanctifying the covenant people from that heathenism into which they had so deeply sunk in the land of their sojournings. The form in which the controversy was assumed was determined by the circumstances of that particular epoch in the evolution of the divine scheme. But while it had thus a special aspect as regards the time and the conditions then present, it had still an aspect to the future; and so it was that the last of this great and significant series of plagues—the death of the first-born of the Egyptians—led to the institution of the passover and the dedication of the first-born of the Israelites, as representing the whole community, to the Lord their Redeemer, Ex xiii, 11.

EXODUS, THE BOOK OF. 1. Names and Contents. The second book of the Pentateuch is in Hebrew named as usual from its first terms, בְּנֵי-שֵׁרְאָבָטת, or simply בְּנֵי-שֵׁרְאָבָטת. "And these are the names," or "Names," but by the LXX, Εξοδός, or ὁ περάτωρ, viz. from Egypt, because of the principal event with which it is occupied, and which constituted the very birth of the Israelitish nation as the chosen covenant people of Jehovah. The contents of Exodus, though not embracing such a variety of incidents as Genesis, are of a more diversified character, being not merely historical, but also and in a greater part legislative, or concerned with instructions having all the authority of law, for the erection and arrangements of the Levitical tabernacle or sanctuary—the visible centre of the theocratic life. The subject matter arranged according to historical order forms three divisions, marked by the change of scene in and from Egypt through the Arabian desert to Mount Sinai.

1. The condition of Israel in Egypt, and the preparations for their departure thence, ch. i-xii, 26. viz. The rapid increase of Jacob's descendants gave occasion to their oppression by the Egyptian government, ch. ii; the birth and remarkable preservation of Moses, ch. ii 1-14; his flight to and settlement in Arabia, ch. iii 1-22; his divine commission to liberate his brethren, ch. iv 14-28; his journey to Egypt, and the infliction of the first nine plagues, ch. vi-xi, 29, preparation for the exodus; institution of the passover, and the conclusion of the plagues, ch. xii-xvii, 28.

2. Israel's march from Ramesses to Mount Sinai, ch. xii, 27-xvii, 1. viz. 11. Relation of the History to that of Genesis.—The close literary connection between the books of Genesis and Exodus is clearly marked by the Hebrew conjunctive particle, “and,” with which the latter begins, and still more by the recapitulation of the names of Jacob’s sons who accompanied him to Egypt, abridged from the fuller account in the, xvi. 8-17. Still the book of Exodus is not just a chronological sequel of the preceding history; for a very considerable interval is passed over in silence, saving only the remark: “And the children of Israel were fruitful and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty: and the land was filled with them,” Ex. i. 7. The preoccupation of all that concerned Israel during this period and their intercourse with the Egyptians, instead of being an indication, as rationalists allege, of the fragmentary character of the Pentateuch, only shows the sacred purposes of the history, and that in the plan of the writer, considerations of a merely political interest were entirely subordinate to the divine intentions already partially unfolded in Genesis, and to be still further developed in the course of the present narrative, regarding the national constitution of the seed of Abraham. The importance of the solitary remark introduced relative to the extraordinary increase of the Israelites, arises from its being viewed as the first step towards the realization of the promises made to Abraham of a numerous progeny and of territorial possessions for his seed, Gen. iii. 17. The observation was also necessary as explanatory of the oppressive measures resorted to by the Egyptian monarch for checking Israel’s rapid increase, but which, by a remarkable providence, secured a fitting education for the future deliverer and husband of this oppressed people, Ex. ii. 22, comp. Acts viii. 23, 25.

The formal diversity of the subject, arising from the gradual and at this stage distinctly marked evolution of the divine purposes concerning Israel, gives to the book of Exodus a distinct character from Genesis. The deliverance from Egypt was the commencement of Israel’s political existence, and this constituted the first important epoch in the history of Abraham’s seed as distinct from that of the individual patriarchs, and the merely personal and family relation. In the history of Jacob the individual had as regards the promises been developed into the family. There was no longer that exaction from the stem of blessing so noticeable hitherto in the case of the immediate offspring both of Abraham and Isaac. And the family again in time grew into a population in Egypt possessed of some measure of independence and self-government, as appears from the mention, even after their sorest oppression, of “children” of Israel, Ex. iii. 16; 18; the heads and representatives of tribes and families. While then the history of Genesis is chiefly personal history or biographic sketches, that of Exodus, on the contrary, is almost entirely of a public or national character, the only exception being with regard to the deliverer himself, whom God so remarkably raised up and endowed for the work intrusted to him; but even his personal history is introduced only so far as it served to illustrate that providence which watched over Israel, Ex. i. 22; iii. 1. The genealogy, too, of Moses and Aaron is subsequently introduced, ch. vi. 19-28; and inasmuch as the brothers belonged to the tribe of Levi, the third son of Jacob, this is preceded by a succinct genealogy of the two elder sons, Reuben and Simeon, ver. 14, 15. This genealogy of Moses and Aaron had, however, chiefly in view the prospective establishment of the priesthood in the family of the latter.

The circumstance adverted to, however, gives to the book of Exodus seemingly a more exclusive character as occupied with the interests of one community, and with external matters of a social and political character which many companionship in spirit of divine revelation. Objections of this kind overlook the special points of relation between this book and Genesis, one in particular of which is, that its history is a record of the accomplishment to a certain extent of the promises and predictions contained in Genesis. This has been already noticed with respect to the opening statement of Exodus as to the multiplication of the people in Egypt; but the same principle may be seen to pervade the whole book, giving a particular form or complexion as well to its legislative enactments as to its historical narrative. For instance, the fact that the case of Abraham of a numerous posterity, it was announced to him that they should be afflicted in a strange country, whence they should be delivered in the fourth generation with great substance—the effect of a divine judgment upon their oppressors, Gen. iv. 31-34. This was realized at the exodus, when “the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt,” Ex. xii. 11; even the very time of the deliverance corresponding, as the historian’s remark bears, to the prophetic announcement. A land also had been promised at the time of the ransoming of Abraham; and, accordingly that part of the history immediately following their deliverance from Egypt shows them on their march towards it. But the multiplication of Israel in Egypt, their deliverance thence, and their being put into possession of the Promised Land, were only means to the end expressed in the intimation that they should be blessed in themselves and prove a blessing to others, Gen. xvi. 2-3. Their deliverance from Egypt was in order to their entrance upon the service of the Lord, Ex. iv. 27; they were his “hosts,” ch. xi. 1; called to some specific work or warfare in connection with the divine purposes, the nature of which had been already declared in the call of Abraham and the covenant made with that patriarch, and to be more fully intimated in the Sinaitic covenant.

Two conditions indispensable to Israel’s fulfilling the purposes involved in their calling, were, first, that as a people they should be sufficiently numerous to occupy the land provided for them; and, secondly, that they should be possessed of a character fitting them for the discharge of the offices arising from this occupancy. For securing the first of these conditions there was required time, during which Israel should be kept in a state of isolation from the nations of the earth, among whom, without some extraordinary protection, they would certainly be lost, either by commingling or through violence—a fate which Jacob greatly feared after the massacre of the Shechemites, xxvii. 20. Watched over however by a divine providence, the seventy souls which went down with Jacob into Egypt soon increased to such a multitude as to occasion apprehensions to the government under which they lived, the effect of which was that measures were resorted to which served to unite more strongly their family and national associations, and wean them from the land of their sojournings, while this numerical increase more directly fitted them for taking possession of their own land. The multiplication of Israel, and their preservation as a distinct and separate people, were admirably secured by their removal to Egypt under the circumstances attendant on their migration thither, and by their settlement in the land of Canaan. The haughtiness which in general distinguished the natives of Egypt, and particularly the contempt with which they regarded foreigners, especially those engaged like the Israelites in pastoral avocations, etc. xi. 22, must have acted as a social hedge about the covenant-people. So great was the estrangement between the Israelites and the Egyptians, induced by these and other causes, that in two distinct passages in the Exodus, Ps. cxix. 13, etc., the language of Egypt is represented, notwithstanding their long residence in that country, as unintelligible to the Israelites. But another condition in this case was that Israel must acquire a suitable moral character. However adapted Egypt may have been as a nursery for the multiplication of the seed of Abraham, or the physical and intellectual growth of any ordinary community, it was unquestionably a very inadequate school for moral and spiritual discipline and for advancement in theological principles. So far from supplying incentives to such training, the very prosperity which attended the early part of their sojourn in Egypt, under the protection of Joseph, may have served to make the Israelites almost forget the land of Promise, and caused a contentment with their condition which it required severe oppression to overcome, while no doubt the sensuous worship around them would well nigh obliterate the faith and practice of their pilgrim fathers. Hence obviously the necessity for their subjection to the severe measures exercised over them, though with quite another view, by the Egyptian government, the result of which however was, that they were made to cry to the Lord by reason of their bondage, Ex. ii. 22, and rendered favourably disposed to the message brought to them by those who had charge of their fathers, Ex. iii. 1-4. The earlier professed interposition of Moses on their behalf was found to be premature; neither the people nor their self-appointed leader was yet sufficiently trained for the service to which they were respectively to be called. And even when, after a long course of discipline, they left Egypt, there was still much need for preparing the Israelites for their vocation. The wilderness, where Moses himself had been trained for his work, ch. vi. 12, must furnish also to the people the discipline so inadequately provided in Egypt. Accordingly arrangements were made from the very first for their temporary sojourn there, ch. 13, 15, 16; while through their obstinacy and unbelief there was subsequently occasion for its being greatly protracted. The preparation of Israel in the wilderness must be more however than a merely negative one; and hence the peculiar institutions under which they were now to be brought.

The ends to be answered by the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt and in the wilderness, may thus be seen to be the development of the provisions made to the fathers—arrangements, moreover, betokening the most adaptation of means to ends. Read with the commentary furnished by the history of Exodus, the book of Genesis acquires a new light; a special providence is seen holding all the threads of primordial and patriarchal life and weaving them into one grand tissue. Even matters which, at the time of their occurrence, appeared only as calamities, giving rise to such painful feelings as once found utterance in the complaint of Jacob, Gen. xii. 26, are seen to be parts of a gracious administration. Jacob no doubt, like his son Joseph, was brought to discern this; but the divine purposes which the latter discovered in his own eventful experience, etc. xxi. 7, are, by the further history of Exodus, placed in a still more striking light. And on the other hand, the history of Exodus, when taken along with the great principles announced in Genesis, assumes at once its true character and importance. It no longer appears confined to the management of an enslaved people and their formation into a free community, or to their civil and other temporal concerns, but is seen to embrace the spiritual interests, not simply of that community, but of mankind through them. Even more expressly than that of Genesis is the history of Exodus typical of the future. 111. The Character of its Legislation. The purposes for which Israel was set apart are stated in Ex. xix. 4-6. They were intended to constitute unto God "a peculiar treasure above of all or from amongst all people," which is explained by their forming to him "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." A kingdom implies a king; this must be Jehovah himself, for as all the subjects are priests, the king can only be God, who assumes over Israel sovereign rights and duties, including the supreme legislation, the ordinances which govern the community and regulate their foreign connections. The object of this arrangement appears from the nature of the kingdom "a kingdom of priests"—sustaining a mediatorial relation between God and the nations of the earth, as declared already in the promises to Abraham. For this purpose Israel is and must be "a holy nation"—set apart from the world to God, who is the absolute Holy One. Holiness was a primary requisite in the covenant-people, etc. xvii. 1, and to secure it was the great end of all the theological ordinances and arrangements. It is this which imparts its peculiar character to the Sinaiite legislation.

This legislation, which included civil as well as religious ordinances, opened with the promulgation of the moral law comprised in the decalogue, which was thus made the basis of Israel's peculiar constitution and polity. This fact clearly intimated that the civil and political exigencies of the people were not the only or even the chief object aimed at by the theocratic constitution. The Sinaiite legislation, though primarily intended to carry out the external separation of Israel, already to a certain extent effected by the providential arrangements of their history, and to be further completed by their subsequent location in Canaan, and also to secure their national existence through the operation of social and civil ordinances of an equitable and conservative character, ultimately aimed at their moral and spiritual training as the covenant-people, and also served to exhibit the truths implied in that peculiar relation of a people to Jehovah.

There was this remarkable peculiarity in the Mosaic legislation, that the religious enactments had a civil or judicial sanction, while the civil bore also a religious character. Transgression of a religious command was an offence against the state, and contempt of a civil ordinance came under the character of sin. This arose from the circumstance that the proper Head of the community was God and King in one person; God revealing himself and acting as Israel's king, and the king revealing himself and acting as God. This principle, however strange to, and indeed incompatible with, ordinary legislation, was indispensable to the purposes of the theocracy, immediately and directly intended as it was to build up a community, numerous indeed, but of recent growth, and which, instead of enjoying the blessings of freedom, had been long subjected to all the deteriorating influences of a crushing slavery—a community that was to be at once peculiarly blessed itself, and made the channel of exercising a blessed influence on mankind. But while the civil laws and ordinances, as well as those of a more religious character, given to Israel, were immediately intended for the condition of things attendant on the present wants of the people, they had still a typical or spiritual aspect and a reference to the future. Several of these enactments exhibited in practice great principles of government, which, however, they may vary in form according to the peculiar circumstances of a people, are essentially of universal application in promoting the great end of God with respect to man. It is because all these ordinances were variously interpreted and applied that it is difficult to draw a rigid distinction between what is strictly civil and the sacred or ceremonial in the Mosaic system. Even the properly moral, though essentially distinct, does not occupy a place apart from and independent of the rest. On the contrary, the various enactments form one complex whole, having one basis—the covenant into which God entered with his people, and one object—the realizing of the provisions of the covenant; and hence the terminus in which the law is spoken of in the New Testament, so various and apparently contradictory, but only so disregarding the aspect in which it is viewed. These considerations serve to vindicate the large space and the great importance given, in what purports to be a revelation from God, to matters of a direct civil character, and seemingly to such important details as the specifications for the structure and furnishings of the tabernacle; all of which in other circumstances, and with no ulterior object beyond the mere regulation of the affairs of a community, might have been left to be supplied by the ordinary methods of administration, without requiring to be established under divine sanction. The whole matter, however, assumes a different aspect when the ordinances, even the most seemingly trivial, are found to be, like the history in which they are included, fraught with great principles of eternal truth.

IV. Genuineness and Credibility.—The "document-hypothesis," which with the view of disproving the unity, and consequently the genuineness, of the Pentateuch, has been so largely applied to the book of Genesis, is, on the admission of these critics themselves, incapable of producing such decided results in the case of Exodus, insomuch as the distinguishing mark of the theory—the interchange of the divine names—ceases to be such after Ex. iii., when it is alleged the name Jehovah was first introduced. However, from some supposed diversities in the character of the legislation, some places indicating a priestly bias, and others more the features of the prophetic order, and from various alleged contradictions in the narrative, some substitute is found in support of the disintegrating criticism. Some particulars, for instance, in the account of the commission given to Moses for the deliverance of his brethren, present to Knobel—a quite recent writer on this book—such discrepancies as should have led him to suspect the soundness of his own theory, rather than refer them to the contradictory accounts of writers so related as his scheme assumes. A bare statement of some of these discrepancies will show that they have no reality, and serve as a sufficient refutation of the theory to which they owe their origin. Thus it is alleged that the place, according to the original narrative, where God first appeared to Moses was Egypt; God making himself known as Jehovah, that being the first intimation of the name, Ex. i. 2. Another account, it is further alleged, places the scene at Horeb, ch. ii. 11; God appearing as the God of the patriarchs, v. 3, and declaring his name Jehovah, ver. 11; while a third makes Midian the scene of the interview, ch. iv. 13. These assumptions require no refutation. It need only be remarked that the name Jehovah in ch. vi. 2 necessarily presupposes the explanation given of it in ch. iii. 14. Further, Moses' abode in Midian, and connection with Jethro, were matters, Knobel affirms, quite unknown to the older writer, while his statement that Moses was eighty years old when he appeared before Pharaoh, ch. vii. 7, is declared to be contradicted by the supplemental narrative which represents him as a young man at the time of his flight from Egypt, ch. ii. 11, and a son by Zipporah, whom he married probably on his arrival in Midian, is still young when he returned to Egypt, ch. iv. 20, 21; xiii. 2. There can be no question that from Moses' leaving Egypt till his return thither a considerable time elapsed. It is stated in Ex. ii. 23 as "many days," and by Stephen, Acts vii. 29, as forty years. But it is not necessary to suppose that his abode in Midian extended over the whole of that period. The expression ²⁵²². (marg.). "he sat down," or settled, Ex. ii. 11, may only point to Midian as the end of his wanderings; or if otherwise, his marriage need not have followed immediately on his arrival, or there may have been a considerable interval between the birth of his two sons. The abuse indeed of this part of the narrative regarding the birth of the second son may possibly be referrible to this circumstance, more probably indicated however by the different feelings of the father as expressed in the names Gershon and Eliezer, ch. xi. 22, xvi. 4. The order of these names is perplexing to expositors who conceive that the first thoughts of the fugitive would have been thankfulness for his safety, and that only afterwards would spring up the feelings of exile. But if the name Eliezer was bestowed in connection with the preparation to return to Egypt, and particularly with the intimation "all the men are dead which sought thy life," ch. iv. 19, the whole is strikingly consistent. Another instance of the alleged discrepancies is that, according to one account, Moses' reception from his brethren was very discouraging, ch. iii. 11; whereas the other narrative describes it as quite the reverse, ch. iv. 13. De Wette calls this a striking contradiction; but it is only such when the intermediate section, ch. iv. 23, which shows the change that in the interval had occurred in the prospects of the Israelites, is violently ejected from the narrative—a process fitted to produce contradictions in any composition. The only alleged factor of importance in this book is the remark relative to the constancy of the manna, ch. xvi. 13, which would seem to extend it beyond the time of Moses, particularly when compared with Josh. v. 11, 12, according to which the manna ceased not until after the passage of the Jordan. But, as remarked by Hungerberg, it is not of the cessation of the manna that the historian here writes, but of its continuance. Besides, "forty years" must be taken as a round number: for the manna, strictly speaking, listed about one month less, ch. vii. 2. On the other hand, so far from furnishing evidence of a later date this and the later books of the Pentateuch exhibit even more than Genesis the most marked traces of having been written in the wilderness after the deportation from Egypt, and by one who was an eye-witess of, and a chief agent in the matters recorded: in other words, no other than the lawgiver himself. (See Pentateuch.) Further, there are in these circumstances, as indicating a case of contemporaneous history, additional evidence of the credibility of the narrative.
As in the book of Genesis, there is the same intimate acquaintance with Egypt, whose very soil this history opens, and not less so with the Arabian desert, to which it is afterwards transferred. But a more direct testimony than the monuments of Egypt are the Hebrew monuments themselves, commemorative of the exodus and its concomitants. These monuments, though not of a material character, were as permanent as, and still more expressive than, some of the most solid structures erected to commemorate the great events in a nation's history. The regular observance of commemorative ordinances by the whole Israelitish community, parcularly when combined with the oral instruction which parents were directed to impart on such occasions to their children, Deut. xi. 19, was pre-eminent of this description. Of these standing ordinances the most important was unquestionably the passover, instituted as a memorial of the exodus, and the very birth of the nation, Ex. xii. 25, 27. There were other commemorative ordinances, but the next perhaps in importance to the passover was the feast of tabernacles, a memorial of the sojourn in the wilderness, Lev. xx. 1. All ordinances were introduced for the purpose comtemplated by these annual celebrations and reunions of tribes and families at the national sanctuary the centre of all authority, civil and sacred. Nothing indeed could have been better adapted for the conservation of the national unity and traditions, and for perpetuating the remembrance of the great incidents in the nation's history.

V. Chorpus. — The chief point of difficulty in connection with the notes of time contained in this book is the period assigned, Ex. xvi. 9, as that of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt; but with regard to this, see the article CHRONOLOGY. The whole period embraced in the book itself can only be approximately determined.
On the supposition made in the period referred to, that Levi was three years older than Joseph, he must have outlived the latter 21 years, Gen. xlii, 36, comp. with Ex. xvi. 16, and that Jechabel was 45 at the birth of Moses, and supposing she had been born even in the last year of her father Levi, the utmost limit between the death of Joseph and Moses' birth would thus be 68 years.
From the death of Moses to the departure from Egypt there were 89 years, with the additional time spent in trading with Pharaoh; and from the exodus to the erection of the tabernacle 1 year, in all about 150 years as the period comprised in this book.

EYES

EXORCISM, the formal ejection of evil spirits from the subjects possessed by them, and the persons who claimed or exercised the power of doing so were called Exorcists. Among the heathen the profession of exorcism seems to have been connected with invocations and magical arts of various kinds; and it would appear that the Romans, Jews, and general Gentiles, had such a power abroad in a similar connection. The Jewish exorcists mentioned in Ac. vi. 15, were evidently pretenders of this description, who, in the hands of the Jewish authorities, were deemed to be possessed of the power of evoking and driving away spirits. Josephus records in-hand instances of a similar kind, and speaks of the rites and names used for expelling the evil spirits (Ant.
iv. 2. 5, 19; Wars. vi. 3. 7). Other cases, however, are noticed, in which the power of exercising seems to have been more extensively put forth, and to have been attended with the desired result. When charged by the Pharisees with casting out devils by Beelzebub, our Lord said unto them, 'if it is by the finger of God, that such a power is used, no power can be put forth against it' (Mt.
xii. 27). Accordingly, the power was not only probably restrained within very narrow limits, and dependent on special acts of fasting and prayer, but was in actual operation. A case is also mentioned in which Christ granted it to a person, who, for some reason unexplained, stood aloof from the company of his disciples, larvae. But such were to be regarded as somewhat exceptional and peculiar cases; and it is only in Christ himself, and his immediate disciples, that the tom doctrine is to be found in the Christian church.

EYES, or EYELIDS. PAINTING OF THE. This is an ancient oriental practice, which was known to the Hebrews, and is occasionally referred to in Scripture. Jechabel is spoken of as "painting her eyes' not face, as in the English versions; but she presented herself in public, 2 Ki. 13. 20; and the painting of the eyes, or, as Herodotus puts it, painting the eyes with painting. This is mentioned among the things by which women sought to win admiration of their persons, i.e., in Egypt. It is one of those practices which, however peculiar and confined to particular localities, have yet succeeded in maintaining through all vicissitudes their hold to the present time. The modern Egyptian females still retain the use of dyesing materials for their eyes. Speaking of the general beauty of their eyes, Mr. Lane says, "Their charming effect is much heightened by the concealment of the other features (however pleasing the latter may be), and is rendered still more striking by a practice, universal among the females of the higher and middle classes, and very common among those of the lower orders, which is blackening the edge of the eyelids, both above and below the eyes, with a black powder called kohl. This is a collyrium, commonly composed of the smoke-black which is produced by burning a kind of Pan— an aromatic resin—a species of frankincense, used. I am told, in preference to the better kind of frankincense, as being cheaper and equally good for this purpose.

Kohl is also prepared of the smoke-black produced by burning the shells of almonds. These two kinds, though believed to be beneficial to the eyes, are used merely for ornament; but there are several kinds used for their real or supposed medicinal properties; particularly the powder of several kinds of lead-ore; to which are often added saepece, long-pepper, sugar-candy, fine dust of a Venetian sequin, and sometimes powdered pearls. Anthonys's, it is said, was formerly used for painting the edges of the eyelids. The kohl is applied with a small probe of wood, ivory, or silver, tapering towards the end but blunt; this is moistened sometimes with rose-water, then dipped in the powder, and drawn along the edges of the eyelids; it is called mircus, and the glass vessel in which the kohl is kept mukh-bahh.

The custom of thus ornamenting the eyes prevailed among both sexes in Egypt in very ancient times; this is shown by the sculptures and paintings in the temples and tombs of this country: and kohl-vessels, with the probes, and even with the remnants of the black powder, have often been found in the ancient tombs.

In many cases the ancient mode of ornamenting with the kohl was a little different from the modern, as shown by the subjoined sketch: I have, however, seen this ancient mode practised in the present day in the neighbourhood of Cairo, though I only remember to have noticed it in two instances. The same custom," he adds, "existed among the ancient Greek ladies, and among the Jewish women in early times" ("Modern Egyptians, vol. i. ch. 11. see also Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, vol. ii. 170.

[558] EZEKIEL [trod shall strengthen], one of the three greater Jewish prophets, and the prophet more especially of the captivity. We know nothing of him except in connection with his prophetic agency—the only scriptural notices of his life, and the only certain information respecting it, which we possess, being found in the different headings of his own prophecies. From these we learn that he was a priest, the son of Buzi, and that he entered on his calling as a prophet by the river Chebar, or Chaldea, in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, ch. i. 1, which, by comparing another passage, we perceive to have been that also of his own, ch. xxii. 21. Josiah furnishes the additional testimony from tradition, that he was a young man at the period of his captivity. What his precise age may have been, however, cannot be certainly determined—unless another date given for the commencement of his prophetic career be understood of his own period of life. He says it was "in the thirtieth year," that is, thirty years, for he was only thirty years of age at the time of the captivity. But it has been doubted, and indeed by later commentators most commonly disbelieved, that the date in question refers to his age as a man, on the ground, more especially, of its being unusual for the prophets to connect their predictions with the time of life at which they were uttered, and of the quite general manner in which the year in question is mentioned. This last reason, however, seems to apply equally to any other era that can be thought of, as is evident from the diversity that appears among commentators in regard to the one that should be preferred. Some would date the thirty years from the eighteenth of Josiah, when with the finding of the book of the law in the temple a kind of public reformation began; so the Chaldee, Jerome, Theodore, Grutius, Havernick, &c. Others would connect it with the Nabopolassarian era, which was coeval with the reign of Nebuchadnezzar's father, or the Chaldean dynasty: so Pradus, Scaliger, Puri.

zouns, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, Ezekiel. But neither of these events stands out so prominently, or had so distinct a bearing on God's future communications to His people, that on the bare mention in them of a certain year any one should have thought of specifically connecting it with the one or the other. Nothing similar to this can be pointed to in any of the other prophetic writings. And though it be true that it was not usual to mention the particular year of a prophet's life when he received divine communications, yet it is not quite unusual to connect them with the relative age of the prophet; as in the case of the young child Samuel, the speaking Daniel, the aged Simeon and Anna, xca. xi, 14; lxxv. 28. If Ezekiel, therefore, had here indicated the precise period of his life at which he entered on his prophetical calling, it would only have been a little farther in the same direction, than was followed in other instances.

Besides, the case of Ezekiel was somewhat peculiar; and in that peculiarity we may perhaps find an intelligible reason why he should have notified the thirtieth year, as that on which he began to see the visions of God. It is as "Ezekiel the priest," ch. 1, that he reports himself to have seen these; and as the Levites, so by inference the priests, were wont to enter on their duty of service in their thirtieth year, now, as in the absence of the temple at Jerusalem, the Lord promised that he should himself be a sanctuary to the believing portion of the exiles on the banks of the Chebar, ch. i, 26, so Ezekiel, by means of his supernatural revelations, was to be in the room of the ministering priesthood. At his mouth they were to seek the law of the Lord; and if they did so, would find God even nearer to them, than they should have done amid the corruptions of the temple-service at Jerusalem. It seems, therefore, to have been the intention of the prophet, by designating himself so expressly a priest, and a priest that had reached his thirtieth year, to represent his prophetical agency to his exiled countrymen as a kind of priestly service, to which he was divinely called at the usual period of life. And then the opening vision, which revealed a present God enthroned above the cherubim, came as the formal institution of that ideal temple, in connection with which he was to minister in things pertaining to the kingdom of God. It seems chiefly from overlooking this distinctive character and design of Ezekiel's agency as a prophet, that the difficulty respecting the thirtieth year has been experienced. The prophet wished to mark at the outset the priestly relation in which he stood both to God and to the people. And thus also the end corresponds with the beginning; for it is as a priest delineating the rise of a new and more glorious temple, that he chiefly unfolds the prospect of a revived and flourishing condition to the remnant of spiritual worshippers among whom he laboured; Ezekiel, p. 23; see also Hengstenberg's Christology, iii, p. 14.

It seems, then, every way probable, that Ezekiel was twenty-five years old when he was carried captive, along with Jehoiachin and multitudes of his countryman, to the territory of Babylon, and that at the age of thirty he was by the call and revelations of God raised from a priest to a prophet, but a prophet that he might thereby do priestly service. How long he continued in the discharge of this high service we cannot precisely tell; but one of his later prophecies is dated in the twenty-seventh year of his captivity, ch. xxx. 15, which presents him to our view as active in the discharge of his prophetical function when turned fifty. But this was probably not the last of his communications; several prophecies, at least, are given after it, and probably in part came later, containing the messages of comfort and consolation he had to address to the covenant-people after the desolation of Jerusalem. Over how many years these later revelations may have been spread we cannot tell; nor is the interval varied by the relation of any incident in his career. So that the later as well as the earlier period of his career is alike shrouded in obscurity.

Far, remote as Ezekiel was from the land of his birth, and lying in his new sphere of action a kind of independent agency, he yet stood in a close relation to the remnant that was still left in Judea, and even to the prophetical ministry exercised there by Jeremiah. Portions of his writings cannot be properly understood without hearing this in mind. One of the reigning delusions about the time when Ezekiel began his public ministry, both at Jerusalem and on the banks of the Chebar, was that the calamities which had come upon the house of David and the people of Judah would soon come to an end, and that not only would Jerusalem be restored, but that those who had fallen into captivity should shortly be allowed to return. False prophets encouraged this delusion in Judea, and they did not want their associates among the exiled community on the Chebar. Jeremiah strove to dissipate it; and in doing so, is particularly noticed as having sent a letter to the exiles in Babylon, in which he warned them against believing the false prophets who held out flattering hopes of their speedy and certain return to Judea, assumed that there should be no return till the period of seventy years had been accomplished in their captivity, and exhorted them to submit themselves to the hand of God, and to seek him with all their hearts, ch. xxx. It was in the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign, which coincided with that of Jehoiachin's captivity, that this letter was sent; and so contrary was its tenor to the spirit of the captives who received it, that one of them wrote back to the high-priest in Jerusalem, complaining in the strongest terms of its statements, and even that such an one as Jeremiah should be allowed to go at large, Jer. xxxi. 22. It was this state of things, and these transactions in particular, which formed the immediate occasion of Ezekiel's call to the prophetical office. Hence it took place very shortly after, in the fifth year of the captivity, and the record of it commences somewhat after the fashion of an interrupted narrative, with the historical formula, "And it came to pass," &c. On this account, also, the whole of the earlier part of his prophecies, to the close of ch. xxiv., is predominantly of a severe, criminatory, and threatening character, having for its main object the exposure of the hypocrisies and delusions which ruled among the Israelites both at Jerusalem and in Babylon, and the announcement of the yet greater judgments and desolations which were to be sent upon the land of the covenant, and through which alone the path lay to a brighter future.

In this part of his prophetical writings and labours Ezekiel appears as an energetic, earnest, spiritually-devoted man, wrestling with the evils of the time, and more intent on vindicating the righteousness of God than hopeful of meanwhile prevailing against the tide.
of human apostasy. A darker night, he well foresaw, must come before the break of a new day. But such a day he also from the first discerned, and frequently, throughout this gloomier portion of his writings, gives the distinct intimation of the good that was in store for the covenant people, for example, ch. i. 24, xi. 14, seq.; xii. 22-23, &c. When the worst actually came, and everything in which they trusted was at last laid in ruin, with equal certainty he knew that they turned his eye to the new direction in which they were now required, and by his nobly-reliant faith, and life-like exhibitions of mercy and grace yet to be revealed, he rallied the scattered forces of the covenant, and mightily strengthened them to encourage themselves in God. In both respects he proved a true Ezekiel, himself strengthened by God, and in turn strengthening others; "a man," as justly described by Hengstenberg, "who lifted up his voice like a trumpet, and declared to Israel their sins; whose word fell like a hammer upon the pleasant dream and projects in which they had indulged, and ground them to powder; whose whole appearance furnished the strongest proof that the Lord was still among his people; who was himself a temple of the Lord, before whom the so-called temple at Jerusalem, which was still allowed to stand for a season, sunk into its proper nonentity — a spiritual Sunam, who grasped with his powerful arm the pillars of the idol temple and cast them to the ground — a strong gigantic nature, fitted on that very account to struggle successfully against the Babylonish spirit of the age, which revealed its presence in such things as were strong, gigantic, and grotesque — standing alone, yet equal to a hundred pupils from the schools of the prophets" (Christology, ch. ii. 3).

The writings of Ezekiel contain undoubted evidence that his spiritual labors were not in vain. The people who had the more immediate benefit of them were indeed in a degenerate state; they are described as a rebellious people, among whom he should have to dwell as among thorns and scorpions, ch. ii. 6, 7; yet there were better elements intermixing with the evil, and a pointed contrast is even drawn by Jeremiah between them and those who still remained in Jerusalem, ch. xxviii. In proof of this the elders of the community often appear before Ezekiel, waiting to hear what communication he had received from the Lord, ch. vi. 1, xx i. And by the time of the release from Babylon, which could scarcely be more than twenty-five or thirty years after the close of his labors, and no doubt in a good degree owing to the character and success of these, a greatly improved spirit observed itself in the remnant that came back, and the Jews generally of the dispersion now took a marked rise in their spiritual position. From that time they became less dependent upon the ceremonialism of the temple and its ritual services, and approached nearer to the condition of a people worshipping God in spirit. The conviction grew upon their minds that God could be acceptably served in any land, and that his law could be maintained in its substance while many of its forms had to fall into abeyance. This freer spirit, forming, as it did, an internal development of Judaism, and an important preparation for the dispensation of the gospel, required the impulse and sanction of divinely inspired men for its commencement. It found such partly in Daniel and his circle, who, in the very midst of heathen abominations, adhered steadfastly to the belief and worship of Jehovah; but in Ezekiel, at once a priest and a prophet, it had its more distinct institution as a new phase in the kingdom of God. More than any other individual he may be regarded as the founder of the synagogal worship, which so materially modified that of the temple, and proved of incalculable moment in respect to the maintenance and propagation of the true knowledge of God.

The writings of Ezekiel fall quite naturally into two great divisions: the first being the covenant with sin and judgment, primarily as connected with the covenant people, but including also, in several most characteristic discourses, the state and doom of the surrounding nations, ch. i.-xxi.; the second disclosing in a series of revelations the purpose of mercy, which was yet destined to be fulfilled in behalf of the people of God, and the state of ultimate perfection to which the divine kingdom should be raised, ch. xxii.-xxvi. When looked into more closely, they fall into various smaller divisions, which are most naturally formed by the headings written by the prophet himself and indicating the respective periods of the successive revelations. These are altogether eight, and they appear for the most part to have been arranged in the order of time. The closing series, however, occupying the last nine chapters, and embracing the vision of the temple, was in point of time earlier than at least one of the preceding revelations that recorded in ch. xxix, 17 seq., the former belonging to the twenty-fifth, the latter to the twenty-seventh year of the captivity; and it is quite probable that the temple-vision was put last, both from its own peculiar character, and as forming by itself a complete whole, though several of the communications placed before it may actually have been imparted at a later period.

There is a striking individuality in Ezekiel's writings, the reflex of his native cast of mind, as operated on by the adverse circumstances of the time, and the high calling he had to fulfill. In his case, as in that of other inspired men, the Spirit of God did not violently control, but graciously adapted itself to the mental peculiarities of the prophet, and gave these an impulse and direction as was needed for the work he had to do. Here there were peculiarities greater than usual, both in the work to be done and in the man who had to do it. He was like one standing in the midst of falling pillars, shaking foundations, and ultimately smoking ruins, and had to summon all his strength to prevent the evil from reaching a hopeless consummation. Impression, therefore, was what he most of all sought to produce; his aim was to awaken, to arouse, to give life and reality to the great objects of faith, and clothe them to men's view, as it were, with the attributes of flesh and blood. To this end the distinctive properties of his mind were rendered by the Spirit of God eminently subservient; for his vivid imagination, his realistic nature, his enthusiastic temperament, resolve and active energy, when baptized with heavenly fire and made conversant with the visions of God, gave a wonderful force and vividness to the things he delineated, and pressed on the consciousness of men. The ideal in his hands became like the real; prophecy took the form of history; the symbols of things pertaining to the kingdom of God seemed to merge into the things themselves. These peculiarities in the writings of Ezekiel, which only rendered them the more adapted to their immediate purpose, necessarily give rise to certain difficulties of interpretation, which led the rabbins to issue the foolish prohibition, that no one should read them till he...

In regard to commentaries, one of the earliest, and certainly the most voluminous, is that of the two Spanish Jesuits, Prados and Villalpandus. 1598, which, however, as a commentary, is not complete, by much the greater part being occupied with intangible discussions in regard to the measurement and construction of the temple. Even in the exegetical part it is chiefly valuable as a repository of the opinions of the fathers who could not find their way to much that is peculiar in Ezekieli, and to lend it still as is very often done in catalogues, as "the best commentary on Ezekieli that was ever written," is simply absurd. It is no doubt an old Jesuit edition, first pronounced probably two centuries ago or more, which continues to be repeated by interested book-sellers, and such critics as are more conversant with catalogues than books. Calvin's commentary, though it extends only to the first twenty chapters, and is not by any means the happiest specimen of his exegetical powers, is yet of more value, as far as it goes, than the more tedious tomes of Prados and Villalpandus. The commentary of Greenhill, like many of the Puritan expositions, is tawdry and prolix, and is rather a collection of common-places on the prophet than a serviceable exposition. Newcome's translation and notes proved too much on the principle of altering the text and received meanings of words in different passages; so also do the productions of Walck and Hitzig; though on many points they may both be consulted with advantage. By much the best foreign commentary on Ezekieli is undoubtedly Havernick's (1835), and the latest English commentaries are those of Dr. E. Henderson and of Dr. Fairbairn (1872).

EZION-GEREB (probably, a man's handwriting), a very ancient town on the eastern arm of the Red Sea. The Israelites made it one of their halting-places, (N. a xeni, 25;) and in much later times, when Solomon turned his attention to commerce, it was from that port that he sent his fleet to Ophir, (1 K. iv. 25.) It seems to have remained for a considerable time in the hands of the kings of Judah, or at least accessible to them, for Jeho-ash that also mentions it as a place, (2 K. vi. 17; but from his improper alliance with the house of Ahaz he met with disaster in his commercial enterprise. Josu. states that the place afterwards received the name of Geresene, (Ant. iv. 6.) No modern travellers have found any traces of the city, and as it lay near to Elath, some have supposed that it may have been its capital.

EZION-GEREB. 561

Ezra, Book of.

This contains the account of the return of the Jews from Babylon, after that city had been taken by Cyrus king of Persia; and it touches on the difficulties which the people had to encounter under succeeding Persian monarchs, until the temple was completely rebuilt in the sixth year of Darius. From this event a sudden transition is made to the seventh year of king Artaxerxes, when Ezra the scribe was commissioned by the king to go up to Jerusalem and restore the framework of the Jewish polity, an undertaking which he accomplished even to the extent of restoring the original Mosaic law of marriage; and the book concludes with a list of those who put away their heathen wives of forbidden nations. The belief of the Jewish authorities, without any known exception or hesitation, was that Ezra himself composed the book which bears his name. And there is no sufficient reason for questioning this traditional belief, since it is so clearly denied by any one that Ezra wrote a part, or is there any evidence against the unity of the composition, or any difficulty which stands in the way of assigning it to the age of Ezra. Both of these statements will be more fully explained in the course of this article. But the daily and the completion of the book have been alike assured, on certain internal grounds, which have not appeared satisfactory to those who are accustomed to treat the Scriptures with special reverence, or even impartially. By taking a view of the subjects treated in the book, we may easily observe the plan of it, and arrive at the conclusion that it is one whole; that is to say, it is neither a fragment of a larger historical work, as some writers affirm, nor a collection of unconnected fragments, according to the assertion of others. It is not indeed a connected history, such as classical or modern historians might have given; but the same may be said of the history in the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua, Judges, &c., whose unity has been denied for equally inadequate reasons. But, like them, it is the record of God's dealing with the Israelites as his church and people, so that many civil and political details are passed over in silence, while the writer dwells on other points which might seem of subsidiary importance according to a more earthly standard. The course of events recorded in these ten chapters appears to be as follows: First, the decree of king Cyrus, putting an end to the Babylonish captivity, and instructing the returning Israelites to rebuild the temple and restore the worship of Jehovah. Secondly, the consequent proceedings of the people, ch. i. Third, the hindrances to which they were exposed by the jealousy of the Persian government, stimulated as this was by the hatred of the neighbours of the Jews, until Darius discovered the original decree of Cyrus, and confirmed and extended it, so that the temple was fully rebuilt, and the worship restored according to the law, ch. i. & c. Fourth, the mission of Ezra, who was both a priest and a scribe, who was empowered by king Artaxerxes not only to superintend the building of the temple, but, greatly more than that, to re-constitute the entire theocratic administration, only reserving the temporal supremacy of the Persian monarchy, ch. vi. & c. And, lastly, the reconstruction of this theocratic state, which Ezra effected so completely, that he carried the people with him in remodelling the family relations by the law against intermarriage with certain races, ch. vi. & c. This is a complete narrative in itself; and there is no room for the hypothesis that Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, taken together, form one great historical work. Three arguments for this hypothesis are of no weight in themselves for establishing the conclusion; and in so far as they are fair statements of fact, they are willingly put forward by us as circumstances worthy of consideration in themselves, and apart from the illogical purpose to which they have been applied. 1. The three books have a large number of words and phrases in common, which are not met with at all, or at least frequently, in other parts of Scripture. This agrees well with their composition at a new epoch in the history of the Hebrew nation and its literature, by men who had been brought up in the land of Assyria.
of Babylon, perhaps brought up together at the same Persian court; Ezra and Nehemiah being also most intimate friends and fellow-workers. The opinion is also probable that the Chronicles were compiled by Ezra, as well as the book to which his own name has been given. 2. There is a prolificion for genealogical details running through all these books. This seems to have been characteristic of the age; and it was probably necessary, considering the efforts to restore the old arrangements as to the holding of property, the administration of government, and the preservation of ancient national feeling; all of which objects were likely to force genealogical inquiries upon the notice of men. 2. There is a similar prominence given to details about the priests and Levites. This is unavoidable in any treatment of the people of Israel, unless their character as the church of God is to be overlooked. And especially, in whatever proportion there were difficulties felt as to the revival of the more political aspects of the theocracy, in that same proportion must the greater attention have been given to its ecclesiastical arrangements. But those who are ready to suspect that all these accounts are to be treated by the true critic as if they really marked off one single book of history, shut their eyes to the positive and unmistakable evidences of their existence in independent integrity. For, whereas the rash assertion has been made that Chronicles and Ezra at first formed one book, because Chronicles end with the two verses with which Ezra begins; the contrary inference would really be more fairly deducible from the facts of the case. How else do we account for the words occurring in both these books, and in each of them appropriately, so that they cannot be avowedly taken out of place without disadvantage? How should the Chronicles end with a word which is in the middle of a sentence in Ezra? And how came it that there are variations of a word or two between the passages, if we venture on the hypothetical allegation that some transcriber was so intent upon his work as to write on without Chronicles, from an unillustrated copy, the sentences which he was going to put at the head of what he called the book of Ezra, according to the innovation which was coming into favour in his time! Again, as the commencement of the book of Ezra is thus marked off quite distinctly from the termination of the books of Chronicles, so also the termination of the book of Ezra is distinctly marked by the accomplishment of his spiritual and moral reforms, which were achieved when the people had "made an end," ch. x. 17, of the terrible act of self-sacrifice implied in their divorces. We might even conjecture that there was some revision of feeling after this strongest of all possible acts in the direction of reviving the theocracy; and that from that time forward Ezra would have been less suitable as the chief instrument for carrying out the purposes of God. His moral and spiritual worth was approved to the utmost; but in order to lead on the people with effect, a new and popular agent was raised up in the person of Israel's great political benefactor, Nehemiah. And while he secured the cooperation of Ezra in all things belonging to the domain of the Word of God, he, himself, in his official capacity as civil governor, and with his personal influence as at once the favourite of the king and the wealthy friend of the people, was designated as the leading person for completing the work of restoration, by rebuilding the walls of the city, and by actua-ally executing those political improvements for which the pre-requisite of liberty had been granted when Ezra was sent to his countrymen. Accordingly, the book of Nehemiah has a title of its own, "The words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah," by which its independent character is asserted. And the fact placed in opposition to this, that the Jews reckoned Ezra and Nehemiah to be but a single book, is not to be put on an equality with the testimony of the Scripture itself, especially as the Jews seem to have thrown certain books into one in other cases besides this; the minor prophets, and not improbably the two of Samuel, the two of Kings, the two of Chronicles, and Judges with Ruth, where the similarity of the subject admitted, so as to reduce the number of books in their canon to twenty-two, answering to the number of letters in their alphabet.

We therefore reject the fancied want of completeness, as if Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah were three fragments of one great historical whole, though we make no secret of the intimate relation in which they stand to one another; so intimate, that if we choose to assert that they must have eventually been blended into one by succeeding inspired writers, had any such arisen, in the same way as writings of earlier men of God were blended into the present books of Kings, we shall not quarrel with such a hypothetical statement.

But we equally reject the fancy that there is a want of unity, and that the book is a cluster of fragments. Two reasons have been alleged for this fancy, on account of the style. The one of these is the occurrence of two portions in the Chaldee language, ch. ix. 1-19; and ch. xi. 12-39. The other is a variation in the use of the first and the third person in speaking of Ezra. The first person is used in a long passage, ch. vii. 28-ix. 15, and on the strength of this fact, these verses are allowed by all to have proceeded from the pen of Ezra; whereas the rest of the book is attributed to other writers, because the first person is not used in them when speaking of him. But though these two facts are curious, they have no force to prove that there were more authors than one. Probably the Jewish language had sunk into partial disuse and decay among the captives at Babylon, and among their descendants who remained out of Palestine for eighty years more, until the time of Ezra. He was therefore equally ready in using the Chaldee spoken in the land of his captivity, and the Hebrew of his forefathers; yet in that Hebrew there are variations of spelling within the book itself, arguing the decayed and unsettled state of the language. And on this account he was all the more likely to preserve the Chaldee in those portions in which he embodied extracts from state documents, or the very documents themselves, which he found in that language. This is precisely the character of the two Chaldee passages; and as the second is attributed to Ezra by able men who are sceptical in their view of the book as a whole, we may the more positively assert, without listening to petty reasonings, that the first of these passages is also his composition. Some indeed have alleged that this first passage is written by an eye-witness of the building; probably a Jew who took part in it, or account of the expression, ch. v. 4, "Then said I unto them after this manner," ch. vi. 5: "And I said, 'What are the names of the men that make this building?"' But this is a narrow basis on which to rest their opinion. And the peculiarity of the first person we, instead of the third person they, is not unlike another case in the same passage, ch. vi. 6.

"Now therefore, Tirshatha, governor beyond the river, Sheshar-bonai, and their companions, &c., be ye far from hence," where we might expect, instead of the third person "their," the second "your"—a change which has actually been made by our translators. If we are to have recourse to speculations, it would not be a violent supposition that either the Chaldee permitted such irregularities of construction, or that it was a peculiarity in Ezra's own style of writing, in that unsteady age of Hebrew literature; and either form of this supposition would go so far to account for that variation of writing, which is the only plausible indication of a want of unity in the book, namely, the use, in one connection, of the first person, and in another connection of the second person, in speaking of Ezra himself. Yet the importance of this variation has been much exaggerated.

The first six chapters refer to a period before Ezra's age, in which he could not be mentioned at all. The seventh chapter, proceeding in the same historical style as the foregoing chapters, names him for the first time in the third person. But after the decree of Artaxerxes has been given, in full form and in the original language, Ezra returns to his own Hebrew, and here bestows himself to the first person, his inscription of praise to God for thus directing the king's inclination and desire. From this time he preserves the first person, in the passage admitted by every one to be his own composition, and which describes his own great actions, until the tenth chapter, in which the third person is perhaps intentionally resumed, to indicate that it is now less a narrative of personal actions than a history of a national proceeding, in which he merely took his position alongside of others who were aiming at a great revival. Parallel passages have been given from sacred writers who at one time narrate events and mention themselves, in the third person, but who pass into the use of the first person, as their own feelings and actions become more prominent. Objection has been indeed taken to some of these, as if the freeness of prophetic style could be no rule for a prose work such as this; but these objections, at the very utmost, cannot destroy the value of such parallels as Is. vii. 1-16 and ch. viii. 1, &c.; or Je. xx. 1-8 and ver. 7, &c.; or Je. xxvii. 1, &c., and ver. 5, &c. To this argumentation Keil properly adds, that the acknowledged writing of Ezra, ch. vii. 27, &c., would be an amazing fragment unless preceded by something such as ch. vii. 1-11, and followed by something such as ch. viii. Perhaps we ought to say that this varying use of the first and third person, which we find in Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, is a usage which all these writers adopted, following the example of Moses, who puts his own personality forward only in the recapitulations of Deuteronomy.

Of course there is a subordinate question which may be discussed among those who hold the unity of the book as proceeding from the pen of Ezra, namely this, whether or not he made use of previously existing written documents, and wrought them up into his own book. This must be supposed in the instance of the list of persons who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, ch. ii.; a list which we find also in Nehemiah, and which he expressly declares to be a register that he found and incorporated with his own memoirs, Ne. vii. 5. This is also the case with the edict of Artaxerxes, the second Chaldee portion, ch. vii. 12-16; and with the letters and royal decrees in the first Chaldee portion, ch. viii., ix. Some believing critics take this entire Chaldee section to be a document of the age of Zerubbabel inserted by Ezra. If so, we must assume that he altered it so far to suit his own purpose, since he inserts the name of king Artaxerxes after the other kings who had been benefactors to the builders of the temple, ch. vii. 14, though Artaxerxes did not begin to reign till fifty years after the temple was completed. But probably this king's name was here mentioned by him so as to show the connection between the first six chapters of the book, which relate the building of the temple under Cyrus and Darius, with the continued and increasing welfare of the colony under Artaxerxes, at that later time to which he passed immediately in the seventh chapter: his own thanksgiving, "Blessed be the Lord God of our fathers, which hath put such a thing in the king's heart, to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem," &c., viii. 22, is proof of the close connection which here recognized between the policy of this king and that of his predecessors. And in like manner, when he says, ch. ix. 3, "For we were bondmen, yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the kings of Persia, to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair the desolations thereof, and to give us a wall about it, and our house hath been now built of stone, and wood is again cut down for us," he seems to allude to what was still needful to the fulfillment of God's revealed purpose of mercy, that building of the wall which Nehemiah was to effect.

There are one or two differences of style alleged to exist between the earlier and the later chapters, and these are cited as proofs of different authorship. But they are microscopical; and explanations of them, such as they are, have been presented; and they are fully counterbalanced in the opinion of men who appreciate this line of argument, by other instances of peculiarity of language running through the entire book. Yet we would appeal with more confidence to the oneness of sentiment from first to last. Such are the similarity between the great return of exiles at the first, as given in ch. i., ii., and the return of the small body under Ezra in ch. viii., both in respect of genealogies, and in the care of the sacred vessels, whose materials, weight, and number are carefully specified. And the great self-sacrificing act of separation from forbidden wives, as recorded in ch. ix., has its counterpart on a smaller scale, in the anxiety of those who returned at the first, to keep the pure descent of Israel unimpaired by the contact with the heathen to which they had been subjected, especially in the case of the priests, ch. ii. 39-43.

The chief reason for supposing that there have been different authors, has probably been the fragmentary appearance of the history to a superficial observer. The real unity of historical plan, seeing on the epochs which were of importance to Israel as the church of God, has been already explained. And in confirmation of this we may see that those two epochs are tacitly compared or expressly mentioned together in the book of Nehemiah, Ne. vii. 53; viii. 11; with E. ii. 20; iii. 10; Ne. vi. 35; vii. 26, 47.

The reckless assertions of some writers that its composition as a whole must be referred to a period about a century later than Ezra, or more, need not be noticed, because they have not even a pretence of argument in their favour. One writer, Zunz, has indeed alleged that there has been some exaggeration about the sacred vessels said to have been restored by Cyrus; but his fellow unbelievers have refused to agree with him, and have denied the historical credibility of the book throughout. Another critic, Bertheau, sees an evidence of the composition of ch. vi. 22, under the Greek successors of Alexander, because the king of Persia is called the king of Asiae, an argument which might have been left to its own weakness, even though we had been unable to give the parallels 2 Ki. xxii. 29, La. v. 6, as Keil has done.

On the contrary, critics who rely upon their internal arguments might have seen evidence in favour of its early composition, in the fact that its chronology is clear and exact; while the accounts of Jewish affairs under the Persian monarchy, as given by Josephus from apocryphal writers and other sources unknown to us, present extreme confusion and some palpable mistakes. The book begins with the decree of Cyrus after he had taken Babylon, by which the Jews were sent home to Jerusalem and directed to rebuild the temple, i.e. 536. It narrates the difficulties and hindrances before this was accomplished in the sixth year of Darius the son of Hystaspes, about i.e. 519. It passes in silence over the rest of his reign, 51 years, and the whole of the reign of Xerxes, 21 years, proceeding direct to the work of Ezra, who received his commission in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, i.e. 458-57. If the whole of the events narrated in the closing chapter took place almost immediately, as is understood, we believe, by all commentators, then the extreme length of time embraced in the narrative is not above 80 years: and the order is strictly chronological, though it is not continuous, but leaves a blank of almost sixty years.

Two exceptions have to be made to these statements in the opinion of some writers, in which however they have not been generally followed. First, Jahn holds with many of the most competent judges that the Ahasurus of the book of Esther is Xerxes: and moreover he holds that it is the same monarch who is here called Artaxerxes. He thinks that the favour shown to the Jews by Ahasurus and Artaxerxes, as related in the books of Esther and Ezra, is so peculiar, that it is best to assume the monarch to be the same in both cases. In confirmation of this, he points to the facts, that it was in the seventh year of the king's reign that Esther was brought into the palace as queen, and that in the seventh year also Ezra was sent by the king to Jerusalem. But this is a more accidental resemblance: Esther could not have been the cause of Ezra being sent to Jerusalem with the royal favour, since Esther became queen in the tenth month, and Ezra had set out on the first day of the first month. And this difficulty is not removed, even if we admit Jahn's hypothesis that there is a difference of six months between the two books as to the beginning of the year, in spring and in autumn. Secondly, whereas Ahasurus and Artaxerxes are mentioned as two kings of Persia during whose reigns monarchical power were made against the Jews by their neighbours, Ezr. iv. 6, 7; it has been generally supposed that those kings are Cambyses and the usurper Smareis, who came between Cyrus and Darius, so that here we have the explanation of the interruption to the building of the temple from i.e. 559 till i.e. 519. But Keil and others say that this is mentioned briefly in verse 5; and that verses 6 and 7 proceed to mention similar cases of interruption and calamitous annoyance under the kings who succeeded Darius. There is confirmation of this view in the letter to Artaxerxes, which refers to the building not at all of the temple, but of the walls of the city. In spite of the awkwardness of so long a parenthetical statement, there is a good deal to be said for this arrangement. And it has the vast advantage of bringing the munificence of the Persian kings into simple uniformity throughout the book of the Bible; Ahasurus being always Xerxes, as these two names are in fact generally reckoned to be mere varieties of pronunciation; and Artaxerxes being one and the same person throughout the book of Ezra, as also in Nehemiah. On this supposition the king had been stirred up by the Samaritans to forbid the building of the city walls at the beginning of his reign; and yet in that extremity there was found God's opportunity, as the king's heart was turned, and Ezra was sent to Jerusalem with full powers to restore everything according to the law of Moses; and this within six years. A table of the Persian kings, with their names in the Bible, is given in the article NEHEMIAH [v. c. M. D.].

EZRA. There are several individuals mentioned in Scripture who bear this name: but the one of them has more than a passing notice, the person whose history is presented in the book which bears his name, and also partially in the book of Nehemiah. Many respectable writers suppose that he is the Ezra who went up with Zerubbabel, Ez. xii. 1, but there are strong reasons for rejecting this opinion on an account of the chronology, besides that person seems to have been dead in the following generation, see ver. 12. From his own account, Ez. vii. 4-12, we learn that he was a priest, indeed descended from the line of high-priests, the nearest of his ancestors named in the text being Seraiah, who is, almost beyond the possibility of doubt, not his own father, but the father of that high-priest who went into captivity in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. (Compare the genealogy in 1 Ch. vi. 4-14). Besides being a priest in virtue of his descent, Ezra had devoted himself to the study of the Word of God, and seems to have been much employed in writing out copies of it for general use, so that he is frequently designated "the scribe," or "the scribe of the law of the God of heaven," i.e. The Jewish traditions are full of accounts of his services to the church in all the departments of sacred literature; so much so, that even the most cautious and the most sceptical critics agree that he must have done important work in preserving and circulating the sacred books, whether we admit or not that he was concerned in closing the Old Testament canon. There are two books bearing his name (Ezras) in the Apocrypha. The second of these represents him as a prophet who had apocalyptic visions, but it is universally held to be a very late production, later than the Christian era, and perhaps the work of a professing Christian. The first book of Esdras is chiefly a plain narrative of the restoration of the temple and city after its ruin, drawn from the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, though with one long idle legend interpolated. It also begins at an earlier point than the canonical book, namely at Josiah's passover. It is impossible to speak with any confidence of his position and proceedings except as these are recorded in Scripture. We know that he enjoyed the favour of the king Artaxerxes and his councillors, and that he received a commission, in the seventh year of that monarch's reign, i.e. 458 or 457, to go up to Jerus-
The work of Ezra on occasion of that feast of tabernacles may have given rise to the belief of the Jews that he organized the synagogue service. Or, in a preferable way of looking at the matter, it may be considered an inspired voucher for the substantial truth of what is ascribed to him. For even if he did not formally institute the worship of the synagogue, at the least he left a pattern which had merely to be copied and to be separated from accidental circumstances. Here, accordingly, we read for the first time of a "pulpit," and of a body of Levites devoted to the work of "causing the people to understand the law" and the reading, that is, a body of preachers and expositors of the Word of God.
FACE. There is nothing peculiar in the use of this word in Scripture, except with reference to God. In all languages it is customary to apply the term as denoting the most conspicuous part of the human body, and that which is most peculiarly indicative of the whole person, to what relatively holds somewhat of the same place in other objects: as the "face of a house," "the face of the country," &c. There is also the same general application of the word in the sense of favour, it being natural for men to turn away their face from those whom they dislike or shun, and to direct it towards their companions and friends. In that sense it is used in Acts xi. 6: "Many will ascertain the face of the prince," meaning thereby his favour; which is the rendering adopted in the English version. As applied to God it is an anthropomorphic expression, denoting either his manifested presence or his experienced favour. In such phrases as "seeing the face of the Lord," "the cry came before the face of the Lord," "the face of the Lord is set against them that do evil," it is evidently all one with God's manifested presence; God as appearing or acting in any particular time and way. The manifestations he actually gives of himself are very various, both in kind and degree; and, according as they are more or less full, so also may the effect of them be represented to be upon those who witness them. No one can see God's face and live, it was expressly said by God himself to Moses, Ex xxxiii. 29; and yet Jacob at an earlier period had declared of himself, though with a feeling of astonishment, that he had seen God's face and yet lived, Gen xxxii. 36. The apparent discrepancy is to be explained by the different respects in which the expression is used in the two cases. The face of God, as involving the full blaze of his manifested glory, no mortal man can see and live; the sight would overpower and shatter his frame. But when vailed in the attractive form, and appearing with the softened radiance of the human countenance, for the purpose of inspiring confidence and hope, as in the case of Jacob, then not only life, but revived and quickened life, was the natural result.

It was Jacob who first spake of God's face. He did it on the memorable occasion when he was going to meet his brother Esau, who had come forth with an armed band to destroy him, and when in deep anxiety of soul he cast himself upon the mercy and faithfulness of God. During the agony of that spiritual conflict the Lord, or the angel of the Lord, appeared and wrestled with him; and he called the name of the place Peniel, God's face. In doing so, he no doubt had respect to the manifested favour, as well as presence of God; for what had impressed his mind was not simply that the presence, but that the gracious presence of God had been vouchsafed to him. And in another series of passages this idea of God's manifested grace or favour is what is chiefly indicated; as in the expressions "sack my face," "lift up on me the light of thy face," or countenance, &c. In all such passages what is said of God's face may be understood of his loving-kindness as actually sought after or experienced by those who believe in his name.

FAIR HAVENS [Gr. Λίμνης Λόγου], the name of a harbour in Crete, on the south shore, into which the vessel that carried Paul on his way to Rome put in, but which was again abandoned, as too exposed for wintering in, Acts xxvii. 12. The name still remains in modern Greek, Λίμνη Λόγου; so that there is no doubt of the particular place meant by it (Smith's Voyage and Ship of Paul, p. 80).

FAITH. The peculiar importance attached to faith in Scripture, and its relative position in Christian doctrine, become evident when it is viewed as that mental act upon which the whole application of redemption, on man's side, depends. The term (πίστις) properly means trust or confidence, as against man's native self-reliance; and the object of faith is not Christ's doctrine, nor his historic life as a mere pattern, but his glorified person, with whom the closest relation is formed by an act which is simply receptive, and raising the mind above the seen and temporal. That this is the proper meaning of the term faith may be proved from the uniform usage of Scripture. Some have thought indeed that, in a considerable number of passages, e.g. Rom. xi. 23.; 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2, Tit. iii. 11, must be taken in an objective sense, denoting the doctrine of the gospel. The best modern expositors, however, take all these passages in the ordinary sense, as containing the idea of trust; from which indeed we are not necessitated to depart in a single instance.

As to the position and importance of faith, it may be described as the organ or means by which redemption is appropriated. It thus presupposes Christ's finished work, of which it is simply receptive; and it is so closely connected with repentance that the one is never found without the other, and can never be in exercise without the other. The most essential light in which the subject can be placed then is, that faith is receptive and saves, not as involving obedience, but as receiving a gift.

The phrase, "obeisance of faith," occurring in certain passages, e.g. Jn. v. 5, xvi. 7, implies indeed an obdulential element in the first act of faith, or a compliance with divine authority, even in the reception of the gift; for we are not, with some, to take the term "faith" in these passages as equivalent to the "doctrine" of the gospel, nor to view the obedience as that which faith produces. But while the gospel is a gift, there is a divine injunction to embrace it, Jn. xvi. 22, involving in one and the same act the reception of a gift and the compliance with a divine command. While faith saves then, not as it contains an obdulential element, but simply as it is receptive, there is an obedience of faith even in receiving the gift of righteousness.

That faith is simply receptive, may be evinced by all the passages where it is described in exercise, by the prepositions used with the verb or noun (εἰς and ἐκ), and by the sensible representations under which it is set forth, such as "a coming," Mat. x. 28; "a fleeing," Luke xi. 38; "a drinking" of the water of life, Jn. vii. 37.

We have first to consider faith in connection with the Pauline doctrine of justification. To show that everything is repudiated but faith alone, the apostle makes use of various forms of exclusion. as, a) "freely," Ec. ii. 28, (2) "without works," Rom. iii. 28, (3) "without the deeds of the law," Ec. iii. 21, (4) "by his grace," Ec. iii. 21, (5) "by grace through faith," Eph. ii. 8. Grace being represented as the exclusive source of justification. and the death of Christ as its material cause, faith is in this matter merely instrumental and receptive of the righteousness of God, Ro. iii. 24. Nor has faith any other value beyond that of uniting us to its object, that we may be justified in him, Ga. iii. 6.

But when the apostle Paul gives all prominence to faith in justification, must be be understood as also excluding works done after faith by those who are in a state of grace. That these works are all excluded from the justification of their persons is evident, because they follow justification; because the apostle repudiates every ground of glorying, Ro. ii. 8; and because their justifying title is not only beyond themselves in Christ, but admits no addition of any kind. Carrying out the same mode of exclusion therefore as is set forth in Scripture, it may be affirmed (1) that it is faith that justifies, not repentance; (2) that it is faith, not love; (5) that it is faith, not works; (4) that it is faith, not belief; (2) that it is faith, not merely as apprehending Christ, not as a grace of the Spirit.

Here it is necessary to explain how faith "is imputed for," or rather "unto righteousness."" (Ro. iv, v. 6.) That this does not result from the intrinsic quality of faith is self-evident. Just as little can it arise from any acceptance whereby an imperfect title is accepted for a perfect one: a supposition which the inflexible law and the character of the Judge forbid. What then is imputed unto righteousness? Grammatically construing the words, it is undoubtedly true that the act of believing stands as the nominative or subject of the attribution. But then in that connection, and wherever we are said to be justified by faith, it must be added that, theologically, faith stands by metonymy for its object; that is, for the Lord our Righteousness, whom faith apprehends, and to whom it unites us. Thus the party imputing is God, the ground of the imputation is the obedience of Christ, and the end contemplated is "unto our righteousness." Faith then is not accepted as an imperfect substitute. The gospel has been which is corrupted by the supposition that in this imputation the act of faith is held sufficient for righteousness, and accounted to be what it is not. From the explanation just given it follows that the common phrase, "the righteousness of Christ is imputed," is the exact equivalent of that Scripture phrase.

While it thus appears that justification is by faith without the deeds of the law, Ro. iii. 28, and that works or moral character neither constitute qualifications nor pave the way as preparations, it remains that we determine the character of justifying faith. This leads us to explain the seeming discrepancy between Paul and James. Paul affirms that it is the grace of God which works, but presupposes that it is living faith. James, not dwelling in question the Pauline doctrine, repudiates a dead faith as devoid of justifying efficacy. The same subject is surveyed by both, without any contradiction, from a different point of view. But the truth in which they agree is, that faith is not a dead assent, but the act of a quickened soul, which possesses, like seed corn, a germinating power. Originated by the Spirit of faith, 2 Co. ii. 13, and overcoming the world by its very action, 1 Jn. 5, true faith is always living; but it justifies neither on account of the life nor of the fruits which are associated with it, but as it apprehends Christ. It must be added, in reference to the cause of faith, that it is itself the fruit of Christ's mediation. Hence it is never represented as a legal condition on which men are thrown back, and which they are required to produce in their own strength, but as given to us, like every other blessing, by Christ.

It must be further observed, that while the sacred writers describe faith as a reliance on the personal Redeemer, they never fail to bring prominently into view that it is accompanied by a fellowship in Christ's life. The apostle John exhibits this most vividly. Though none of the aspects of the subject can be said to be vacant in any of the apostles, it is John that particularly dwells on the thought that they who believe not only have fellowship in Christ's life, but receive Him for this end. Paul, in like manner, is wont to pass from a description of justification by faith to the new life which is given in and with this faith, Rom. vi. 11, which is the life unfolding itself in love and hope, and ever advancing to larger measure of holiness. Nay, Paul is never content till he makes it plain, that the Redeemer whom faith embraces is himself the principle of all this new life living in the disciple of faith, Ga. i. 3.

Neither must it be omitted, that the apostles exhibit faith as implying a change of nature, and as having its root in the contrite heart, that is, the opposite of the life of sin. As that which constitutes the life of sin is in its deepest ground a course of self-sufficiency and self-contentment, the language of the sacred writers implies that faith is in its very nature a breaking with this life of sin—a renunciation of self-reliance for an objective propitiation, as Paul usually puts it—a longing for the divine or a new divine knowledge different from that of nature, as John puts it— but always involving a moral change.

It only remains that we advert to what has been termed the form of faith, which may be said to consist in knowledge, assent, and trust. There must be necessary knowledge to apprehend correctly what Scripture reveals as to the way of salvation, and assent, whereby we accept as true what is announced, but ending in a trust, whereby the heavy-laden rest their weary souls on Christ. It is a reliance upon a person with a measure of confidence, not on a mere proposition, Ec. iv. 6; He. x. 23, i. 32.

But in connection with the trust which is the form of faith, the inquiry arises, Is assurance of the essence of faith in such a sense that a high degree of it is inseparable from its exercise? This requires to be touched with the utmost delicacy and caution. That a certain measure of assurance goes along with lively faith may be affirmed, but not in every case to the exclusion of all dubity. Escaping from the double faith of Rome, the divines of the Reformation-period gave utterance to statements on the subject of assurance stronger than can well be vindicated; and many of the confessions of Protestantistic partake of a similar character. But it is always safer to distinguish between faith and assurance, and to regard the latter as a reflex act, or the conclusion of an easy syllogism, as follows: He that believes on Christ is justified and saved; but I believe: therefore, I am justified and saved. While care is taken to foster and not to discourage that personal appropriation of salvation which forms such a characteristic of the Protestant church, yet it is always perilous to construct such a definition of faith as implies that its opposite consists in admitting a doubt of our personal salvation, for by such views the faithful are perplexed, and the formalist made more secure. [c. s.]

FALLOW-DEER [σκύλις, pychames]. Among the ruminants permitted by the law of Moses to be used as food, De. xiv. 5, this animal is mentioned. Its name occurs again in 1 Ki. iv. 23, in the account of the daily consumption of food by King Solomon's household. In both cases it is associated with deer or antelopes; and as from the latter passage the supply seems to have been irregular, and therefore accidental, we are permitted to conclude that the animal in question was not kept in parks, but was wild, and taken only by the chase. The LXX. give us no light on the identification, for the word is absolutely omitted by them in both passages.

The fallow-deer does not now exist in Palestine, or in any neighbouring country, so far as we know. It is, however, included in the animals of Greece, of Persia, and of Abyssinia; and therefore may have inhabited the wooded parts of Palestine in ancient days; and it is even difficult to suppose that Jerusalem could have received any appreciable amount of flesh-meat from such a source, remote as it is from a forest country.

In all probability the word pychames indicates some species of the antelope family—possibly the animal known to the ancient Greeks under the title of adax (Oryx antilis, Licht.), which has been recognized as a beast of chase in the old Egyptian sculptures. It is widely spread over Central Africa, extending to the borders of the Nile in Nubia, and is well known to the Arabs, who still distinguish it by its ancient name, with the familiar prefix of Abu, or father—Father Adax.

The adax is a coarse and heavy antelope, three feet high at the withers, with a large clumsy head, and stout legs. The horns exist in both sexes, are long, twisted outwards, covered with rings near to the points, which are sharp; the tail is long and tufted. The head and neck are of a deep reddish brown colour, with a band of white across the face; the forehead and throat are clothed with coarse black hair, and all the rest of the body and limbs is of a whitish-gray hue. It is one of that group of antelopes in which we may clearly discern an approach to the bovine race. [F. H. G.]

FAMINE occupies a prominent place in Scripture among the troubles with which at different times God's people have had to contend, and the socarges which he has frequently sent to chastise the wickedness and corruption of the world. In the history of the patriarchs the equitable stream of their quiet and sequelstated life, appears from time to time interrupted by the recurrence of famine, Gen. xi. xxvi. 1; xii. xqo., although in none of them is the calamity explicitly connected with the state and conduct of the patriarchs themselves. We cannot doubt, however, that there was a certain moral connection; and particularly in the greatest of them all, that which in the first instance, and as an event still in prospect, was so related to bring about the election of Joseph in Egypt, and afterwards became the means of humbling the brethren of Joseph, and reconciling them to him. At a later period, when the children of Israel were settled in the land of Canaan, various famines are represented to have come upon them; one, for example, in the days of Ruth; another of these years' continuance in the time of David; another as long, and greatly more severe, in the reign of Ahab, &c.; some of which were expressly sent as reproofs for abounding iniquity, &c., 1 Ki. xxiv. xvi.; 2 Ki. xvi. 2, &c. In the practical writings famine is reckoned among the special instruments of the Lord which he employed, as occasion required, to chastise men for their misdeeds, and in this connection is not unfrequently associated with sword and pestilence, 1 and 2 Ki.; 2 and 3 Ch.; 2 and 3 Ezr. xii.

It may be said of the ancient world generally, that it was subject to periodical returns of dearth, often amounting in particular districts to famine, greatly beyond what is usually experienced in modern times. Various causes of a merely natural and economical kind contributed to this, apart from strictly moral considerations. Among these causes may more especially be mentioned the imperfect knowledge of agriculture which prevailed, in consequence of which men had few resources to stimulate, or in unfavourable seasons and localities to aid, the productive powers of nature; the defective means of transit, rendering it often impossible to relieve the wants of one region, even when plenty existed at no great distance in another; the despotic governments, which so great an extent checked the development of the energy and skill; and the frequent wars and devastations, in a great degree also the result of those despotic governments, which both interrupted the labours of the field and afterwards wasted its fruits. Depending, as every returning harvest does, upon the meeting of many conditions in the soil and climate, which necessarily vary from season to season, it was inevitable but that times of scarcity should be ever and anon occurring in particular regions of the world; and from the disadvantages now referred to, under which the world in more remote times laboured, it was equally inevitable, that such times should often aggravate into all the horrors of famine. But when, in addition to the natural and economical, we take into account also the moral state of the ancient world, and, in particular, the ever recurring backslidings of the covenant-people, we can easily understand how visitations of famine should have been as frequent as they are represented to have been. It was one of the promised blessings of the covenant, that if the people remained steadfast to it, the Lord would bless them in their basket and in their store—indeed in other words, would give them fruitful seasons; and as, to secure this, the constant vigilance and care of a special providence were needed; it was fitting, that when the interests of righteousness called for it, there should be from time to time a partial suspension of the beneficent agency of Heaven. Famine is still among the evils to which the world is subject. Although from the indefinite extension of the arable portion of the globe, and the ready command that is now held over the means of supply and communication, it is a form of evil which has undergone, and still is undergoing, important modifications.

FAN. [The Greek πρότειν, Latin culla bubulum; a sort of wooden spade, with a long handle, used in ancient times, in Greece and the East still used, for the purpose of throwing up the corn in a current of air, that the chaff may be separated from the wheat. The most exact translation of the English term would undoubtedly be "winnowing-shovel." (See [Agriculture].)]

FARTHING. [Two words in Greek are rendered pickling in the English Bible, καρφίζων, Mk xii. 42, and αὐραίων, Mk x. 36, in the LXX. The latter, however, was just the Roman as, equal in the gospel age to a farthing and three-fourths, or 1½ farthing. The other, the Latin quadnum, was the fourth part of this, and consequently not quite equal to half a farthing of English money. If the relative differences, however, in the value of money is taken into account, the one coin may be regarded as nearly equivalent to the other. But formally considered, the spade came as near the farthing as the quadrans.]

FAST, FASTING. It is somewhat singular, considering the ceremonial character of the Jewish religion, and the respect had in many of its ordinances to food, that it contained no injunction about fasting; nor does the verb to fast ( Thrones) once occur in the whole range of the Pentateuch. This is a very significant omission as regards the nature of the Old Testament religion, and shows, along with other things belonging to it, how free it was from the false asceticism and corporeal morbidifications, which from the most remote periods had established themselves in the East. Even in the case of the Nazarite vow, the only thing in the old religion that approached to the character of an ascetic institution, merely the use of wine and things related to it fell under the prohibition of the lawgiver; and the vow itself was voluntary; no one, except in a few peculiar cases, was obliged to take it. There was, however, an occasion, recurring once a year, on which the people were called to do what came to be regarded as equivalent to fasting; so that the occasion itself was in process of time invariably designated the fast, Ac xxiv. 9. This was the day of yearly atonement, appointed to take place on the tenth day of the seventh month, and on which, while the high priest performed the oblations for himself and for the people in all their sins, the people themselves were commanded to "afflict their souls," Lev xix. 27. What particularly was implied in this afflicting of their souls, is not described—farther than Vol. I.
it. "It ought to have been a day of denial, of seriousness, of humiliation, and in so far also of repentance. But the matter is carried to excess when, as is not infrequently done, the day is represented as one of formal mourning in order to be spent in fasting. For, according to the view of the Mosaic religion, holiness and mourning are always contrasts, and the day emphatically of sanctifying could not on this account alone wear formally the aspect of mourning." (symbolik, b. p. 618.)

Notwithstanding the absence of any prescription in the law respecting fasting, we have abundant evidence of facts having been observed from time to time by the covenant people when anything called for special humiliation and grief. David fasted when he lay under the judgment of God on account of his adultery, and would taste nothing till the child was dead, 2Sa. xi. 21; Ahaz also fasted when he heard the doom pronounced on him by Elijah for the murder of Naboth, and got in consequence a temporary suspension of his evils, 1Ki. xi. 27; and on interesting occasions the people generally, in taken of their distress, voluntarily fasted for a day, and clad themselves in mourning attire, 1Ki. xvii. 22; 1Sa. vi. 6; 2Sa. xx. 30. In the last days of the kingdom we read of a whole series of facts connected with special days, which had been rendered memorable and mournful by the calamities suffered on them. They are enumerated by the prophet Zechariah, when pointing to the better times in prospect, which should change the sorrow into joy: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts;" Zac. vii. 5. That of the fourth was in commemoration of the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; the fifth in commemoration of the burning of the temple and the chief houses in the city; the seventh had respect to the murder of Gedaliah; and the tenth, though the last as to its periodical observance, appears to have been connected with the first event in the series—the laying siege to Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, Je. iii. 6, 7; xi. 1; 2Ki. xx. 1, 5, 8. But these fasts were only of a temporary nature, and were probably altogether discontinue soon after the return from Babylon.

What the Jews sometimes called fasting, however, was not a total abstinence from food, but only a spare diet, and a renunciation of everything like feasting and jollity. Thus Daniel speaks of fasting or mourning three whole weeks, and defines his behaviour more exactly by saying that he ate no pleasant bread, neither did flesh or wine come into his mouth, De. x. 2. Judith is represented in the book that bears her name as fasting all the days of her widowhood, excepting on the eve of Sabathis and holidays, ch. viii. 9. But as the spirit of ceremonialism proceeded, the rigour and frequency of fasting would naturally become more marked. Hence, in the gospel age, the Pharisees are said to have "fasted oft," and the living representative of them exhibited in one of our Lord's parables says of himself, "I fast twice in the week." Our Lord gave no countenance to this undue regard to fasting, and the praising of it as a thing praiseworthy in itself. He even plainly disparaged it, and in consequence inured the reproach of being less rigid in his manners, more given to eating and drinking, than the Pharisees, and even his own forerunner, Is. x. 22. This, however, did not move him from his course; and in the reply he gave to the question put to him on the subject, he exposed himself from imposing any ordinance of fasting on his disciples while he was with them, as a thing altogether unsuited to their circumstances; but, at the same time, he gave intimation of troubles and distresses which should arise after his departure from them, and which would certainly cause them to fast. In other words, he would lay down no injunction to fast, or give it any countenance as a practice which was to be observed for its own sake; it was to depend upon the circumstance of the time, and to be left to the feelings of those who were in a condition to profit by it. So far from encouraging the practice as in itself a proof of sublime ascetic piety, or marking high proficiency in the divine life, he denounced the men who made much of it as hypocrites, and exhorted such as might at any time engage in it to mourn their head and wash their faces, so as not to appear unto men to fast, Mt. vi. 17; if practiced at all, it should be only as a part of personal goodness, and with a view to the soul's improvement in the life of faith. His own example in entering upon his high undertaking with a period of fasting, although it was certainly an extraordinary occasion, and one during which till near its close he was even unaccustomed to hunger, may yet be justly taken as a proof, that at special seasons and emergencies the total or partial abstinence from food may be practiced with advantage by believers. But to institute periodical times for doing so, or to connect peculiar privileges and hopes with any amount of simple abstinence, is entirely alien to the spirit of the gospel; nor can it ever be done, with the greatest danger of fostering the spirit of self-righteousness. It may be proper to add, that the passage, 1Co. vii. 5, where fasting is coupled with prayer as alike necessary to progress in the divine life, has been improperly admitted into the received text. According to the best authorities the reading should be, "that ye may give yourselves to prayer." The apostles themselves, however, to some extent kept up the practice of occasional fasting, to which they had been accustomed, Ac. viii. 24; 2Co. xi. 27.

FAT, according to the sacrificial ritual of the Old Testament, stood in a close relation to blood; both alike were solemnly set apart to the Lord, and were looked upon as so peculiarly his, that they were prohibited from ordinary use. "It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations, throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood," Le. xi. 17. What is meant here by fat, appears from the connection to be fat in a lumpish or separate state, not as intermingled with the fleshy parts of the animal. For in the prescriptions going before respecting the peace or thank offerings, it was not absolutely every particle of fat which required to be burned on the altar, but the fat that covers the inwards, that in which the kidneys are imbedded, that also upon the flanks, and, when the offering was of the flock, the entire rump, which is one mass of fat in Syrian sheep. It was the fat in so far as it existed in a separate form, and could be without difficulty taken from the carcase and consumed, this simply which was devoted to the altar, and forbidden as ordinary food. The restriction did not prevent the feeling or fattening of sheep and cattle for the table, Le. xx. 21; 1Ki. xvi. 33.

In regard to the reason for this appropriation of the fat of slain victims to the altar, and its prohibition for food, there has been considerable diversity of opinion. A class of writers would find the ground of it in simply dietary or economical considerations—as, that it was designed to discourage a more fleshly luxury, or to prevent indulgence in what may be fitted, in warm climates, to cause indigestion, to render the blood cold and heavy, perhaps to nourish a tendency to cutaneous diseases (Matthew, John, Epistle; and Michal). It was thought it was to be explained from a desire to form the taste of the Hebrews to oil rather than to fat, and so to induce them to give themselves to the cultivation of the olive and other productions of the field, and proportionately abandon their old nomadic habits. Considerations like these, however, partly conjectural, and all inferior in their nature, could have nothing more than a secondary place, they could even have been subordinated to the preserving of a ritual which throughout was based on the moral aspects and relations of things. It was not primarily because blood is difficult of digestion, or because of any relation it occupies to the food and habits of mankind, that it was conscripted to the altar and interdicted from the table, the same undoubtedly must be held respecting the fat, which is classed along with it. That place was assigned to the blood, because it was the bearer of the life, ps. xxviii, and as such represented the real and spiritual life of man's nature, the principle of his higher life. But next to the blood in that respect stood the fat, which might be called the efflorescence of the animal life—the sign of its greatest healthfulness and vigour, and hence usually clustering in greatest fulness around the more inward and vital parts of the system. On this account the term fat was commonly applied to everything that was best and most excellent of its kind. The fat of the earth, the fat of the wheat, of the oil and the vine, even the fat of the mighty, though to our view somewhat peculiar expressions, were familiar to the Hebrews, in illustrating the choicest specimens or examples of the several objects in question, ob. xxxv, lxxxvi. xlvii, lxxvi. xlviii. xxvii. xii. 27. In this, therefore, we have an adequate and perfectly natural reason for the fat being taken as “the food of the offering made by fire.” It stood in a close connection with the life, and of the edible portion of the animal was the richest, the best. But the best and first, to use the words of Isaiah (ch. iii, 16), “belong in all cases to Jehovah, and may be said also in a sense to represent the whole, of which it is the best and first.” As of all produces, the first and best, representing the entire harvest-yield, was to be presented to the Lord, so of the sacrificial victim, when it was not, as in the case of the burnt offering, wholly consumed upon the altar, its first and best, namely all its fat, must in like manner be burned.

If this fundamental ground is borne in mind, one may easily know what to make of the old typical explanations—such as this, “the burning of the fat to the Lord typified the inexorable trouble of Christ’s soul amidst the flames of His Father’s wrath; and that we ought to devote ourselves to God’s service with a heart all inflamed with love; and ought to have our most inward and beloved lusts destroyed by the spirit of judgment and of burning” (Knapp’s乏ext). It is impossible, in any case, that one and the same action could typically represent things so very diverse in their nature as those here strung together, and which can have nothing more than a formal agreement. But since the fat went along with the blood as together constituting the being and worth of the living creature, so, when transferred to the spiritual realities of the new covenant, the burning of the fat is undoubtedly to be explained, primarily, of the offering of what was best and holiest in Christ’s pure humanity, and subordinately of what, through the operation of his grace, may be so regarded in his people. In him alone was there anything strictly good to offer: and what is such in them is only from the working of his grace in their experience; but this also must be offered as a spiritual sacrifice to the Lord. (Joel ii. 1.)

FATHER. This term is very variously applied in Scripture, and occurs in modes of expression, which are not quite usual in European languages. For instance, these are the uses of it common to all languages (1), of the immediate male parent; (2) of the more remote parents or ancestors; (3) of one occupying somewhat of the position and exercising to some extent the authority of a father, as Joseph to Pharaoh, or his, or Nathan to his servants. (2) In this it is also extended (4) to all, who in any respect might be said to originate or have power over any object or persons. For example, the inventor of an art was called its father; or the father of those who practised it; Job was “the father of all such as handle the harp and organ;” and Job 1. “the father of such as dwell in tents.” (Ps. xxviii.) In regard to cities, Salma is represented as the father of Bethlehem, Harph of Beth-gader, &c. (I. M. xii. 17; ix. 35.)

The place and authority of the father stood very high in patriarchal times, and they were substantially embodied in the legislation of Moses. While the father lived he continued to represent the whole family, the property was held in his name, and all was under his superintendence and control. His power, however, was by no means unlimited or arbitrary, and if any occasion arose for severe discipline or capital punishment in his family, he was not himself to inflict it, but to bring the matter before the constituted authorities, (Deut. xvi. 21.) But these authorities were charged to repress all tali inconfabulation, and with summary judgment put an end to its more lawless outbreaks. On the other hand, the father, as the head of the household, had the obligation imposed upon him of bringing up his children in the fear of God, making them well acquainted with the precepts of his law, and generally acting as their instructor and guide, (Deut. xvi. 20, xxi. 19.) So that, if fathers were, in the first instance, faithful to their trust, it could not very frequently happen that the severities in question would need to be exercised upon the children.

For the more peculiar use of the word father, in reference to God, and the relations implied in it, see under Antity and Sons of God.

FEASTS, or sacred festivals—which held an important place in the Jewish religion—are what alone require to be treated here under the name of feasts. For feasts, in the ordinary sense, there was nothing peculiar to the Jews, or which requires explanation to intelligent readers of the Bible. The occasions of making feasts among the Jews and other people of the East were much the same with those which give rise to them elsewhere—the meeting of friends, the making of public feasts, or banquets, prosperous events, marriages, and such like. Whatever was peculiar in the of conducting their entertainments on such occasions, will be found noticed in connection with the occasions themselves. (See food, Hospitality, Den-er, Supper.)

The English term feast very inadequately expresses in a religious respect) what is meant by the corresponding expressions in Hebrew, and indeed is apt to convey an impression somewhat at variance with the more fundamental idea. There are two words in Hebrew for which it is used as an equivalent, and to one of them only does it approximate in meaning. This is day, derived from the verb which signifies to dine, and, when applied to religious institutions or services, indicating them, originally at least, as solenmities accompanied with demonstrations of joy and gladness. But this term is scarcely ever applied excepting to two of the stated solemnities of the old covenant
-the passover and the feast of tabernacles. Ex. xxiii. 13;
xviii. 26; Nu. xxix. 22; De xxvi. 12—where both celebrated with feasts, and rejoicings that were connected with the participation of food as an essential part of the service. Indeed, latterly the term appears to have been chiefly appropriated to the feast of tabernacles, which the rabbins therefore call emphatically the day, as being from its very nature the one that partook most of the character of a joyous feast. But the term that most fitly designated, and that alone actually comprisheaded all the sacred feasts, was solemn (7216); and where the stated solemnities in their proper nature and entire compass are treated of, as they are in Ex. xxiii., this is the term that is applied to them all;
they are the solemnities of Jehovah: and of the feast of tabernacles alone is day used as an interchangeable term, ver. 20. Now, solemn must mean either ceremonies or places of assembly; it is used frequently in both senses; but here it is, beyond doubt, to be understood in the former. Indeed the language of the sacred writer explains itself: "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, The solemnities (feasts) of Jehovah, which ye shall call holy convocations, these are the solemnities." What was meant by this name, therefore, was the stated solemnities of the people—the occasions fixed by divine appointment for their being called and meeting together in holy fellowship; meeting, that is, for acts and purposes of sacred worship. Holy convocations, or calling of assemblies, could have had no other object than the celebration in some way of divine worship, or the promotion of the spiritual interests of the community. Any other ends that may have been served by them must have been quite incidental and subordinate. And hence alone appears the utterly groundless nature of the idea set forth respecting those sacred festivals, especially by writers in Germany; as if they had a political and social much more than a religious bearing, and were chiefly valuable on account of the good fellowship they promoted between the dif-cent members of the community, the opportunities they afforded for merchandise, and the hilarity and good cheer which prevailed at them (Harden, Th. Poesie, p. 116; Michaelis, Com. on Laws of Moses, art. 191). There might, without doubt, have accrued from the three larger and more prolonged feasts some advantages of the kind now referred to; seeing that at these the people met from all parts of the land, and were together for a whole week, portions only of which could be spent in religious exercises. A communal and brotherly spirit could not fail to be fostered by such ever-recurring assemblages at one place and time of worship. But still they could never be regarded as the more proper and direct object of those feasts, any more than of the others; for all had primarily a religious aim, and were pre-eminently designed to maintain and promote the people's fellowship with God. It was before Has, not simply with one another, that they were to meet: not in assemblies merely, but in holy assemblies that they were to congregate; so that, as Baale justly on this point states, it was not politics and commerce that had here to do, but the soul of the Mosiac dispensation—the landed orders of the religious and political existence of Israel, the covenant with Jehovah" (Saddulak, ii. p. 23).

Another thing is quite clear from this characteristic description of all the solemn or feasts, and one that also meets a related and too prevalent error; it is, that the law plainly contemplated stated and regular meetings for worship, some of a smaller and frequently-recurring nature, as well as others at greater intervals, and attended with more of the circumstantials of worship. For among the sacred seasons, which were to derive their distinction from the calling of holy assemblies, and at the head of the whole, stood the weekly Sabbath:
and to which also there were added, as single days,
the new moon of the seventh month, and the tenth of that month, on one and all of which there were to be holy convocations, as well as at the three great festivals of the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. It is obvious that the holy assemblies by which these other days—the individual Sabbaths—were to be distinguished, must have been quite local, families or townships meeting together in their several districts, and under the guidance of the Levites or elders among them, engaging in some common acts of devotion.
Nothing was prescribed as to the particular form and manner: this was left (as it has been very much in every age of the church) to the direction of the constituted authorities, acting in accordance with the great truths and principles of the law. In later times the provision was carried into effect by the erection of synagogues, and the organization of a regular system of discipline and worship connected with them. This was a mode perfectly authorized by the legislation respecting the stated assemblies, and might from the first have been adopted;
but there is no evidence that things took so orderly and systematic a shape in this respect during the earlier and brighter periods of the commonwealth. This, however, does not invalidate the fact, that on all the days specified in the law as Sabbath, there should have been,
and among the better portions of the community actually were, holy assemblies; and it is only on the supposition of there having been such, that we can account for the allusions occasionally made in the writings of the Old Testament to "the congregations," "the calling of assemblies," "the solemn meetings," &c. &c., and also to the practice, as one in common use even in the degenerate kingdom of Israel, of the more piously disposed going to attend the meetings of the sons of the prophets on Sabbath-days and new moons, 2 Ki. iv. 21. There is reason to believe that the intention of the lawgiver in this respect was never wholly disregarded; but there can be little doubt that his intention been more fully carried out in the better days of the commonwealth, the seasons of de-generey and backsliding neither would have been so frequent nor so great as they actually were. On this part of the subject see Meyer, De Temp. Sac. et Festis diebus Heb, p. ii. c. 9; Fairbairn's "Typology," ii. p. 149, sec.; also George, Die alt. Festh. Jubil., p. 161, 292, where the correct view is maintained, though in the midst of much that is unsound.

Keeping in view, then, the fundamental idea of the feasts—or, as it should rather be, the sacred seasons and solemnities—of the old covenant, namely, that they were appointed for the special purpose of cultivating, by means of religious meetings and appropriate acts, the holiness of the covenant, we shall take a survey of them individually, and in the order in which they are presented in the chapter, Ex. xxix, which formally treats of them.

I. The Feast of the Paschal Sheep. — The institution of the weekly Sabbath has so much that was peculiar to it, and stands connected with so many questions of importance respecting its origin, distinctive character, and proper observance, as well as its relation to Christian times, that it will be best treated as a whole by itself. What it had in common with the Sabbath respected but one part, though a very important part, of its design; and even this, to be properly understood, requires to be viewed in connection with its entire purport and general bearings. (See Sabbath.)

II. Feast of the Firstfruits and of the Passover. — This feast is placed next in order to the weekly Sabbath, and formed the first in point of time of all the annual feasts—the first, therefore, of the solemnities that usually went by the name of feasts. It was inimitably called the feast of the Passover, and the feast of Unleavened Bread; but where the object was to mark the distinction between the Passover as a sacrifice, and the Passover as a feast following on the sacrifice, the latter was designated the feast of unleavened bread. Thus, in Ex. xxvi., 5, seq., "In the fourteenth day of the first month at even, between the two evenings is the Lord's Passover. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord; seven days ye must eat unleavened bread. In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work," &c. The Passover, it will be observed, as a sacrifice, was assigned to the very close of the fourteenth day—to the period between sunset and total darkness, as the expression seems strictly to import; but, as the later Jews understood it, between about three in the afternoon and sunset. (See notes in Exposition.) It was fixed so near the close of that day that the victim might be ready to be partaken of at the very commencement of the next day, which took place when night had fairly set in, and so might form the initial and prominent part of the paschal feast. This feast, therefore, including the eating of the paschal lamb, began at night, and on what the Jews reckoned the first hours of the fifteenth day of the month.

The animal, which was ordained to be at once the sacrifice that preceded, and the food that introduced, the observances of the feast, was allowed to be chosen either from the goats or the sheep. Custom, however, ultimately narrowed it to the latter; and a lamb of the flock came to be universally regarded as the proper paschal offering. It was ordained to be a lamb of the preceding year, and without blemish. It was to be slain as an offering to the Lord, and was called the sacrifice of the Lord's Passover, Ex. xii. 21; xxix. 25; and in the list of the two passages referred to, and in a corre-
The Passover being thus like the birth time of their existence as a ransomed and peculiar people to the Lord, the commemoration of it in future time was like a perpetual renewal of their youth. They must be ever repeating over again the solemnities, which brought fresh to their view the redemptive act to which they owed their national existence, and the heritage of life and blessing it secured for them.

With this great design of the ordinance, the subordination of arrangements and accompanying provisions entirely proceeded. (1.) The month appointed for its celebration was the month Abib—literally, the ear-month, when the corn was coming into the ear, and the spring was now giving promise of the coming harvest—henceforth the first month of the Jewish calendar. As their religious and political existence took its beginning with the event therein commemorated, so their cycle of months must then also begin its annual course—nature also in its natural freshness of life and beauty appearing in unison with the occasion. (2.) Of like propriety were the actions with the lamb, that it was to be roasted by fire, not boiled, that there might be the least possible waste of its substance; to be presented entire without a bone being broken, and in all its considerable parts consumed—the company assembled around each table being appointed to be always sufficient to insure that result—all manifestly designed to keep up the representation of a visible and corporate unity. Itself whole and undivided, the lamb was to be partaken of entire by individual households, and every household was to participate in the common meal, that they might, one and all, realize their calling to the same divine fellowship and life, and might apprehend the oneness as well as completeness of the means by which the good was procured and sustained. Should anything remain over, it must be burned, lest it should corrupt or fall into the rank of ordinary food; God's peculiar table, and the peculiar food he provided for it, must be kept humbly apart from everything common or unclean. (3.) The attitude in which the lamb was to be eaten—with hands girt, shorn on the feet, a staff to be carried by fire, not boiled, that there might be the least possible waste of its substance; to be presented entire without a bone being broken, and in all its considerable parts consumed—the company assembled around each table being appointed to be always sufficient to insure that result—all manifestly designed to keep up the representation of a visible and corporate unity. Itself whole and undivided, the lamb was to be partaken of entire by individual households, and every household was to participate in the common meal, that they might, one and all, realize their calling to the same divine fellowship and life, and might apprehend the oneness as well as completeness of the means by which the good was procured and sustained. Should anything remain over, it must be burned, lest it should corrupt or fall into the rank of ordinary food; God's peculiar table, and the peculiar food he provided for it, must be kept humbly apart from everything common or unclean. (4.) The next provision regarding it—the appointment to eat it with bitter herbs—might also be assigned to the temporary class of arrangements, if we were sure that it simply pointed, as many commentators understand it to have done, to the hard bondage and affliction which the Israelites endured in Egypt. It may possibly have done so; and the opinion is so far countenanced by the omission of any reference to the bitter herbs in the later passages of the Pentateuch, which treat of the Passover as a stated feast. Yet, as the distress experienced in Egypt, especially that of the closing scene, was no accidental thing, but an inseparable part of the discipline through which they had to pass, the bitter herbs that symbolized it had, on that very account, something of abiding impor t and instruction. They told of the intermingling of anxiety and trouble, through which the people had the bands of their captivity loosed and were raised into the liberty and blessedness of life. It was even, one might say, through the avenue of death that this life was entered on by the covenant-people; and the bitter herbs might have been retained as a significant emblem of that attendant sorrow or crucifixion of nature. (5.) The prohibition of leavened bread, which formed another and much more prominent characteristic of the feast, the coming bread was intended to be a perpetual accompaniment. The alternative name of the feast of unleavened bread was itself a clear proof of this; and as the doctrine of heaven was not limited to the cutting of the paschal lamb, but continued through an entire week, it was evidently designed from the first to form an essential characteristic. Yet it too had some reference to the troubles and distresses of the moment; for in De, xvi. 3 the unleavened bread is called "bread of affliction;" and it is added by way of explanation, "for three days was burnt in the land of Egypt in haste." That is, by reason of the terrible agitation and urgency of the moment, they had no time to prepare their customary leavened bread, but had hurriedly to make ready with simple flour and water what they required for the occasion. This, however, had respect simply to the preparation of the bread, not to its distinctive quality, though the latter was plainly the chief thing, and is that most specifically referred to in the passages that dwell upon the subject. Leaven being a piece of sour dough in a state of fermentation (see under LEAVES), was figuratively regarded as an image of corruption in the moral and spiritual sphere—of whatever, by its perverse nature, or vitiating tendency, disturbs the peace of the soul, and causes it, as it were, to ferment with the elements of impure desire and disorderly affection. Hence, our Lord warned his disciples to beware of the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees, Mat. xvi. 6; which is afterwards explained to mean their corrupt doctrine or teaching; and the apostle identifies unleavened bread with sincerity and truth, hence, by implication, marks leaven in its symbolic aspect synonymous with what is false and impure, 1 Cor. v. 8. The command, therefore, at the feast of the Passover, to put away all leaven from their dwellings, and through one whole week, the primary sabbatical circle, to eat only unleavened bread, was in reality an enforcement of the obligation to purity of heart and behaviour. It taught the people, by a perpetually recurring ordinance, that the kind of life for which they had been redeemed, and which they were bound, not for one brief season merely, but for all coming time, to lead, was such as could be maintained in fellowship with God, and therefore free from the sins and abominations, on which he can never look but with abhorrence. The service was but another form of reiterating the call, Be ye holy, for I am holy. (6.) Closely connected with this, and indeed only the embodiment of one of its more specific and positive aspects, was the presentation to the Lord of a sheaf of barley—an act symbolizing the purpose of the second day of the feast, and to be accompanied by a burnt-offering, with its appropriate meat-offering. Ex. xxiii. 14—19—the burnt-offering symbolizing the dedication of their persons to the Lord, and the sheaf of first-fruits of that of their substance. It was not accidental, but of set purpose, that the time of the annual celebrat tion of this feast, which commemorated God's act in vindicating for himself the first-fruits of his people Israel, should also have been that at which could be annually gathered the first-fruits of the land's increase. The natural thus fully corresponded with the spiritual. The presentation of the first-ripe grain of the season was like offering the whole crop to God, acknowledging it as his gift, and receiving it under the signature of his hand, to be used in accordance with his mind and will. All therefore acquired a sacred character; for "if the first-fruits were holy, the lump was also holy." The service carried, besides, a formal respect to the consecration of the first-born at the original institution of the Passover, and was therefore most appropriately connected with this particular ordinance. In the saving and consecration of the first-born, all Israel were, in a manner, saved and consecrated: this the people were called every succeeding year, when they sacrificed and ate the Passover, to confess before the Lord, and, with their barley-sheaf and its accompanying burnt-offering, to yield themselves and their substance anew to him, to whom they owed whatever they were and had.

Such were the individual and more specific parts of this feast, with the meaning directly involved in them for the people of Israel. It remains however to be noticed, that to give the whole a period during which the feast was held a sacred impress, to stamp it and all its services as instituted for holy purpose, both the first and the last days of the feast were to be observed as Sabbaths—days without work and for holy convocations. Ex. xxiii. 7. And throughout the period there was to be presented daily, in addition to the stated morning and evening sacrifices, a goat for a sin-offering, and two bullocks, one rams, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat and drink offerings. So vividly therefore did the day not contain any lessons different from those taught in other parts of the feast, but they served to bring distinctly into remembrance, at every stage of the solemnity, how much the worshippers needed to be purged from the defilement of sin, and how they were called to give themselves to the service and glory of God.

In these remarks the feast of the Passover has been viewed merely as a commemorative and symbolical ordinance for Israel; but while it commemorated the past, it also typically pointed to the future. It did this partly in common with all other divine acts, which brought judgment upon the adversary and deliverance to God's people. For what Bacon said of history in general—"All history is prophecy"—held emphatically of such portions of it. In these God more peculiarly displayed his character as the covenant God of his people; and that character being unchangeable in all its essential elements, he cannot but be inclined to repeat substantially for them in the future what he has done in the past. On this ground the inspired writers, in the Psalms and elsewhere, constantly endeavor to reassure their hearts in times of trouble and rebuke by throwing themselves back upon the redemptive acts of God in former times, perceiving therein a pledge of similar acts, as often as they might be needed, in the time to come. But another and still higher prophetical element entered into that singular work of God which had its commemoration in the Passover. For the earthly relations then subsisting, and the manifestations they called forth on the part of God, were purposely designed and ordered to foreshadow corresponding, but immensely higher ones in the future development of the kingdom of God. And as in this greater future all adverse power, though rising to its most desperate and malignant efforts, was destined to be put down by the triumphant energy of Christ, that the salvation of his people might be for ever secured, so the redemption from the land of Egypt, with its ever-recurring memorial, necessarily contained the germ and promise of these better things to come: the lamb perpetually offered to commemorate the past, and partaken of as the sacrament of a redemption already accomplished, spoke to the ear of faith of the true Lamb of God that, in the fulness of time, should take away the sins of the world; and only when it could be said, "Christ our passover has been sacrificed for us," did the purpose of God, which his infidelities in the paschal institution, receive its proper development. Hence the pregnant utterance of our Lord when sitting down to the celebration of the last Passover, "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: for I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." Luke xiv. 16.

In this higher and prospective reference of the paschal institution, the lamb without blemish, with its sprinkled blood, pointed to that endlessly Redeemer, come to shed his blood for many for the remission of sins, with which blood applied is the correspondence of the Holy Spirit they are consecrated for evermore. Here, too, salvation from destruction is not the only thing aimed at: it is but the means to a further end, the soul's participation in the unending life of Jesus, and accomplishment thereby of a personal fitness for the work and service of God. The indispensable condition to this end is the hearty reception of the Saviour in his entire fulness, as the oneness of life for the community of believers, that they may be all one with him as he is one with the Father; for which reason not a blemish of him was allowed to be broken on the cross, that his people might have even an external witness of that unqualified oneness, and might the more readily discern in the history of the crucified the realization of the promise embodied in the Passover. It virtually declared that a divided or mutilated Christ could only be an insufficient Saviour, because necessarily leaving evils in the soul's condition unredressed, works unfinished. Not unless received in his proper completeness can the life that is in him be found also in them. And as this life can never work but unto holiness, so it will inevitably lead to the putting away of the old leaven of a corrupt nature, and walking in the spirit of sincerity and truth; more certainly indeed than of old, for in this respect also all rises to a higher place. As the mercies of God connected with the new Lamb of sacrifice are unspeakably greater, and the fellowship with God into which it brings his people is closer, so the obligation is correspondingly stronger under which they are laid to live lives unto God, and to prove, by their daily conduct, what is his good, and holy, and acceptable will.

111. The Feast of Weeks. Postscript. This feast, which comes next in order, stood in a definite relation to the feast of the Passover, or rather to a particular part of that feast, the presentation to the Lord of the first ripe ears of barley. This service, as already noticed, was appointed to take place on the second day of the special solemnity, the day after the Sabbath, which formed its preparation, ix. 15; and from that the people were to count seven weeks complete, a week of weeks, at the close of which, on the day following, they were to hold another solemnity, called on that account the feast of weeks. The actual day of the feast formed the \textit{fifth} from the day of presenting the barley-sheaf; and from the Greek word \textit{paneteia}, fifthith, it came to be commonly known under the designation of Pentecost. But the more distinctive name, however, that of weeks, being determined by the complete cycle of weeks which intervened between it and the second day of the feast of Unleavened Bread, of which it formed the proper consummation. With reference to this aspect of it, the ancient Jews gave it the name of \textit{Amerit} (Sith iii. 16, A. V.), that is, the closing or shutting up.

Two other names, however, are applied to the feast in Scripture. In Ex. xxii. 16, where mention is first made of it, it is called both the feast of \textit{harvest} and the feast of \textit{first-fruits}; also in Nu. xxvii. 28, where the subject is treated of in connection with the offerings, it is simply called \textit{the day of first-fruits}. It was designated from the harvest, because it was kept at the close of the whole reaping season, when the wheat as well as the barley crop had been cut and gathered. The seven weeks after the commencement of the Passover were always sufficient for that purpose; they embraced the entire circle of harvest operations. It very naturally got the name also of the feast or day of first-fruits, because it formed the occasion on which an offering was to be presented to God of the entire crop, as actually gathered and ready for use. This was done by the high priest, weaving two leaves, made of the best of the barley, not of barley-meal, but of fine flour, and baking in the usual manner with levain; the levain in this case not being regarded as a separate ingredient, or in its character as levain, but being simply viewed as an essential part of the concrete result—baked leaves. Nor were they placed upon the altar, to which the prohibition about levain strictly referred, but waved before the Lord by the priest in the name of the congregation. But in addition to this wave-offering, as the people were enjoined to give “the first of all the fruit of the land to the Lord,” De. xxvi. 2, since from him the whole had been derived, it was ordered that at this feast they should bring an offering of the first-fruits of their produce, each according to his ability and the purpose of his heart. No definite amount or proportionate contribution was fixed; it was declared to be “a tribute of a free will offering of their hand, which they were to give according as the Lord their God had blessed them,” De. xxvi. 10. But the offering itself was laid as a matter of obligation upon each man’s conscience; hence the exhortation of Solomon, “Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase,” 11. iii. 9. Jewish writers relate that the form of consecration and thanksgiving found in De. xxvi. 5, seq., was commonly used on the occasion.

The feast in later times appears to have lasted for some days; probably was continued as long as the Passover, but in the law mention is made only of a single day; and in so far as any additional time may have been spent at it, there was no authoritative enactment enjoining enjoyment. But the mere rendering of the first-fruits from so many families, accompanied as it was with an injunction to show liberality to the poor, and to give the widow, the orphan, the stranger, as well as their own servants, a share in their bounty, De. xvi. 19, would certainly require a succession of days, though, as to the exact number, determined more perhaps by the convenience of individuals than by any statutory appointment. The one legal day of the feast was a Sabbath, a day of holy convocation; and in addition to the usual Sabbath-day services, there were to be offered on it, precisely as at the feast of the Passover, two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, Nu. xxviii. 7—a symbol of their personal dedication, along with the first-fruits of their yearly increase, to the Lord. The burnt-offering, as originally prescribed in Le. xxii. 18, was one young bullock and two rams, instead of two bullocks and one ram, which is either to be understood as an alternative that might at times be preferred, or, as is more probable, a later regulation, which was to be regarded as virtual superseding what had been in existence before. A kid of the goats for a sin-offering was also to be slain, to make atonement for them—bringing to remembrance the sin which cleaved to them in all their services, and which required to be blotted out, that these services might come up with acceptance before God.

This feast has very commonly been considered as intended, partly at least, to commemorate the giving of the law, which certainly took place very nearly at the distance of fifty days from the killing of the Passover, although the time cannot be determined to a day. No indication, however, occurs of this view in Scripture, nor is any trace of it to be found in Philo or Josephus. Maimonides seems to be the first Jewish writer who gave expression to it—“ Festum septuagesimae est dies ille, quo Lex data fuit” (Maimonides, xvi. 16), but Abarbanel rejected it on the ground that the divine law had no need of the sanctification of a day in order to keep alive the memory of its promulgation (in Leg. ii. 26). It seems chiefly to have been from a supposed wish to suit the giving of the law and the descent of the Spirit that the view has obtained such extensive currency among Christian divines. Whatever plausibility however may attach to it, and whatever reality in the connection between the two events which it couples together, the view itself rests upon no solid footing. There are simply two points of ascertainment and real moment in the scriptural account of the feast. (1.) First, its reference to the second day of the Passover, when the shaft of barley was presented at the tabernacle, the former day being the commencement, this latter day the completion of the harvest period. Hence, all being now finished which concerned the garnering of the year’s provision, the special offering was not of ripe corn, but of leaves, representing the whole staff of bread. (2.) Then, secondly, there was the reference to the intervening weeks—the week of weeks—a complete revolution of time somehow peculiarly connected with God—shut in on each hand by a holy Sabbath and an offering of first-fruits, and thus marked off as the season of the year which, more than any other, was distinguished for the tokens of his presence and working. Why should this season in particular have been so distinguished? Simply because it was the reaping time of the year. Canaan was in a peculiar sense God’s land; the covenant-people were guests and sojourners with him upon it, and it was his part, so long as they remained faithful in their allegiance to him, to provide for their wants and satisfy them with good things. The harvest was more especially the reason for his doing this; it was the time of his more conspicuous working in their behalf, when he crowned the year with his goodness, and laid up, as it were, in his storehouses what was required to furnish them with supplies till the return of another harvest. It was fitting; therefore, that he should be expressly owned and honored both at the beginning and the ending of the period that was the first of the ripening ears of corn, so the first of the baked loaves of bread should be presented to him and that the people, especially at the close, as guests w ell cared for and plentifully furnished with the comforts of life, should come before the Lord to praise him for his mercies, and give substantial expression to their gratitude by contributing of the fruits of their increase to those whom he wished to have regarded as the more peculiar objects of his sympathy.

It must be obvious to any reflecting mind that such an order and such arrangements are fraught with important lessons of instruction, even in respect to the sphere of ordinary life. Therefore God still manifests his care and bounteousness in providing, and by acts of recurrent homage and gifts of substantial beneficence, he should be continually honored by those who are the partakers of his bounty. Even in that lower sphere, the great principles on which the feast proceeded, and which it aimed at ever calling forth into living recognition, should be acknowledged and acted on by every inhabitant in the field of nature, that every productive labourer in the business of life. But if we look to the higher sphere of things spiritual and divine, which are the only proper antitype of the other, then we are reminded by the arrangements of this feast, first of God's peculiar working season in the matter of redemption, and then of the relation between that and the actual participation and fruit of its purchased benefits. The time of Christ's personal ministry on earth from the moment that he appeared at the banks of Jordan, made profession of his high purpose to fulfill all righteousness, till he bowed his head on the accursed tree, finishing transgression and making an end of sin by the sacrifice of himself - that was emphatically God's ripening and reaping time in the work of salvation, during which he was bringing into act his eternal pur-purpose of love, and once for all garnered up in his kingdom the inexpressible riches of his grace and blessing.

Of this incomparable harvest, Christ was at once the provider and the provision - the first ripe fruits, and the meritorious possessor of all that was needed to bring forth others of a like kind. What, then, was required to complete the process, but such a further movement in the divine economy as would turn the fruits of grace provided into the bread of life received and fed upon by the souls of men? And this was the closing act, which began to take effect on the day of Pentecost; it stood related to the preceding work of Christ, as the Passover with its first-fruits of ripened grain to the feast of weeks with its loaves of prepared food. The Spirit was descended with the things of Christ to show them with power to the souls of men.

The riches of the purchased redemption, existing yet but as a treasure provided and laid up by God for them that love him, became an actual heritage of life and blessing, rendering such as were willing to partake of the benefit a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. In a word, the leading characteristic of the divine kingdom before this was the working out of redemption, now it came to be the application of its blessings. Hitherto it was the manifestation of the Son for men, now and henceforth it was to be the operation of the Spirit within them - causing the seed in men's hearts to spring up and germinate and bring forth fruit unto life everlasting. They are emphatically the blessed who thus receive of the good things of the kingdom; and how can they be conscious of the blessedness without inviting others to a spiritually poor and needy, to come and rejoice with them?

IV. The Feast of Trumpets or New Moon. - It was the month that might be said to rule the year with the Israelites, and by its successive changes and revolutions to determine all the larger divisions of time.
The year was made up of so many moons; each month consisted of the period of a single moon's revolution; and the month was again divided into four equal parts, or weeks, to a number corresponding with the four successive aspects of the moon. It was therefore quite natural that the new moons should have some mark of distinction connected with them in the Jewish ritual.
They were not, however, placed among the feasts or the seasons appointed for Sabbaths and holy convocations - although it would seem, from certain allusions in Scripture (Isa. 1:15, 2:31; Isa. 35:2), that it was not unusual for the more zealous ceremonialists, or the more piously inclined members of the old covenant, to observe them as a kind of holidays. They were, so far distinguished in the law from other days, that the same special offerings were ordered to be presented on them as were assigned to the regular moonfeast, as we have it, and they were marked by the further distinction of a blowing of trumpets over the burnt offerings, Ex. xxix. 29, 30
Lev. xxiii. 24, 25. These things certainly raised the new moons out of the rank of ordinary days, and made them, one might say, semi-feast days. But it was reserved for only one of them to take rank with the moonfeast, as a day of sacred rest and holy convocations; yet it received its more peculiar designation from what it had in common with the other new moons, namely, the blowing of trumpets; it was even the feast of trumpets on which account, we may suppose, the trumpet-blowing would be both continued longer and raised londer than at other new moons. What belonged to the others as a subsidiary distinction, was for this a leading characteristic. The day thus signalized was the first of the seventh month, which fell somewhere about our Octobre; and though the people were not required to appear at the sanctuary, yet the day was to be observed as a Sabbath, and the regular feast offerings were to be presented on it, Ex. xxix. 29, 30.

There can be no doubt that the sacred use of the trumpet had its reason in the loud and stirring noise it emits. This is described as a cor pora: the rendering sounding in the English Bible is too feeble, which was to make itself heard throughout the whole land. The references to it in Scripture are often frequent, and may indicate the same idea, *Zep. x. 10; lam. ii. 13; Hos.
vi. 4, 5.* And for this reason the sound of the trumpet was familiarly employed as an image of the voice or word of God. The voice of God and the voice of the trumpet on Mount Sinai were heard together first, the trumpet-sound as the symbol, then the living reality, Ex. xxvii. 19. St. John also speaks of having heard the voice of the Lord as that of a trumpet, *Rev.
xi. 15, 16*; and the thrilling sound of the trumpet is once and again represented as the immediate harbinger of the Son of Man when coming in power and great glory, to utter the all-sufficient word, which shall quicken the dead to life, and bring a close with present frame of things. Mar. xxii. 31; Lxx. xix. 27, 17: iv. 16. It is clear, therefore, that the blowing of the trumpet was, in certain connections, used as a symbol of the mighty voice of God, which, when uttered, none may venture to disregard; and, subordinate, of course, it may have been used of any stirring agency, even on the part of man, such as was fitted to call forth awakened energy and spiritual application to the work and service of God. It was hence peculiarly the war-note—summoning the people to put forth the energies as to a great work of God, and pleading, as it were, the ear of God himself in the heavens, that he might arise to their help against the mighty. Ex. xix. 9. Such appears to have been the general import of the blowing of trumpets at the festival of that name on the first day of the seventh month. That month was distinguished above all the other months of the year for the multitude of ordinances connected with it; it was emphatically the sacred month. Its place as the seventh in the Jewish calendar marked it out for this distinction (see Numbers, Sacerd). It bore on its name the numerical impress of the covenant and, as such, was to be hallowed above all the months of the year by solemnities which bespeak at once God's singular goodness to his people, and the people's special interest in God. For, not only was it first day consecrated to sacred rest and spiritual employment, but the tenth was the great day of yearly atonement, the one day in the year when the high-priest was permitted to pass within the veil, and sprinkle the mercy-seat with the blood of sacrifice; and then on the fifteenth of the month commenced the feast of tabernacles, which, as a fitting conclusion to the whole festival cycle, called the people to rejoice in the goodness which the Lord had given them to experience, as contrasted with the former periods of trial and humiliation. In perfect accordance with all this, the feast of this new moon is called "a memorial of blowing of trumpets," or rather a bringing to remembrance, putting the people in mind of the great things they were to expect; yea, putting God himself in mind of the great things he had promised in his covenant with the solemnities of that month—precisely as when they went to war against an enemy that oppressed them, they were ordered to blow the trumpet; and, it is added, "Ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and ye shall be saved from your enemies." Ex. xix.

The principle enshrined in all this applies for New as well as for Old Testament times; the form has passed away, but the spirit remains. There are times when believers need, and when they may warrarily expect, the larger gifts of grace than ordinary, fuller experiences of life and blessing. Let them, as it were, blow the trumpet, if they would obtain these; stir up all their energies and desires, and put God in mind of the promises on which he has caused them to hope. Such is for all times the sure road to success; since the gifts of grace and the actual capacity for serving and enjoying God always exist in a certain correspondence with the state of awakened desire and spiritual application on the part of believers. V. The Feast of the Day of Atonement.—The services connected with the day of atonement were in themselves so peculiar, and had such a specific bearing on the events of gospel history, that they might, perhaps, have been considered with more advantage in immediate connection with that tabernacle. But as they have had their place assigned them by the lawgiver himself in the category of the month, we shall adhere to the same order. The day for their performance, as already noticed, was the tenth of the seventh month; a strict Sabbath, on which no servile work was to be done, but which was to be for holy convocations, and also—unlike other Sabbaths, which were to be days of refreshment and joy, Sept. vii. 10; viii. 21—to the people afflicting their souls. So rigidly was this use and aspect of the day to be maintained, that whosoever would not on that day afflict his soul was to be cut off from among his people; he virtually renounced his right to the standing and privileges of the covenant, Jos. xix. 29-32. The mode of afflicting the soul was not more exactly defined, in order that the people might perceive something more than a merely external deprivation to be meant; but undoubtedly it was also intended to find, and for the most part would actually find, an outward expression in the total or comparative abstinence from food. (See Feast.) The distinctive character and design of the day was to bring sin, the collective sin of the whole year, to remembrance, for the purpose of being earnestly dealt with and atoned; and anything like a light and jocular frame of mind on such an occasion was entirely unbecoming. It is to the penitent and humble alone that God shows mercy and grants forgiveness; no one in another mood had reason to expect that any sacrifice he presented, even on ordinary occasions, would be accepted on his behalf; and on what was emphatically the day of atonements, when the high-priest was to make confession of all the sins of the congregation, and in their behalf enter with the blood of reconciliation into the most holy place, if the contrite and lowly spirit was awaiting in any of the members of the community, it was but too clear that they had really no part or lot in the matter. In this general aspect of the feast, therefore, it presented itself as an occasion and a call of a peculiarly solemn kind, for the people of the covenant returning through the channel of godly sorrow and atonement for sin into the blessed rest of God's mercy and favour, so that as partakers thereof they might more freely before him and run the way of his commandments.

The more peculiar interest of the day, however, concentrated itself in the person and actions of the high-priest; and here we have a very remarkable and significant series of operations. (1) The first thing that required to be attended to was the dress of the high-priest. After the usual morning oblations, at which, if he personally officiated, he was robed in the garments that were made for ornament and beauty, Ex. xxiv. 10, he had to strip himself; and, having washed his person, had to put on other garments made of plain linen—a linen tunic, linen breeches, a linen girdle, and the linen mitre—which are called emphatically "garments of holiness," and as soon as the more distinctive service of the day was over, he had again to put them off, and leave them in the sanctuary till another occasion, Ex. xxv. 32. These plain linen garments—clean and white as they doubtless were—require no explanation; they were the symbols of that holiness which became one who would enter the immediate presence of the Most High, and meditate with effect between him and sinful men, Ex. xxiv. 10-11. Hence, the high-priest's investment with them was preceded by the washing of his person; he had first to make himself symbolically clean or holy, and then outwardly appeared unto such. (2) When thus personally prepared, he had to provide himself with a bullock for a sin-offering, the blood of which was for theatonement of himself and his house; that is, the whole sanctified family to which he belonged; and with this bullock he had to make his entrance, for the first time, on that day within the vail, and sprinkle the mercy-seat also in front of it seven times. This act, however, had to be accompanied with another—perhaps it would be more correct to say, with Winer and Bahr, preceded by another—his bearing a censer with incense, kindled by live coals, taken from the brazen altar, that the cloud of incense might, as it were, go before, and cover the mercy-seat ere the act of sprinkling was performed, Lev. vii. 11. As it would not be quite easy to carry the vessel with the blood along with the censer of smoking incense, the probability is that they were two separate actions, effected by a double entrance. But whether that might be the case or not, there can be no doubt that the action with the incense took precedence of the sprinkling, and must be considered as the primary rite. Be it so, as it was, and this action indicated that the entrance of the high-priest into the most holy place, as the head and representative of a sinful community, was no privilege to be claimed as a right, but one that had to be sought by supplication from a merciful and prayer-bearing God. Entering, therefore, as a suppllicant, and entering for the purpose of sprinkling the blood that had been shed for the atonement of his personal and family guilt, the high-priest became on this occasion an impressive witness of the manifold sinfulness of mankind, unprofitably hateful in the sight of God, and is only to be regarded to the prayerful and penitent through the shedding of blood. (3) All this, however, was but preliminary to the great act of reconciliation, which bore respect to the worshipping community of Israel. For this purpose two goats were selected—which were to be taken from the congregation, as the bullock had been from himself, but which, though two, were still viewed as a formal unity. It was as a sin-offering that they were to be taken, and presented before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, Lev. xvi. 7. One of the two acts was all that had to be symbolised on the occasion, and two victims were chosen to do it, simply on account of the impossibility of giving otherwise a full representation of what was included in the act—the one being designed to supply the means of atonement, and the other to exhibit its perfected result. If, however, the two goats constituted properly but one offering, an offering which was presented before the Lord, it is clear that to him alone they both really belonged, and that there can be no ground for dividing as some have erroneously done between the two goats, as if the one only were for God, and the other for Satan. The same conclusion is still further confirmed by the act of casting lots upon them; for this was practised only in regard to what was recognised as peculiarly the Lord's, and with the view of ascertaining his mind in some respect concerning it. The question to be here determined was, not whether of the two goats was to be adjudged to the Lord, and which to some other party; but what respectively were the parts to be assigned to each if them, in the complex act of sin-bearing, which was to be effected through their joint instrumentality. In such a case their respective destinations in the matter could not differ at all essentially; the parts to be performed by each could not have been mutually independent, far less formally antagonistic; since it turned simply on the casting of the lot which should be destined to this one part and which to the other. The two parts actually were one for the Lord, the other for Azazel, or for a scape-goat, as it is rendered in our version. On this expression a considerable diversity of opinion has been entertained, and it will be necessary to consider the point separately. (8) SCAPE-GOAT. But the real import of the transaction connected with this second goat is made so plain otherwise, that nothing material can be said to depend upon the precise term. (4) The goat on which the Lord's lot fell was forthwith slain as a sin-offering, and with its blood, as before with that of the bullock, the high-priest entered anew for the second, and probably the third time within the vail, and sprinkled it upon and before the mercy-seat; then, returning into the sanctuary or holy place, he sprinkled also there, and again at the altar of burnt-offering in the court, Ex. xxix. 14. For with that blood he had to make atonement, not merely for the congregation directly, but also for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of our transgressions in all their sins; and so also for the tabernacle of the congregation (the tent of meeting) that dwelt in amongst them in the midst of their uncleanness. Not, of course, that these things were in themselves capable of contracting guilt: the sins atoned for still were the sins of the congregation: only, with the view of showing more distinctly their thankfulness in God's sight, and their contrariety to his service, they were here contemplated as having come up from all quarters of the land, and imparted defilement to the several apartments and vessels of the house, in which symbolically the people were allowed to meet and dwell with God. It was, in another form, the people's concentrated guilt: and so the blood that sanctified was the blood of the one sin-offering that was to be presented for the congregation of Israel. (5) Then came the action with the other goat—the still unappropriated part of the sin-offering—which remained standing before the tabernacle or temple, while the high-priest was making atonement for the sins of the people with the blood of the slain goat. Having laid hands on the head of that live goat, the priest had now to confess over it "all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and thereafter send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat it is added shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat into the wilderness." The iniquities, it must be remembered, had been all previously atoned for everything in God's house, goes to the very seat of the divine Majesty, which they had polluted, had been again recognised; so that when now laid upon the head of the live goat, it must have been as iniquities cancelled in the divine reconciling, and destined to utter oblivion. Hence, no sooner were they transferred to this goat than he was dismissed with them into the wilderness, bearing them to a land not inhabited, where not a being lived that could call them to remembrance, or become a witness of their existence. It was, in short, a symbolical action, indicating to the bodily eye the result of the atonement that had been made, and rendering palpable to the people the comforting truth, that God had in a manner cast out of his sight their past transgressions, having accepted the atonement. (In the English version there is an unhappy rendering at the first mention of this live goat, which greatly obscures the meaning of the transaction. The words there used regarding the live goat should run, “shall be presented alive before the Lord to cover upon him,” or make atonement for him, not “to make an atonement with him.”) This goat was the representative of the people as first to be atoned for, and then actually participating in the atonement—forgiven; and the action with him took up the history where the death of the other had left it. If the clean goat could have been raised to life again, the continuity of the action would have been more readily perceived; but this not being practicable except by miracle, the action was carried forward to its fitting result by a fresh goat taking the place of the other.)

(6.) The remaining parts of the solemnity may be regarded as the natural and appropriate winding up of the service, rather than anything strictly new. The high-priest, after disposing the goat, had to dispose himself of the plain linen clothes in which the peculiar work of the day had been performed, and resume his wonted attire. At the same time he had to wash his flesh—a process to be undergone at the beginning and close of all proudly ministrations of a more formal kind, as a witness of the pollutions which intermingled even with these. Then he had to offer two burnt-offerings, one for himself and one for the people; to make an atonement, it is said, for himself and for the people—an atonement even after the special atonement which had already been made in the previous service. It betokened the presence of sin in the very act of getting sin taken away, and the necessity of all throwing themselves on the mercy of God even at the close of transactions which had brought them into most immediate contact with it. Being, however, a burnt-offering, not a sin-offering, that was now presented, this implied, that along with the taking away of the guilt that had been contracted, there was the call to a fresh dedication of soul and body to the service of God. In this case, of course, the entire flesh of the victim was consumed upon the altar; but the flesh of the sin-offerings—the bullock for the high priest and the goat for the congregation—had to be taken, in accordance with the law regulating such cases, without the camp or city, and burned in a clean place. This burning arose, not from the flesh being polluted—on the contrary, the flesh of all sin-offerings was declared to be most holy, Isa. xxii. 12; but here, where the priesthood and congregation were alike concerned, there was no one who could with propriety eat of it; it had therefore to be burned, but still as a holy thing in a clean place. Yet having had to do with sin, the person who took charge of the burning of the carcass, as also the person who was employed in conducting the live goat into the wilderness, had each to bathe his person, and wash his clothes, before resuming his place in the congregation.

Such was the nature of the day of yearly atonement, and such were the services by which it was distinguished. It was the occasion above all others, on which the ideas of sin and atonement rose to their highest potency in the ritual of the old covenant, and on which also, for the purpose of exhibiting those ideas in their clearest light, the distinction came most prominently out between priest and people—the idea of one ordained from among men, for the purpose of drawing near to God, and mediating in behalf of his fellowmen in things pertaining to sin and salvation. But these ideas after all could only be developed imperfectly under the shadowy and carnal forms of the old covenant; in the new alone do they find their proper realization. And it is the less needful to enlarge upon this view of the matter, as of all the Old Testament services this is the one which has received the fullest explanation from the pen of an inspired writer in the New. In Heb. ix. and x. almost everything of importance connected with the matter has been touched upon, both as regards the correspondences between the new and the old, and the superiority of the one over the other. Here alone, in the new, have we a high-priest who is perfectly fitted, from his own inherent attributes and character, to enter the holiest; who without sin of his own, and consequently without any personal atonement, can make intercession for the guilty; and who, by his one spotless, infinitely precious atonement in behalf of all, has for ever laid open the way by which they may draw near and find acceptance in his sight. The veil, therefore, which excluded a free approach into the holiest, while it admitted a single approach by means of a representative once every year, was rent in twain at the death of Christ, to show that what had been imperfectly enjoyed before was now, in a manner, made common to the people of God; that in the name of Christ all who believed might come with boldness to the throne of grace, and deal directly with God. But with these differences there are also fundamental agreements, and the palpable and solemn manner in which, on the day of atonement, the great truths were brought out, of the reality and evil desert of sin, of the necessity of a mediating priest and a prevailing atonement to purge it away, of the complete and total obliteration into which the evil is cast when God’s method of reconciliation has been complied with, may be contemplated with much profit still by the people of God. They can thus behold the things which concern their relation to God written in an open book, and get a clearer apprehension and more realizing conviction of them, than could otherwise be obtained. It is for that purpose partly that the Old Testament pattern of the heavenly things is used in New Testament scripture, and for that purpose it may still with advantage be employed.

VI. The Feast of Tabernacles.—This was the last of the divinely-appointed solemn or sacred festivals, under the old covenant. It was made to commence on the fifteenth of the seventh month, five days after the day of yearly atonement; and, in respect to continuance, was the most protracted of all the festivals. The Passover was to last for seven days; but an eighth was added in the feast of tabernacles; and in this case also, as at the feast of unleavened bread, the first and the last day was to be observed as a Sabbath, a day of holy convocation. In Le. xxiii. 34, it bears the name of the feast of tabernacles; though strictly it should be boothah (succoth); but in other passages it has the designation of the feast of ingathering, because it took place “in the end of the year, when they had gathered in their labours out of the field.” Ex. xxiii. 16; De. xi. 13. The meaning is, that the entire circle of the year’s husbandry should then have been completed, and its produce garnered; not the crops of the field merely reaped, but the vintage also past, and there remained only such operations as might be needed to prepare for the coming winter. For an agricultural population like the Israelites that might justly be called the end of the year, and it must usually have been also a season of repose. The people would, therefore, have ample time for the celebration of the feast.

The other and more common designation of the feast—that of booths or tabernacles—points to the nature of the feast itself and the mode of its celebration. A booth is not precisely the same as a tent or tabernacle, but is so far alike, that the one as well as the other was a thin and temporary fabric, specifically constructed for the sake of shelter. It was not, however, made of canvas, but of branches and leaves woven together (the root being ָתַּנְתָּה). Such was the booth of Deut. ch. ii. 4, and such also the shed Jacob made for his cattle near Shechem, Judges x. 22. But the material of the structure was often not regarded; and hence booths and tents are used interchangeably for the dwellings of the children of Israel in the wilderness. "Ye shall dwell in booths," it is said with reference to the feast, "seven days; all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths; that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt," Lev. xxiii. 43. In the great majority of passages referring to the wilderness-sojourn, it is tents that the Israelites are said to have dwelt in, for example, Deut. i. 17; Nu. x. 20; xxx. 4; Deut. vi. 11; xxxi. 8. It was those which in reality were chiefly used, as being more securely possessed and carried about—light and manageable, the proper 'boule' of a yet unsettled and wandering population, and as such forming a natural contrast to fixed and stationary dwellings. This contrast is formally brought out in the case of the Rechabites, whose father charged them not to build houses, but to dwell in tents; and by David in respect to the dwelling-place of God, on the memorable occasion when he said to Nathan the prophet, "So now I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains," that is to say, 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Sam. xxvii. 11. There is a pointed reference also to the same contrast in a New Testament passage, in which the apostle distinctly indicates the superiority of that building of God, the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, which awaits the glorious believer, to the earthly house of his tabernacle, which is to be dissolved in death, 2 Cor. v. 1—"the one a frail, perishable framework, falling to pieces when it has served its purpose, the other a fixed, stable, everlasting habitation.

When the Israelites had established themselves in Canaan, and grown into a numerous people, a practical difficulty might be experienced as to the proper celebration of this feast—the difficulty of getting themselves provided at one central place of meeting with branches of palms and other trees in sufficient abundance for the occasion. It is said, they did so provide themselves in the time of Nehemiah, ch. vii. 15: "The people went forth and brought (65, branches of various sorts of trees) and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house, and in their courts, and in the courts of the house of God, and in the street of the water-gate, and in the street of the gate of Ephraim." In all these places they then made booths and sat under them; but it is added, "since the days of Joshua the son of Nun, unto that day, the children of Israel had not done so." We are not to suppose that they had during that long period allowed the feast of tabernacles to fall into abeyance, or in celebrating it had made no attempt to construct booths with branches of trees. That the feast was kept, and kept so as to exercise an important influence on the national mind, is evident from the fact of Jeroboam having instituted a similar feast in his kingdom, only transferring the time from the seventh to the eighth month, 1 Kings xi. 21, 22. But the use of branches in celebrating the feast had never been so marked and general. And this might to some extent be accounted for from the much smaller number attending the feast, than would be usual in the brighter periods of the commonwealth. Indeed, as the larger proportion of those who actually assembled to keep the feast were necessarily far from their homes, and were for the time living in public rather than dwelling in families, one might say that the spirit and design of the ordinance would have been maintained, if there were only such an erection of booths in the more public streets and places of general resort, as admitted of the people entering them occasionally and spending a portion of each day in them. When the ordinary wasid would rarely have been any difficulty in obtaining a supply of branches sufficient for such a purpose, and even for furnishing besides a number of the families residing in the neighborhood with what might be required for their individual use.

That this booth or tent like appearance which was to characterize the feast had a commemorative bearing, admits of no question. In the passage already quoted from Leviticus it is stated as the reason for the making of booths, that succeeding generations might know how they had been made to dwell in booths, when the Lord brought them out of the land of Egypt. It was designed to embody in a perpetually recurring action the historical fact of the unsettled, wandering life of Israel during the wilderness-sojourn, that the memory of it might be ever fresh in the minds of their descendants. And in the commemoration of this fact, as of facts generally which are enshrined in commemorative ordinances, it is to be understood, that the fact itself was of a fundamental character, containing the germ of spiritual truths and principles vitally important for every age of the church. Such undoubtedly was the character of the wilderness-sojourn for the Israelites, though not precisely in the same degree as the deliverance from Egypt which was commemorated in the Passover. It was, however, of fundamental importance in this respect, that it formed in a sense the connecting link between the house of bondage, on the one hand, and the inheritance of life and blessing, on the other. The Lord then in a peculiar manner came near to reveal himself to his people—pitched his tabernacle in the midst of them—communicated to them his law and testimony, and set up the entire polity which was to mould the future generations of Israel, and to be commemorated rather than abolished by the incarnation and work of Christ. Hence, the annual celebration of the festival of tabernacles was like a perpetual renewing of their religious youth; it was keeping in lively recollection the time of their espousals, and placing themselves anew amid the scenes and transactions which constituted the formative period of their history. On this account also, it doubtless was that the feast of tabernacles was the time chosen for reading, every seventh year, the whole law in the hearing of the people, Deut. xxi. 9-11; and not, as some have thought (in particular Ebrin, Symm. 81, p. 693), because it was the greatest feast, or the one most largely frequented. In this respect the Passover certainly held the foremost place. But it was when sojourning in the wilderness, and dwelling in tents, that the covenant of law, under which they were to go into the land of Canaan and take possession of it for themselves and their posterity, was formally given and ratified. So that nothing could be more appropriate, when recounting the scenes of their religious youth, than being called to listen anew to that law, the giving of which formed so distinguishing a feature of the time. This connection of the law, however, with the feast of tabernacles, affords a collateral proof of what was already established—that the feast of Pentecost was no commemoration of the giving of the law; for had it been, the formal reading of the law would certainly have been appointed for the feast of Pentecost, rather than that of tabernacles.

There was, therefore, a much closer connection between the booth-dwelling portion of Israel's history and its future rest in Canaan, than is found in contemplating the one as the mere transition period that naturally connected to the other. And it will appear still more so if we look to the personal training through which the Israelites then passed, and the discipline they were made to undergo. If in one respect it was the period of the Lord's manifestation to his people, whereby he sought to make them acquainted with his purposes of love and his principles of government, it was, in another, the period of their trial and humiliation—which, by hardships tempered with mercies, difficulties, and disappointments, interchanging with wonderful displays of power and glory, the Lord brought out the evil that was in their hearts, and schooled them into subjection to his righteous will. Viewed with reference to its prolonged continuance, as the forty years' sojourn, it was emphatically a period of judgment and discipline. Hence the words of Moses at the close of it: "Thou shalt remember all the way by which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep his commandments or not. And he humbled thee, and sufferest thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knowest not, neither did thy fathers know, that he might make thee know that man liveth not by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord," Deut. viii. 2. 3. This alternating process of want and supply, of great and appalling danger ever ready to be met by seasonable, though unexpected or extraordinary relief, was the grand testing process by which the still existing unbelief and carnal in their hearts was made manifest, that it might be condemned and purged out, and that they might be formed, as a people, to that humble reliance on God's arm, and single-hearted devotedness to his fear, which alone could prepare them for occupying and permanently retaining the Promised Land. It proved in the issue greatly too severe and searching for the mass of the original congregation; in other words, the evil in their natures was too deeply rooted to be effectually purged out, even by such well-adjusted and skilfully applied means of purification; and, as the result, they were judged incapable of entering the land of Canaan. But for those who were allowed to enter, and their posterity to latest generations, it was of essential moment to have kept alive upon their minds the peculiar training and discipline of the wilderness; in order to their habitually aiming at the high moral condition, the living faith in God, the weakness of heart, the self-denial, the filial obedience to which it was designed to conduct. In this respect especially it was their duty to be ever connecting the present with the past—to be traveling over again the ground on which their fathers had acquired their dear-bought experience; and it was only voluntarily making its discipline and results their own that they could be warranted to look forward to fresh seasons of prosperity and joy. For this purpose more especially the feast was instituted. And while the fullness of earthly comfort amid which it was held, being brought into contrast with their formerly poor and wandering condition, called them to rejoice, the remembrance of judgment and trial in the desert taught them to rejoice with trembling—reminded them that their continued possession of the land of Canaan, and the enjoyment in it of fruitful seasons and settled homes, depended on their fidelity to the covenant of God—warned them, that if they turned back in heart to the manners of Egypt, or became lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, periods of trial and destitution might again be expected. Hence, when such actually came to be the case—when the peculiar lessons of this feast ceased to be regarded—when Israel "knew not that it was the Lord who gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold," it became needful to send them virtually again through the rough and sifting process of her youth. "Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof; I will also cause all her mirth to cease, and I will destroy her vine and her fig-trees; and I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and will speak comfortably unto her; and I will give her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope," Is. xlvii. 1-3. It was not that the scenes of youth were literally to be enacted over again; but that the kind of dealing involved in them—the fleshly corruptions, the enforced separation from natural delights, the severe trial and discipline which characterized the wilderness-sojourn—must be undergone anew, in order that the spirit of carnal and devoted zeal, in which it had issued, might again become the characteristic of the people of God.

The view now given of the nature and design of the feast—crowned, as it manifestly is, in the representations of Scripture, and the essential relations of things—renders unnecessary any formal exposure of the opinion which has been frequently maintained, that the feast was chiefly an occasion for carnal merriment, dancing, and revelry. When the people themselves became carnal, it would no doubt partake much of the same character; but as instituted by God, it was designed to be otherwise observed. The occasion was certainly meant to be a joyous one. The people were commanded to rejoice over all the goodness and mercy which the Lord had given them to experience; but their joy was to be such as could be indulged in before the Lord, and should have admitted nothing that might interfere with their interest in his favour and fellowship. It was apparently from this relation of the feast to a hallowed cheerfulness and exultation, that the broad-leaved palm-tree was so much used on the occasion. The people were not absolutely shut up to branches of this tree; for, beside palm-trees, willows are also specified in the original institution, &c. xxviii. 10, and at the feast in Nehemiah's time, olive, myrtle, and pine are mentioned, along with the palm, as having been employed. But as branches of "goodly trees" were required, the palm seems to have been regarded, from its peculiarly rich foliage, as the fittest symbol of the joyful feelings which the feast was intended to call forth; and we are not without other instances in Scripture, which show how readily the palm was associated with the solemnities, or seasons of thanksgiving.

One of the most singular peculiarities of this feast remains yet to be noticed; it consists in the number of victims to be presented for burnt-offerings. There was the same sin-offering as in the other stated feasts - a single goat to be offered each day; but for the burnt-offering, instead of one ram and seven lambs, there were to be two rams and fourteen lambs on each of the seven days, and instead of one bullock, thirteen bullocks at the commencement and diminishing by one each day, till on the seventh there were merely seven. The eighth day, though in one sense belonging to the feast, might also be regarded as in some sort standing by itself, forming the closing solemnity of the whole festival season; and accordingly the special burnt-offerings on that day differed very little from that of other festival days, and were entirely the same as the new moon and the tenth day of the seventh month - namely, one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, NEHEM. vi. 11, 12, 13. The difficulty is to account for the extraordinary number of victims appointed for the seven days of the feast of tabernacles - double the number of rams and lambs that were fixed for all the other solemnities, and the remarkable peculiarity in respect to the bullocks, of beginning with such a number as thirteen and ending with seven. Viewing the matter generally, one may readily perceive a reason for the larger number of the offerings presented, in the occasion of the feast, as appointed at the close of the ingathering of all the fruits of the season, and intended to call forth a grateful sense of the Lord's goodness in bestowing upon his people the gifts of his beneficence. We make unacquainted, as already intimated, of its being called in a passage often quoted from Plutarch (Sympos. i. 4. 13, "the greatest of the Jewish feasts," or of the similar expressions applied to it by Philo, Josephus (Ant. iv. 14), and the rabbins; for in no proper sense could it be called the greatest; in depth of meaning and vital importance it did not equal either the feast of the Passover or that of the day of atonement. Yet, so specially connected with the Lord's bountyfulness in giving, it might most appropriately be marked by a more than common liberality in the number and value of the offerings, especially of such offerings as were from their nature significant of the surrender and dedication of the person of the worshipper. But why precisely double the number of rams and lambs on each of the seven days, and half the number on the eighth; and, especially, why the regular diminution in the number of the bullocks from thirteen to seven, and, on the last day, from seven to one - of this no adequate explanation has yet been given. The opinions of the rabbins are mere conjectures, most of them frivolous and absurd, and deserve no particular notice. To see in it, with Bahr, a reference to the waning moon, is quite fanciful; nor is it less so, to understand it, with the majority of the elder theologians, of the gradual weaning of animal sacrifices; for the sacred number seven being reserved for the seventh day of the feast, together with the usual feast-offerings on the eighth day, might as well be conceived to point in the opposite direction. Perhaps nothing more was meant by the arrangement than to give an indication of the variety, within certain limits, which the sacrificial system admitted of in the expression of devout and grateful feeling. It was proper, on joyful occasions, to let the overflow of feeling appear in the multiplicity of the vicarious sacrifices brought forward from a desire that nothing depended therein for the virtue and stability of the covenant. The seven bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs, on the seventh day of the feast, or the one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, on the eighth, were sufficient to represent whatever was vital in the covenant, or in the people's connection with it; while yet certain fuller embodiments of spiritual feeling were suitable at peculiar times, and never more than when the solemnities of the great day of atonement were fresh in the recollection of the people. Whether this view may be held to be satisfactory or not, it presents nothing at least that is arbitrary, or that interferes with the general principles of the ancient economy.

In addition to the ceremonies prescribed in the law, the later Jews were wont to observe certain customs at this feast, in particular the custom of drawing water from the well of Siloam, and pouring it, mixed with wine, from a golden pitcher, by the hands of a priest, on the altar at the time of the morning sacrifice. This was done, according to the Jewish authorities, on the seven days of the feast, but not on the eighth, as has often been improperly represented. They are quite express upon that point, for they reckoned only the seven days to belong to the feast proper; the eighth was esteemed a kind of separate and concluding solemnity (see notes on Jer. iii. 19, where, Bede, Rabbin.; and Jer. vii. 35, where, Winer, B. C. I. 528. 6). If therefore what is called "the last, the great day of the feast," in Jn. vii. 35, was meant the eighth day, our Lord must have taken occasion, from the above on that day of the customary libation on the altar, to point to himself as the living fountain that should supply what was needed for the wants of the soul. But it is more probable that the seventh day is meant, as the last and great day of the feast in the ordinary Jewish reckoning; so that the water mixed with wine was poured out amid demonstrations of gladness from the people, shouting in the words of Isaiah, "with joy shall ye draw water from the wells of salvation;" and our Lord, seizing the opportunity to draw their thoughts from the shadow to the reality, exclaimed, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; he that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

The bearing of the feast of tabernacles on the realities of the gospel is not difficult to be perceived, and in its leading features may be indicated in comparatively few words. The Israelites in their collective position and history typified the seed of God's elect under the gospel; and therefore, in this feast, which brought together the beginnings and endings of God's dealings with Israel, we have a representation of the spiritual life, as well as its earlier struggles as in its ultimate triumphs. We behold the antitype, first of all, and without imperfection, in the history of Him who was pre-eminently God's elect, the Lord Jesus Christ - led up, after an obscure, and for a season persecuted, youth, into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil; and when for forty days - a day for a year.
FEASTS OF CHARITY

In his treatment of the subject, he brought into the following with the full assurance of victory to accomplish the mighty work of man's redemption: in this work, also, the beginning and the end meet together; and one is the same, the first, and the last, and the new creation. The obedience and sufferings go before, and by the foundation for the final glory. Jesus must personally triumph over sin and death, fulfill all in respect of the Father's will, before he can receive a kingdom from the Father, or be prepared to wield the sceptre of his government, and enjoy the riches of his purchased blessings. And so, to render manifest and keep alive in the minds of his people the connection between the beginning and the end, he ever links together the cross and the crown—shows himself in the heavenly places as the Lamb that was slain, and inherits there a name that is above every name, because he took on him the form of a servant, and humbled himself unto the dust of death, for the salvation of men.

With a still closer resemblance to the type, because with a greater similarity of conduct in the persons respectively concerned, does the spiritual import of the feast meet with its realization in the case of Christ's genuine followers. Hence the prophet Zechariah, who, more than any of the prophets except Ezekiel, delights in representing the future under a simple recurrence of the past, when pointing to the result of the church's triumph over her enemies, speaks of it as a going up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of tabernacles, ch. xiv. 16. Then, that is to say, the Lord's redeemed people shall rejoice in the fulness of their portion, and have their experiences of bliss heightened and enhanced by the remembrance of past tribulation and conflict. For the present they are passing through the wilderness; it is their period of trial and probation, and by constant alternations of fear and hope, of danger and deliverance, of difficulties and trials, they must be prepared and ripened for their final destiny. It is through these that they must be kept habitually mindful of their own weakness and insufficiency, their proneness to be overcome of evil, and the dependence necessary to be maintained on the word and promises of God. Through them also, aided by the renewing grace of the Spirit, must the dust be purged out of their corrupt natures, and the old man of corruption itself thrown off, and left, as it were, to perish in the desert, that with the new man of pure and blessed life they may take possession of the heavenly Canaan. Then shall the church of the redeemed hold with her divine Head a perpetual feast of tabernacles—living and reigning with him in his kingdom; and, so far from grudging the trials and difficulties of the way, rejoicing the more on account of them, because seeing in them the needful course of discipline for the place and destiny of the redeemed, and knowing that if there had been no wilderness trials and conflicts on earth, there could have been no meekness for the inheritance of the saints in light. The glorious company in Rev. vii. arrayed in white robes and with palms in their hands—the collective representation of a redeemed and triumphant church—are the proper antitypes of Israel keeping the feast of tabernacles.

Beside the festivals now described, and which alone bear in scripture the sacred name of woodens or sacred feasts, there are two others which, though not of divine origin or of religious obligation, went by the same name, and were commonly observed in the gospel age: these were the feast of Dedication and the feast of Purim. (See Dedication and Purim.)

FEASTS OF CHARITY, or LOVE, more commonly called AGAPE, or LOVE-FEASTS, differed materially from the institutions designated Feasts under the Old Testament; they were actual meals, though partaking so far of a religious character, that they were usually celebrated in the same place where the disciples met for worship, and in close connection with religious exercises. They are mentioned only once under that name in New Testament scripture; viz., in Jude 12, where in reference to the false and corrupt professors who were insinuating themselves into the church, it is said, "These are spots in your agape." But there can be no doubt that, though the name is not used, it is the same sort of feasts that are mentioned in I Co. xvi., and which, from being first abjured by party purposes, came to be confounded with the solemnities of the Lord's supper. Indeed, the origin of them must be traced still higher, to that outburst of Christian liberality and brotherly affection which manifested itself among the converts at Jerusalem after the day of Pentecost, and which led to a regular ministration of food among the poorer brethren, as well as frequent social meals among all, &c. ii. 45, 65; v. 35; vi. 1, &c. The churches generally in early times seem to have regarded the practice thus begun at Jerusalem, as imposing a sort of obligation to similar practices elsewhere, at least as presenting a pattern that it would be well to imitate; and from notices occurring in the writings of the second and third centuries, it would seem that the agape very commonly formed a part of the regular observances of the Christian churches. They are so described both by Justin Martyr about the middle of the second century, and by Tertullian about the beginning of the third. (See Apol. ii. 42. "ib. iv. 20.) The latter says, "Our supper shows its character by its name, which is the Greek word for love. Whatever expense it costs, it is given to expend money in the cause of piety, since by this refreshment we give aid to all that are poor. Being done as a matter of religion, nothing foul or unbecoming is admitted into it. No one partakes till prayer has been made to God; as much is eaten as is necessary to satisfy the demands of hunger, as much is drunk as consists with sobriety; every one remembering that through the night also God is to be worshiped," &c. As the church grew, however, in numbers and wealth, it became more difficult to manage such feasts with propriety, and so as not to prevent them from becoming occasions of scandal rather than of edification. Even Tertullian in his latter days complains of a deviation from the original purity, in the custom which was then creeping in, and was afterwards formally sanctioned, of setting double portions before the rulers of the church (De princeps e. 12). Distinctions of rank generally came to be observed at them; excesses were not unfruitfully committed; and the rich, by the contributions they made toward the object, sought to gain the praise of liberality; so that the agape came by degrees to be disconsidered, and were ultimately forbidden to be held in churches. An order to this effect was issued by the council of Laodicea about the middle of the third century, and by a council at Carthage in A.D. 391. They gradually fell into disuse, and are now observed by some only of the smaller sects.
FELIX. ANTOINEUS, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, from whom he was also called Claudius Felix (so called), was governor of Judea at the time of St. Paul's seizure and imprisonment in Jerusalem, A.D. 52 or 54.

The precise period of his appointment to that province is involved in some obscurity (it was probably about the year A.D. 52), as is also the exact feeling on which he first entered on the administration of affairs in the East. The accounts of Josephus and Tacitus are somewhat discordant. According to the latter (Ann. xii. 26, 27) Felix was appointed joint-procurator along with Ventidius Campanus, the one taking the region of Judea, the other of Galilee; and both being guilty of mal-administration, contriving at acts of robbery and violence committed within their respective boundaries, and enriching themselves by the spoils that were brought to them by the successful parties, they were accused to the emperor, and Quadratus was commissioned to investigate into the matter, and act as he saw fit. He condemned only Campanus, and elevated Felix to the seat of judgment. Josephus, however, represents Felix as coming into the East only after Campanus had been tried, on account of the disturbances which had prevailed, and deposed for his misconduct; and he speaks of Felix as having been made procurator of Galilee, Samaria, and Perea, as well as Judea (Ant. xvi. 3, 9, 10). The probability is, that the account of Josephus approaches nearest to the truth; and it is now generally admitted that the Roman historian has observed in regard to the wife of Felix, Drusilla, whom he represents as the grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. This was certainly not the case in respect to one Drusilla, whom Felix married; and it is against all probability that he should have had two wives of that name. In regard to the character of the man, both historians present him substantially in the same light. Tacitus, in his graphic style, says of him, that he "exercised the authority of a king with the disposition of a slave servil invencere in omnibus munere crudelitateque."

This last, and that he thought he could do anything with impunity, since he had the powerful influence of his brother Pallas at court to protect him (Ann. xii. 26). Josephus so far speaks well of Felix, that he mentions his activity in clearing the country of robbers and plotters of sedition, though in such a manner as to indicate the indifference of fearful barbarities war, ii. 18, 19. Instances are given of his treacherous and cruel procedes, which were carried so far, especially toward the Jews about Caesarea, that at the expiry of his office they sent a petition to Rome to remove him before the emperor, but the interest of Pallas proved too powerful for them (Ann. xx. 59, 60). One of the most infamious parts of his conduct was his seduction of Drusilla, the sister of Herod Agrippa, who had been married to Arizas, king of Emesa, after the latter with a view to his marriage had submitted to the rite of circumcision. Felix, on seeing this woman, became enamoured of her beauty, and by the arts of a Jewish magician, of the name of Simon, got her detached from her husband and married to himself. Such was the man before whom Paul had to plead his cause, and with whom he reasoned of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." No wonder that the judge trembled at the pleadings of his prisoner; yet it appears he simply trembled; his convictions on the side of rectitude did not carry him even so far as to induce him to do justice to the injured apostle. "He hoped Vol. 1.

that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him"—intend mainly on turning the occasion into an opportunity of personal advantage; and because his corrupt love of money was not gratified, after two years' delay, he had the baseness to leave Paul still bound. We know nothing more of him than that he was recalled to Rome and succeeded in his government by Festus. But Josephus in a few notices that Drusilla and the son she bore Felix perished together in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius (Ann. xvi. 27, 28).

FENCED CITIES. So FORT, FORTIFICATION.

FERIES (תיכון,역). It is impossible to say with certainty what animal is intended by this word. As an application it occurs only in Lev. xii. 5; but the same word and its root occur repeatedly elsewhere, and always with the signification of crying, sighing, or groaning. Some animal of minute size, conventionally reckoned among the "creeping things," which has the habit of crying out, must be looked for. Some of the creatures with which the역 in is associated seem to be the smaller Mammalia, and there is no reason why this may not be of the same kind. The LXX. render 역 by πίττυς, by which the Greeks understood the field-mouse. As this, however, common as it is in Palestine, may be represented by a different word, as the common house-mouse is equally abundant as with us, and is everywhere known by its slight squeak, a term to interpret 역 by Home favour, the common house-mouse.

FESTIVALS. So FEASTS.

FESTUS, PORTIUS, the successor of Felix in the government of Judea. He received his appointment from Nero, probably about the year A.D. 60, and held it for a comparatively short time; for he was not long in the East till he died. In New Testament history he is mentioned only in connection with the case of the apostle Paul, which was brought under his notice shortly after his arrival at Caesarea. He was a man of superior character to Felix, and would in all probability have set him at liberty, if he had understood precisely what the question at issue was, and what were the aims and tactics of Paul's opponents. But being ignorant of these, and having proposed, after a brief and partial hearing of the case, to have the matter transferred to a fuller hearing to Jerusalem, Paul, well foreseeing what advantage would be taken of such a course, appealed to Cæsar. This he had a right to do as a Roman citizen, and Festus had no alternative but to sustain the appeal, Ac. xx. 23, 25. The only further notice we have of him is in respect to the visit paid him shortly after by Agrippa and Bernice, during which he took occasion to mention the case of Paul, and finding it would be agreeable to his distinguished guests, he gave the apostle an opportunity of declaring his case in the audience of the whole court. He was himself astonished at what he heard; but conceiving all to proceed from the fancies of a heated imagination, aided by the dreamy speculations of eastern lore, he said to Paul, "Thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad," which drew forth the startled and striking reply, "I am not mad, most noble Festus, but speak forth the words of truth and soberness." Festus had also to take part, as we learn from Josephus, in ridding the country of the robbers that still infested it, and in repressing the turbulent spirit that was now beginning in various directions to seek vent for itself. He got into a quarrel with the priests at Jerusalem by the construction of a dining-room in the governor’s house, which commanded a view of the courts of the temple, and which was met by the erection of a wall intended to intercept his view. The matter was carried to Rome, and through the influence of Poppaea was decided in favour of the priests (Joseph., Ant. xx. 8). The impression left by the few notices that have come down to us of Festus is, that he was one of the better specimens of Roman procurators, with Rome’s characteristic respect to order and justice, but not without her now prevailing indulgence to questions connected with serious and earnest religion. Matters of this sort he regarded as severely worthy of his regard.

FIG. In the Jussieuian arrangement of plants, the fig belongs to the Arniopsaceae, or the bax-fruits order; and this again is treated by many as a section or tribe of the Figaceae—a large and miscellaneous family, which would in that case include herbs and trees as dissimilar as the hop and the nettle, the hemp and the mulberry, the nutritious bax-fruits and the deadly mias, the insignificant polypody which scantily adorns the ruined wall, and the mighty baxian covering whole congregations with its impenetrable shade.

The fig-tree of the Bible is the Ficus carica of Linnaeus, and derives its trivial name from that maritime province of Asia Minor which in classical times was so famous for this fruit, that we find Ovid and Cicero speaking of “curians” (curians) when they mean figs. We ourselves have the same habit of naming fruits after their most famous localities, till, as not unfrequently happens, the name is merged in the adjective. Thus the grapes of Cornwall have contracted into “curants,” and the plums of Damascas are “damsons” (damascena).

Of eastern origin, the fig has been from time immemorial naturalized over a large extent of Asia, from which it has found its way into Greece, Spain, and nearly all the south of Europe. It ripens its fruit in many places in our own country. Visitors to Brighton and Worthing are well acquainted with the plantation of figs at Tarring, the goal of many a juvenile pilgrim who late in August or early in September. Till lately, perhaps down to the present day, the primates of England could sit under the shadow of fig-trees planted at Lambeth by Cardinal Pole in 1525; and a fig-tree still flourishes at Christchurch, in Oxford, which Dr. Pocock brought from Aleppo in 1718.

The first-time that the fig-tree is mentioned in the Bible is Gen. iii. 7, where we are told that Adam and Eve “sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons.” These leaves Milton supposes were the foliage of the baxian or sacred fig of India (Ficus religiosa, or F. Indica), which with wonted learning and grandeur he thus describes:—

“Then saw they the choir
The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renowned,
But such as at this day, in India known,
In Malabar or Ceylon spreads its arms,
Bearing a broad and long, flat, in the ground
The bended twig of the root, and slender grows.
Alone the mother tree, a pilared shade,
High overarch'd, and echoing walls between;
There oft the Indian herdman, shunning heat,
Shelters in cool, and tends his pas ting humble.
At noon he slumbers out through thickets shade; those leaves
They gathered, and bound as Amanzonian large,
And, with what skill they had, together sewed.”

—Paradise Lost, book iv.

It is difficult to understand how any should have been led to imagine that for this purpose our first parents employed the leaves of the plantain or of the baxian (Musa paradisiaca, or M. supina). Its enormous leaves, eight or ten feet long and two or three feet broad, would not require to be sewed together; and a single leaf, with its strong refractory mid-rib, is scarcely suitable for a girdle. Besides, the original fragment evidently indicates some sort of fig; and, however much baxian may sound like banana, there is not the slightest resemblance between the fig and the Musa.

With its large and beautiful leaf, and with its free-spreading growth, the fig-tree affords a good shelter from the shower, and a still better shade from the heat. Like the linden in Germany, like the oak and elm on the village-greens of England, like the rowan-tree and the “bax-tree bush” (the “bax-tree” or elder) at the cottage thresholds and farm-house gables of Scotland, to the inhabitant of Palestine the fig-tree was the symbol of home, and repose, and tranquillity.

“Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, all the days of Solomon,” 1 Ki. x. 25. “Nation shall not lift up a sword against nation: . . . but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid,” Mic. vi. 5. 4. Nathanael was resting, perhaps meditating and praying, “under the fig-tree,” when he was accosted by an unlooked-for visitant, and in the stranger recognized “the Son of God, the King of Israel.”

What is called the fruit of the fig-tree, with which we are all so familiar, is in the eye of the botanist no fruit at all, but only an enlarged “receptacle,” which bears on its inner surface the real fruit, those numerous small seeds which we find in the interior. “The flowers of the fig-tree are never apparent to the eye, but are contained in those fruit-like bodies produced. in the axils of the leaves, and it is not till one of these is opened that the flowers are visible. What is therefore termed the fruit is merely the receptacle become fleshy, and assuming the form of a hollow body, bearing on its interior wall the flowers or fruit of the fig." (H. O. Vegetable Kingdom, p. 486."

This fleshy receptacle, when ripe, is remarkably sweet and mesose, and in the countries where it comes to perfection, it is highly prized for qualities at once agreeable and nutritious. On the authority of Oxlees, Microbius (natural h. I. exp. 2) enumerates twenty-three varieties as known to the Greeks; and, if it were not actually indigenous in Palestine, it there found a climate congenial, and was thoroughly naturalized. Moses, describing the "good land," speaks of it as already a land of "vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates." (xxviii.) and when the spies returned from their exploration, they brought not only the famous cluster of grapes from Edeloid, but they exhibited also the "pomegranates and the figs which were in the midst of the ..." According to Lightfoot, Raphelague was so named from its "green figs," and to the present hour the fig tree grows "here and there" along the road in that same neighborhood.

As Stanley observes, two of the New Testament allusions to this tree are indisputably connected with Mount Olives. "One is theparable not spoken, but acted, with regard to the fig-tree which, when all others around it were, as they are still, bare at the beginning of April, was alone clothed with its broad green leaves, though without the corresponding fruit.

Fig-trees may still be seen stretching the ordinary road from Jerusalem to Bethany, growing out of the rocks of the solid mountain, Mat. xxvii., which might by the prayer of faith be removed, and cast into the distant Mediterranean sea." On Olives, too, the brief parable in the great prophecy was spoken, when he pointed to the basking beds of fruit in the same trees as they grew around him—"For the fig-tree and all the trees when they see the figs on the tree, they are filled with fruit: so shall it be with the fig-tree." (xxviii.)..." (Stanley's Nath and Palestine, i. 446.)

Considerable difficulty has been expressed as to the fig-tree which Christ cursed on account of its barrenness. Mat. xxi., xxii., xxiii. 25. We have little doubt that the solution suggested in the foregoing extract is the true explanation, especially if we connect with it the fact that there are varieties which fructify early in the season. "There is a kind" says Dr. W. M. Thomson, "which bears a large green-coloured fig which ripens very early. I have plucked them from May on trees on Lebanon, 150 miles north of Jerusalem, and where the trees are nearly a month later than in the south of Palestine: it does not therefore seem impossible but that the same kind might have ripened figs at Easter, in the warm, sheltered ravines of Olivet. (The Land and the Book, part 2, chap. 21.)

This conjecture is borne out in the recent work of Miss Bremer. Visiting the farm of Messchilnn, near Bethleem, on March 2, her attention was attracted by some fig-trees, still leafless, but "full of fruit, which would not require many weeks to ripen. I was told that these are the so-called winter figs, which are formed late in the autumn, remain on the tree during winter, and ripen during the following spring, about Easter—this being the first fig crop of the year. Mrs. Finn, who has resided in Palestine twelve years, told me further that the second setting of the fig takes place in March: frequently whilst the winter figs are still upon the tree, and before the tree is in leaf. These figs are called hersever, and are gathered at midsummer. The third and last crop for the fig-tree in its native land bears three crops in the year—is in the month of August. The August figs—hence called avus—are the sweetest and best. Those which next succeed are the figs which ripen in winter and do not ripen till the following spring. A full-fledged fig-tree in the spring, before the time of crop, must always bear fruit [in some stage or other], so far as it is in good condition. But if it have not set fruit early in the spring, it will then bear none during the whole year." (H. Bremer's Travels in the Holy Land, vol. 1, p. 193.)

Even although none of the fig-trees now found near Jerusalem should yield winter figs, it is surely not unlikely that at that period of high and careful culture, the variety may have grown on Olivet, which Miss Bremer found three years later to be still leafless, and when in the midst of the small of Solomon. At all events the tree, so to speak, profits to bear fruit; for in the case of the fig, the so-called fruit begins to develop earlier than the foliage; and all the rather because the other and ordinary fig-trees were still leafless and bare, this uncorrected attention, and awakened expectation by that verdure which made it conspicuous at a distance: in other words, if not one of the precautions kind above mentioned, it at least proclaimed itself in advance of its ordinary companions, which were still shad'd with winter leaves and bare, on nearer inspection, it turned out a mere pretender. It was neither a distinct and early variety, nor was it even a fruitful specimen of the common kind. It had no excuse. Its leaves were an invitation to look for fruit, and, if it had none, it could not be alleged that they were already gathered, because it still wanted some time until the regular fig harvest "the time of figs was not yet," Mat. xxvii. Such was its effect by which it deceived the world. (W. H. Johnston in the Christian Annotated, vol. 4, p. 223.)

Often a month or six weeks before the general crop is gathered, there will be found on the tree some samples of the fruit already matured, and these "first-ripe figs" were highly prized. Soft and sweet, and richly pulpy, they came ready from the stem, and were esteemed a special delicacy. "So is it," says iv. 4. "The fig season was July and August. A portion of the fruit was preserved for winter use. One method was to pound it in a mortar, and make it into rectangular masses or cakes. In this form it could be kept for a long period, and was convenient as well as acceptable pendant in the soldier’s javelin. After the defeat of the Amalekites, when David’s men found an Egyptian in the field exhausted, “they gave him a piece of cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins; and when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him.” 1 St. xxx. 12. And “two hundred cakes of figs” were part of the present with which the prudent wife of the cherubic Nabal propitiated the son of Jesse at Carmel, 1 Sa. xxv. 18.

When Hezekiah was sick unto death, Isaiah the prophet said, “Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaster upon the boil, and he shall recover.” 2 St. xxxvii. 3. Possibly figs were already used in Hebrew surgery as emollients; but whether they were or not, the cure of the monarch was none the less the act of that supreme Physician who works his wonders through means inadequate, or without any means at all. The fig is excellent and demulcent, and boiled or roasted, and then split open, we believe that it is still used in the minor surgery which has to do with whitworts and ulcers, and similar slight cases of suppuration. [9, 11.]

FIR. Like our own words “fir,” “pine,” “cedar,” which are very loosely used, the likelihood is that the Hebrew ?(barakh), was applied to various trees with evergreen foliage and scented timber; for, as Gesenius says, the name seems to come from the idea of cutting up into boards and planks, as suggested by the obsolete root ?(barak), to cut. Of such trees the range of Lebanon supplied a great variety, and magnificent specimens, including the Scotch fir, the cypress, and cedar. (See CEDAR and CYPRESS.) In 2 Sa. vi. 5, we read, “David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir wood, even of the harp, and on psalteries.” &c. In connection with this may be quoted a passage in Burney’s History of Music (vol. i. p. 277), where it is stated: “This species of wood, so soft in its nature and sonorous in its effects, seems to have been preferred by the ancients as well as moderns to every other kind for the construction of musical instruments, particularly the harpies of them, on which their tone chiefly depended. Those of the harp, lute, guitar, harpsichord, and violin, in present use, are constantly made of this wood.”

FIRE. Of fire as a natural element, or as employed in domestic operations and the processes of art, there is no need for discomposing here. In these respects the student of Scripture has no difficulty to encounter, or any peculiarity to meet. The only thing respecting fire which calls for explanation is its symbolical use. In this we may distinguish a lower and a higher sense: a lower, when the reference is simply to the burning heat of the element, in which respect any vehement affection, such as anger, indignation, shame, love, is wont to be spoken of as a fire in the bosom of the individual affected, Ps. xxxix. 3; Je. xix. 5; and a higher, which is also by much the more common one in Scripture, when it is regarded as imaging the more distinctive properties of the divine nature. In this symbolical use of fire the reference is to its powerful, penetrating agency, and the terrible melting, seemingly restless effects it is capable of producing. So viewed, fire is the chosen symbol of the holiness of God, which manifests itself in a consuming hatred of sin, and can endure nothing in its presence but what is in accordance with the pure and good. There is a considerable variety in the application of the symbol, but the passages are all explicable by a reference to this fundamental idea. God, for example, is called “a consuming fire,” Hx. xxii. 20; to dwell with him is to dwell “with devouring fire,” 1 St. xxiii. 14; as manifested even in the grisled Redecemer “his eyes are like a flame of fire,” Is. vi. 3; his aspect when coming for judgment is as if a fire went before him, or a searching flame compassed him about, Ex. xxxiv. 2, 17; in these, and many similar representations occurring in Scripture, it is the relation of God to sin that is more especially in view, and the searching, intense, all-consuming operation of his holiness in regard to it. They who are themselves confirmed to this holiness have nothing to fear from it; they can dwell amid its light and glory as in their proper element; like Moses, can enter the flame-enveloping cloud of the divine presence, and abide in it unsaullied, though it appear in the eyes of others “like devouring fire on the top of the mount,” Ex. xxiv. 17.

Hence, we can easily explain why in Old Testament times the appearance of fire, and in particular the pillar of fire enveloped in a cloud, as it to-subside and restrain its excessive brightness and power was taken as the appropriate form of the divine presence and glory; for in these times which were more particularly the times of the law, it was the holiness of God which came most prominently into view; it was this which had in every form to be pressed most urgently upon the consciences of men, as a counteractive to the polluting influences of idolatry, and of essential moment to a proper apprehension of the covenant. But in the new, as well as in the old, when the same form of representation is employed, it is the same aspect of the divine character that is meant to be exhibited. Thus, at the commencement of the gospel narrative, even before announcing the advent of the Lord, he spoke of him as coming to baptize with fire as well as with the Spirit, not less to burn up the chaff with fire unquenchable than to gather in the wheat into his garner, Mat. iii. 11, 12. The language is substantially that of an Old Testament prophet, Mat. ii. 14; and it points, not as is often represented, to the enlightening, purifying, love-kindling agency of Christ, but to the severe and retributive effects of his appearance. He was to set for judgment as well as for mercy; for mercy indeed first, but to those who rejected the mercy, and hardened themselves in sin, also for judgment. To be baptized with the Spirit of light, holiness, and love, is what should ever follow on a due submission to his authority; but a baptism with fire—the fire of divine wrath there, Je. iii. 23, growing into fire unquenchable hereafter—should be the inevitable portion of such as set themselves in rebellion against him.

It is true that fire in its symbolical use is also spoken of as purifying—the emblem of a healing process effectuated upon the spiritual natures of persons in covenant with God. We read, not merely of fire, but of refiner’s fire, and of a spirit of burning purging away the dross and impurity of Jerusalem, Mat. iii. 2; Is. iv. 4. Still it is a work of severity and judgment that is indicated—only its sphere is, not the unbelieving and corrupt world, but the mixed community of the Lord’s people, with many false members to be purged out, and the individual beholding himself with an old man; he was to be set for judgment as well as for mercy; for mercy indeed first, but to those who rejected the mercy, and hardened themselves in sin, also for judgment. To be baptized with the Spirit of light, holiness, and love, is what should ever follow on a due submission to his authority; but a baptism with fire—the fire of divine wrath there, Je. iii. 23, growing into fire unquenchable hereafter—should be the inevitable portion of such as set themselves in rebellion against him.

But in the discourse of the Baptist the reference is rather to different classes of persons than to different kinds of operation in the same person; he points to the parakters of grace on the one side, and to the children of apostacy and perdition on the other. Nor is the reference materially different in the emblem of tongues, like as of fire, which sat on the apostles at Pentecost; and in the fire that is said to go out of the mouth of the symbolical witnesses of the Apocalypse, Act. ii. 3-4. In both cases the fire indicated the power of holiness to be connected with the ministrations of Christ's chosen witnesses: a power that should, as it were, burn up the corruptions of the world, consume the enmity of men's hearts, and prove irresistible weapons against the power and malice of the adversary.

FIRKIN, used once in New Testament scripture as a synonym for the Greek _mykros, mi-kros_, but the latter measure differed very materially in different places; and the term _firkin_ is fitted to suggest a very exaggerated estimate of quantity in the passage referred to. (See _Measure._)

FIRMAMENT, a word that comes to us through the Latin, and importing by its derivatic something of compact height or strata. In common use, however, it has lost this import, and denoted the sky over our heads—the pure and transparent expanse of ether which envelopes the globe, and stretches from the earth's surface toward the upper regions of space. This is precisely what is meant by the Hebrew term _kalakh_ (קָלָח), from the root to stretch, spread out or forth, heat out; hence simply the expanse, what is spread out or forth and over the earth. This has to the natural eye somewhat of the appearance of a crystal arch, resting upon the boundaries of the earth, and bearing all the watery treasures on which the life and fruitfulness of nature so materially depend. On the second creative day, it is said, God made this liquid expanse, for the purpose of dividing the waters on the surface of the earth from the waters above, or the sea from the clouds that rise out of it. In so far as material elements enter into its composition, it consists simply of the atmosphere a vast body of ether, compounded with infinite skill for the numberless functions it has to discharge in the formation and dispersion of vapours, the transmission of light and heat, the support of animal and vegetable life, and similar operations, but in its structure and appearance related rather to the fluctuating and mutable, than to the more solid parts of the material universe. But as used in the record of creation, the _kalakh_ or firmament includes not merely the lower heavens, or atmospheric sky, with its clouds and vapours, but the whole visible expanse up to the region of the fixed stars. For, on the fourth creative day it is said, that God made in the _kalakh_ sun, moon, and stars, to divide the day from the night, and to be for signs and seasons. This, of course, implies nothing as to the structure and composition of the immense area, as if by being comprised in one name it were all of the same formation. The language is adapted to the apparent aspect of things, and describes the visible expanse above, with its orbs of light, simply in the relation they hold to the earth, and the appearance they present to a spectator on its surface. In this respect we have to distinguish a lower and a higher firmament, just as we do in respect to a lower and a higher heaven.

A controversy has arisen respecting the sense attached by the Hebrew writers to _kalakh_ chiefly on account of the ancient translations given of it, and the poetical representations found of the upper region of the visible heavens in some parts of Scripture. The Septuagint translation renders _στρώγγυλον_—which occurs as well in a passive as an active sense—what is made firm or solid, or what makes such, gives stability and support. The Latin word _firmamentum_, which was used as an equivalent, more properly bears the latter signification—a prop or support. It has hence been argued, that the Hebrews understood something solid by the _ikalakh_ or firmament, capable of bearing up the waters which accumulate in masses above, and even of having the heavenly bodies related to it, as to a crystalline pavement. (See _heavens_, firm, and many stars.) And such passages as speak of the foundations of heaven shaking, _mane vias_, of its pillars trembling, _xvii. 8_, of the windows or doors of heaven being opened to give forth rain, or again shut, _xxiv. 6_, is _vivax_, excursive, or of the sky being strong as a modern looking-glass, _xxv. 9_, are adduced in proof of the idea. But all these expressions are manifestly of a figurative nature, and to hold them as tantamount to a categorical scientific demonstration on the nature of the heavenly expanse, seems altogether to lose sight of the fact, that in that same expanse, which the Hebrews contemplated as bearing up the waters that issue from the clouds, they also represented the birds as flying about, hence usually called "fowls of heaven"—and what room was there, in such a case, for material solidity, or actual pillars? The language on this, as on other physical subjects, is simply that suggested by the natural aspects of things, ever varying as these also vary. And so far from the place or region of the fixed stars being always regarded as something solid and crystalline, we find it spoken of sometimes in a certain _kalakh_, _ps. 89_, a tent, may even a thin veil, or fine cloth _ looph_, is _xxv_. In short, we have all the characteristics of a figurative and sensuous imagery, and not matter-of-fact description; and it were as absurd to press the terms in their literal import here, as in the similar expressions, bars of ocean, doors of death, wings of the wind and sun, and such like. (See _Heavens_.)

FIRST-BORN. It is the religious term rather than the natural and civil bearing of this term that here calls for examination; the other has already been considered in the article _Birth_.

The first-born, in a religious point of view, seem to have been meant the first of a mother's offspring rather than of a father's; and on the original occasion of the consecration of such to the Lord the order is thus given, "Sanctify unto me all the first-born, whatsoever opens the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine," _Ex. xii_. And again at ver. 12, "Thou shalt separate unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix, the male of every thing that goeth on the earth, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the Lord's." The historical ground of this religious destination is very distinctly stated in what follows, where it is said, that when the posterity of the Israelites should inquire into the reason of it, they were to be told, "that when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, the Lord slew all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both the first-born of man and the first-born of beast; therefore I sacrifice to the Lord all that openeth the matrix, being male; and all the first-born of my children I redeem." We have here a threefold act of God first, the infliction of death on the first-born of man and beast in Egypt; then exception from this judgment on the part of Israel in consideration of the paschal sacrifice; and finally, in commemoration of the exemption, the consecrating to the Lord of all the first-born in time to come. The fundamental element on which the whole proceeds, is evidently the representative character of the first-born; the first offspring of the producing parent stands for the entire fruit of the womb, being that in which the whole takes its beginning; so that the slaying of the first-born of Egypt was virtually the slaying of all; it implied that one and the same doom was suspended over all; and, consequently, that the saving of the first-born of Israel and their subsequent consecration to the Lord, was, in regard to divine intention and efficacious virtue, the saving and consecration of all. Hence Israel as a whole was designated God's first-born: "Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, This said the Lord, Israel is my son, my first-born; and I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me; and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, thy first-born." Ex. 11:2,3. All Israel were in outward standing and covenant relationship the Lord's first-born, being the national representatives and actual beginning of a redeemed church, to be brought out of every kindred, and tongue, and people; and, as such, they were without distinction called to be a nation of priests, one and all holiness to the Lord, Ex. xx. 6. But for the purpose of giving this great truth a proper hold of their minds, and perpetually enforcing the principle on which it was grounded, the Lord ordained the formal consecration of the first-born, from the time that the principle received its signal illustration in the exemption of Israel's first-born from the doom of Egypt. These henceforth were to be specially devoted to the Lord, in token of the devotion which all Israel were by calling and privilege bound to render to him.

In regard to the practical application of the principle thus established in the case of the first-born, a certain modification was afterwards introduced. The first-born of cattle, and all living creatures capable of being offered to the Lord, were still to be held sacred in the strictest sense; they were to be abstracted from a common use, and dedicated to the service of God; and those not fit for such a destination were to be redeemed at their proper value. But in respect to the first of human offspring, whose special consecration undoubtedly pointed to a separation for miniéstral service, the tribe of Levi came to be substituted in their place. An express order was given to Moses for this substitution; the Lord said to him, "Number all the first-born of the males of the children of Israel, from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names. And shalt thou take the Levites for me (I am the Lord) instead of all the first-born among the children of Israel." Nu. iii. 14. It was found that there were 27,500 more of the first-born among all the tribes than of males in the tribe of Levi, and these were redeemed for the Lord by a ransom-price of five shekels apiece. The numbers of that tribe, therefore, stepped into the place of the first-born, and, as the more select representative portion of the covenant-people, the Lord's peculiar lot, they were not only purified, but "offered as an offering before the Lord," and appointed to "do the service of the children of Israel in the congregation, and to make an atonement for the children of Israel, that there might be no plague among them, when the children of Israel draw near to the sanctuary," Nu. vii. 21. In plain terms, the substitution of a separate tribe for the first-born of each family was made for the purpose of more effectually securing the course of special service to the Lord, in which the principle of consecration was to comply itself, and thereby present a better idea of the holiness which Israel as a people were called to maintain and manifest. But to keep alive the principle on which the consecration proceeded, and make every family in Israel conscious of the bond in which this connected it with the tribe of Levi, the redemption money was always to be exacted for the first-born son. Nu. xiii. 15; the Lord still claimed the first-born as peculiarly his own, and remitted the special service at the sanctuary, only in consideration of the selection he had himself made of the tribe of Levi for the work. (For the numbers mentioned, see Lev. vi.)

The Church of the First-born, to which belief in Christ are represented as coming, the church or assembly with whose name it is their glory to have their own enrolled, is, it is clear, it will be readily understood from the preceding explanations, is but another expression for the church of the redeemed—those who have become peculiarly the Lord's, and through the blood of the everlasting covenant, applied to their consciences, are consecrated to him for evermore. Precisely and emphatically the church of the first-born is Christ's, since he is himself in a sense altogether peculiar the first-born—not only as being the oldest offspring of Mary, her sole offspring as a virgin, but also as having by virtue of his relation to Godhead, in his life and death perfectly realized the idea of personal consecration to the Father, and become the living head of the whole family of the redeemed. The name, however, may be applied to the church, and in the passage above referred to is applied, from respect to the place assigned in the old dispensation to the first-born, as the most direct partakers of the redemption of God, and in consequence the nearest to him in privilege, character, and glory.

The epithet First-born, however, is applied distinctly to Christ; once in a quite general manner, and without anything to define more exactly the respect in which he was so called, except as implying his pre-eminent greatness, the i. o; again with reference to created being—"He is the first-born of all creation, for by him (or in him) were all things created that are in heaven and that are in earth," Col. i. 16; and still again with reference to the resurrection from the dead—"He is the first-born from the dead," Col. i. 18; Col. i. 18. The expression so applied manifoldly denotes more than simply priority; it carries along with it the idea of origin— a causal first; or germinal beginning; such as involves the future existence of an entire series of dependent results. Thus he is the First-born from the dead, as being himself the resurrection and the life, in whom potentiely the whole company of the redeemed were begotten to the hope of a blessed resurrection, i. e. 1. 3; so that as all Israel were at the redemption from Egypt saved in the first-born, in like manner all who shall ultimately attain to the resurrection from the dead may be said to have risen in Christ. In like manner he is the First-born of the creation; since all created beings grow, as it were, out of him, and stands in him as the revealer of Godhead, the direct agent and administrator of its productive energies. Such appears to be the proper explanation of the term as applied personally to Christ—the only one indeed that fully suits the connection in the several passages; and that also which quite naturally harmonizes with, and springs out of, the import of the term in its primary historical application. The other senses adopted by commentators, which it is needless to enumerate, are more or less fanciful.

FIRST-FRUCHTS. It was but an extension of the principle which gave the impress of sacredness to the first-born of men and beasts, to connect with God by a literal tie the first fruits of the harvest, of all the fields and of the house. These accordingly were claimed for God; and that not merely in the general, but with a considerable fulness and variety of detail. A sheaf of the first-fruits of the barley crop had to be offered, in the name of the whole congregation, at the feast of the passover, and in like manner two leaves of wheat then broad at the feast of pentecost, Ex. xxi. 14, 17. But lest the people should deem this a sufficient discharge of the obligation to consecrate the first fruits of their increase to the Lord, it was enacted that whatever was done by the collective congregation should be done also by each of its families, out of the yearly produce which the Lord might give them. The first or best of the oil, of the wine of the wheat, of the threshing-floor generally, and whatsoever was first ripe in corn and fruit, were expressly set apart for offerings to the Lord, and were to be given to the priesthood, as the Lord's families and representatives, for their comfortable maintenance. Ex. xxii. 13-17. No specific quantity or proportion was fixed on as proper for this offering of first-fruits; that appears to have been left to the spiritual prudence and ability of each individual, and would only vary in amount according as the principles of religion were in lively operation or the reverse. A stimulus was thus furnished to zeal and fidelity on the part of the priesthood, whose temporal well being and comfort were inseparably bound up with the prosperity of the cause of God; they could not neglect their duty as the guides and instructors of the people, without depriving the fruit of their unfailingness in diminished supplies of first-fruit offerings. The Tal- mudists, however, reduced this like all other things to definite rules and measures; they held the sixtieth part the least that could be given; while a fortieth or a thirtieth was to be regarded as the proof of a willing and liberal spirit. In later times, the first-fruits were often turned into money by the more distant Jews, and this sent instead of them to, &c. p. 230.

The offering of first-fruits was by no means peculiar to Israel; it prevailed among the leading nations of antiquity, of which ample proofs may be found in Spenser (The Log Book, p. 110). From the quotations produced from ancient writers upon the subject, there would seem to have been at the bottom of the practice a feeling that the first ripe portions were the best of the crop, and that these belonged to the gods primarily as a token of gratitude for the year's produce in each particular kind, and remotely as a ground or security for the fruitfulness of coming harvests. Such a mode of feeling and acting, having its root in men's moral nature; it is in accordance with the common instincts of humanity; and could scarcely fail, wherever a semi-sacred and ritual religion prevailed, to find some appropriate form of manifestation. It is needless therefore to speak in such a case of the Hebrews borrowing from the heathen, or the heathen from the Hebrews. But with the Hebrews, the principle on which the offering of first-fruits proceeded reached further than elsewhere; for the offering was not a mere nature-gift, in acknowledgment of the goodness of the God of nature; it connected itself with the holiness of God. As in the case of the first-born, it brought the whole within the sphere of religion—stamped all with a certain measure of sacredness; so that it might seem an impolicy afterwards to apply any portion of the produce to improper uses.

For, in the words of the apostle, "if the first fruits were holy, the lump was also holy," 1 Cor. vii; the entire crop partook in the holiness of the whole, which, as the first and best, was presented to the Lord.

Had this principle been rightly recognized and carried out in practice, it must have exercised a most salutary influence on the common life and operations of the Israelites.

In regard to the manner of conveying the first-fruits, and the forms used in presenting them, the Talmudists give the following account, though it may justly be taken with some qualifications: When they carried in the first-fruits [which was done at the feast of tabernacles], all the cities which were in a station gathered together to the chief city of the station, to the end they might not go up alone; for it is said, 'In the multitude of people is the king's honour,' Eccl. iv. 12. And they came and lodged all night in the streets of the city, and went not into the houses for fear of pollution. And in the morning the governor said, 'Arise, and let us go up to Zion, the city of the Lord our God.' And before them went a bell which had his horn covered, and, an olive-crown on his head, to signify the first-fruits of the seven kinds. And a pipe struck up before them, till they came near to Jerusalem; and all the way as they went, they sang, 'I rejoiced in them that said unto me, We will go into the house of the Lord,' &c. When they were come night to Jerusalem, they sent messengers before them to signify it; then the captains and governors went out of Jerusalem to meet them, &c. And they went in the midst of Jerusalem, and the pipes striking up before them, till they came near to the mount of the house of God. When they were come thither, they took every man his basket on his shoulder, and said, 'Hallelujah, praise God in his sanctuary,' &c.; and they went thus and sang till they came to the court-yard; when they were come thither, the Levites sang Ps. xxvii. 'I will exalt thee, O Lord, for thou hast lifted me up,' &c. The owner of the basket, while it was still upon his shoulder, made the declaration in De. xxvi. 3, &c. 'I profess this day unto Jehovah thy God, that I am come into the land which Jehovah spake unto our fathers to give it to us.' Then he let down the basket from his shoulder, and the priest put his hand under it, and waved it, and he said, 'A Syrian ready to perish was my father,' &c; and he left it at the altar's side, at the south-west horn, on the south side of the horn, and bowed himself down, and went out.' (As quoted on De. xxvi. 1-15).

This formal method of going about the matter may, no doubt, have been occasionally practised; but it is against all probability to suppose that such solemn pomp and routine attended the conveyance and presentation of all first-fruit offerings. The diversity of circumstances, and the infinite multitude of the case, would naturally lead to a good deal of variety.

FISHING [zet], damh, 27, dam, 27, depth; ἐξορροία, ἐξορροίαν, a little fish, ἐξορρωσα, fish cooked or for cooking]. No kind of fish is indicated specifically in either the Old or New Testament; all the terms used, which are, however, with the exception of the last, modifications of two, ψάρια (fishe) and ψάριον, being as various as the English word by which they are truly rendered. Yet a people, like Israel, cradled on the banks of the Nile, educated between the shores of the Red Sea, and subsequently located along the Mediterranean coast, with such collections of fresh water as the Lakes of Moab and Chinnereth in their rear, could not but have had their attention largely directed to fish and fishing. No investigation of the ichthyology of Pale-time has so far as we know, been made by any competent naturalist.

In the Physical History of Palestine, Dr. Kittel has collected what information on the subject his industry had been able to gather; but when we state that from all sources not more than about thirty kinds are attributed to the Mediterranean shores, and of these many are merely barbarous names without due to their identification, it will be seen how meagre was the amount of knowledge. Col. H. Smith has furnished to the Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature an able and interesting article on the fishes known to the Hebrews, evidently derived to a considerable extent from personal observation. In this, the number of species and genera recognized is greatly augmented, and much information concerning them is given.

By the law of Moses, all the tenants of the waters furnished with "fish and scales" were permitted for food, De xli. 9; De xvi. 9. This characteristic would loosely distinguish fishes from the aquatic mammal, amphibian, reptiles, worms, and all the vast host of multiform invertebrata; but if it was understood as a test divifus to the senses, many fishes of wholesome flesh and delicate savor, and within abundant and easily captured, would be prohibited. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews were allowed to taste the eel or the mackerel, several kinds of which are at certain seasons sufficiently abundant on their coasts. Of salt-fish, their chief supplies would doubtless be from the perches, Percauda, garmards, Teleostja, maigres, Scombrida, sea-hares, Sparida; mackerels, Scombridae, the larger species of which are generally covered in part with large scales; herrings, Clupeida, and wrasses, Labrida; while of fresh-water kinds the immense family of carps, Cyprinidae, the silhoues, Siluridae, and the pikes, Esocida, including that singular long-nosed fish the moringlas, which is so abundant and so much esteemed in the Nile, and which so constantly figures in the old Egyptian representations of that ancient river.

The Scriptures afford abundant evidence that fish constituted no inconsiderable portion of human food from the earliest times. It was a great augmentation of one of the plagues which Jehovah inflicted on obdurate Egypt, that "he slew their fish," Ex vii. 21; Ps. xcv. 28. Israel in the wilderness mourned over the loss of their fish-diet. "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely," Ex x. 22; and Moses asks, when Jehovah proposes to give them flesh, "Shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them to suffice them?" Nu xiii. 22. Solomon alludes to "fishes taken in a net," Ex xii. 12; in Nechohiah's days the Tyrians seem to have regularly supplied Jerusalem and Judah with fish, Ne xiii. 16; and one of the gates of the city was named Fish-gate, probably from the fish-market being held at its entrance. The vast numbers of the fishes of the sea occasionally afford comparisons to the sacred writers. When Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph, he prayed that they might grow into a multitude, using a word which implied "multiply like fishes," Ge xxx. 16. And, in Ezekiel's prophecy of the healing of the Dead Sea, it is promised that "there shall be a very great multitude of fishes, . . . the fishes shall stand upon it from Engedi even unto En-gathol; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to the fishes of the sea, like the fish of the Great [Mediterranean] Sea, exceeding many," Ezxvi. 18.

In "the burden of Egypt," Is x. 9, prominence is given among the elements of affliction to the cutting off of the resources of the people derived from the fisheries; and the various devices employed are detailed with some minuteness: "The fishes also shall be mourned, and all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish. Moreover, they that work in flax, and they that weave reed, shall be confounded. And they shall be broken in the purposes thereof, all that make shingles and ponds for fish."

Herodots, Diodorus, and others, have spoken of the immense quantities of fish which were obtained from the Nile and its canals, showing the extent to which the fisheries of Egypt were prosecuted, and the importance which attached to them. The royal profits derived from the fishery of the Lake Mornis alone, which was assigned to the queen of the reigning Pharaoh for the purchase of jewels, ornaments, and perquisites, amounted to a talent of silver per day, or about $470,000 per annum. Even now, according to Michael (loc. cit. vi. 7, 139), the small lake Meneshed yields an annual income of 800 purses, or upwards of $25,000.

The amount of fish taken at once was often too great to allow of its consumption while fresh. Hence it was dried for future use, by splitting and spreading the bodies in the sun, sometimes without and sometimes with salt, as we learn not only from ancient writers, but also from the Egyptians monuments, which afford us most copious and clear records of all the processes connected with fishing. Salt-fish was much eaten, not only in Lower Egypt, but also in the Thesprot, as the common food of the people; and it was probably to commemorate the national value of this food, that every householder was commanded by a religious ordinance to eat a fried fish at his door on a certain festival. The priests, however, who abstained from fish, were permitted to burn theirs, instead of eating it.

The autographic delineations of the modes of fishing known in ancient Egypt are, as we have said, very ample; and prove that in the infancy of human society, as many and as ingenious devices were brought to bear upon the art as are known in our times. These pictures beautifully illustrate the biblical allusions.

Two modes of angling occur repeatedly. In one of these the peasant sits on his heels at the brink of the canal, holding a simple line in both hands, without the intervention of a rod, exactly as the art is still practiced by the fishers on the banks of the Nile. At other times the fisher wields a short rod of one piece, with a short stout line of twisted or plaited material, perhaps hair, and whisks out the fish with a jerk. Sometimes a grave Egyptian gentleman, with much attention to comfort, having had a mat spread by the side of a fishpond in his garden, and a handsome chair placed upon it, seats himself for an afternoon sport, and wields his rod and line with the patience and the grace of that prince of anglers, the "contemplative man" himself.
A favourite mode of fishing was with the bow or two-tongued fish-spear. This is frequently depicted.
It was practised upon the Nile, in a flat-bottomed boat, which was pushed among the lotus-plants and papyrusreeds that grew tall and dense along either margin of the river. The fisherman was often accompanied by his family; a daughter steadying his body as he made his fearless lunge at the fish, and a son carrying the prey already taken string by the gills upon a cord.
The action of spearing the fish is graphically represented, the implement being shot from the right hand through the left curved to form a groove. The spear was a slender rod some ten or twelve feet long, doubly feathered at the summit, like a modern arrow, and carrying a double point, one of which seems to be hitched on beside the other, yet so as to diverge a little;

the two points forming about one-fifth of the entire length. In muth the boat we generally see large fishes of various kinds, among which the deformed Mogenos is generally conspicuous, and a large species of Labeo, which seems a favourite object of pursuit.

More commonly still the net was employed; it was ordinarily of a lengthened form, furnished with floats along one edge, and weights along the other, with a ropes at each end, answering to our seine. Sometimes this seems to have been cast out by hand, the men carrying out the bight of the net by swimming or wading, and then the two parties dragged it up the bank. At other times a boat waited on the party, and the shack was cast overboard as she was rowed along. In this case the boat served as a drying stage; for the net being supported by stays from the summit to the bow and stern, lines were fastened from one to the other in several tiers, on which the split and cleaned, and problably salted fish, were hung to dry (No. 264).

In the sculptures of Nineveh the Assyrian fisherman is represented with his rush-basket on his shoulder, fishing with a short line held in both hands without a rod (No. 265).

It has long been remarked that the fishes of the Lake of Gennesaret are to a certain extent identical with those found in the Nile, and otherwise peculiar to it. Josephus in ancient times, and Hasselquist in modern, have noticed this. An enhanced interest is thus given to the fish and fishing of the Nile, as represented in the Egyptian paintings, since it was in the midst of fishing scenes on this lake that our blessed Lord passed so much of his ministry.
FITCHE

It was from the fishing-net that he called his earliest disciples to "become fishes of men," Mat. 4:19; and it was from a fishing-boat that he rebuked the winds and the waves, Mat. viii. 26. It was then a fishing-boat that he delivered his wonderful series of prophetic parables of the kingdom of heaven, Mat. xiii.; it was to a fishing-boat that he walked on the sea, and from that Peter walked to him, Mat. xiv. 22; it was with fish (doubtless dried) as well as with bread that he twice miraculously fed the multitude, Mat. xvi. 9; xvi. 19; it was from the mouth of a fish, taken with a hook, that the tribute-taker was paid, Mat. xxi. 27. It was "a piece of boiled fish" that he ate before his disciples on the day he rose from the dead, Lk. xxiv. 13; and yet again, before he ascended, he filled their not with "great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three," while he himself prepared a "fire of coals," and "hid fish therein," on which then he and they dined, Jn. xxi. 11-14.

The most remarkable mention of a fish in the Holy Scriptures is that which occurs in connection with the rebellious prophet Jona. The Lord prepared "a great fish" to swallow him up, and he remained in the belly of the fish three days and three nights, Jona i. 17. Mr. Taylor has observed with much misplaced ingenuity to prove that there was no miracle in the case; that 37 (days) signifies a ship as well as a fish, and that the prophet was picked up by another vessel, which in due course landed him. Why the cabin of this second ship should have been to him "the belly of hell," how the weeds were wrapped about his head, and with what propriety the ordinary loading of a passenger could be spoken of in the words "The Lord spake unto the fish (days), and it vomited out Jona upon the dry land," the weaver of spiders' webs has not informed us.

The Lord Jesus, whose authority some will be willing to accept as final, distinctly tells us that "Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly (in 7) "saw," says, Mat. xii. 10. This is enough for us. Those who reason that the whale's esophagus is not large enough to admit a man, and therefore it could not have been a whale, as we understand the term, reason upon false premises. If the point at issue were the normal and ordinary habits of the animal spoken of, the objection would be valid; but the whole transaction was professedly a miracle, i.e., a controlling of the laws of nature by Him who imposed and sustains them; and therefore, unless we sceptically reject the narrative altogether, because of its miraculous character, one part of the miracle presents no more difficulty than another. We need not, however, limit 7 days to the true mammalian whale: the term may have been loosely used for any vast marine animal.

In the authorized version of Isaiah, ch. xxviii. 29, we read, "When he hath made plain the face thereof, both he not cast abroad the fitches!" And again, ver. 27, "The fitches are beaten out with a staff." The original is בַּקְשַׁה (basket), which the Septuagint translates μεθέωρος. If this rendering be correct, then the basket of Isaiah is the fennel-flower, _Nigella sativa_, a rambunctious plant nearly allied to the hellockes. The whole family are characterized by an acrid principle, known to chemistry as acantine, and the deadly powers of which are too well illustrated in our common mandrake, _Aconitum napellus_. The seeds of the Nigella, however, although pungent, are not poisonous; and the plant is extensively cultivated in the East for their sake. They are aromatic and carminative, and answer much the same purpose as pepper. Indeed, it is said that they are extensively employed in the adulteration of this latter condiment, and in France this "poor man's pepper" is called _poivrette_. From the readiness with which the ripe capsules surrender their tiny black coloured seeds, no plant could be more suitable for the prophet's illustration; as any reader may satisfy himself by trying the experiment, in the absence of the Nigella, on the ripened seed-vees of any kindred genus, such as the columbia, the larkspur, the monkshood. They shed their contents so freely, that nothing could be more absurd than to use for their thrashing instrument a "cart-wheel" or beaded sledge; a slender rod or staff would answer the purpose far better. Dr. E. Henderson translates by "dill;" which is so far congruous with the conimon of the context, dill and cummin being both plants of the same order. But from the authorities with which he supports his translation, it is evident that he intended not dill, but Nigella. The former has not, as he supposes, "a blue poppy-like flower," nor is it the melanthium of the ancients.

Of the bread which Ezekiel, ch. v. 9, is directed to make, one ingredient was _lensuath_ (טנ澀), which in the text of the authorized version is rendered "fitches," but the probabilities greatly preponderate in favour of the marginal translation, "spelt"—a cereal closely allied to common wheat, and extensively cultivated in the East, both in ancient times and modern. [2. B. N.]

FLAG

In the English Bible the word "flag" occurs three times. In Exodus, ch. ii, it is mentioned that the mother of Moses deposited the ark of bulrushes among the "flags" beside the river; and in proclaiming the divine sentence against Egypt, Isaiah says, ch. vi. 6, "The reeds and flags shall wither." In both these instances the Hebrew word is _ṣoph_ (םו), and we might be apt to suppose that it is in some sort of relation to it were not that the Hebrew name for the Red Sea is the _Ṣoph_ Sea, pointing manifestly to some other sort of vegetation than sedges or rushes. Probably "water-weeds," or some such vague expression, is as near an equivalent as we can safely venture in a case where neither the context nor the analogies of language do much to help us. The third instance is Job viii. 11, "Can the flag grow without water?" where the original word is _arka_ (אָרֵק). Here Dr. Mason Good pleads hard for the bulrush (Scirpus lacustris, or N. grossa), as being a plant eminently dependent on water; but certainly some value is to be attached to the testimony of Jerome, who tells us that the word is not Hebrew, but Egyptian, and that when he applied at the Egyptians themselves what they denoted by it, was informed that they applied it to marshy vegetation in general: "some kind in paludis vivens nascitur" (Hieronymus in Isa. xix.). To this large and indefinite use of the word our translators have adhered in Ge. xii, 2, 18, where the same word _arka_ occurs in the Hebrew, and is simply rendered "meadow." [3. B. N.]

FLAGON

As used in the English Bible, conveys a mistaken idea of the meaning of the original. It stands for the Heb. _ashikha_ (אַשִּׁקָה), rightly enough rendered by the Sept. Μοναρχ., a kind of thin cake, usually mingled with oil, but in Palestine more commonly made of grapes, dried and pressed into a certain form. They were regarded as dainties, and were eagerly partaken of by persons who had been fagged and wearied with a journey. Instead, therefore, of jupana (with the addition of civic understood) in such passages as 2 Sa. vi. 19; 1 Ch. xvi. 3; Ho. iii. 1; Ca. ii. 5, we should read gypsumes or pressed cakes.

FLAX.

Few plants are at once so lovely and so useful as the slender, upright herb, with taper leaves, and large blue-purple flowers, from which are fashioned alike the coarsest canvas and the most ethereal cambric or lawn— the sail of the ship and the fairy-looking scarf which can be packed into a silken shell. It was of linen, in part at least, that the hangings of the tabernacle were constructed, white, blue, and crimson, with cherubim inwoven; and it was of linen that the vestments of Aaron were fashioned. When arrayed in all his glory, Solomon could put on nothing more costly than the finest linen of Egypt; and describing "the marriage of the Lamb," the seer of Patmos represents the bride as "arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints."

As every one knows, the flax which is spun into thread and woven into linen cloth is obtained from a plant largely cultivated in many parts of these islands, but still more abundantly imported from northern countries like Russia and Holland. The Linum usitatissimum, as it is appropriately called, has long been cultivated in England; and although probably introduced at first, it now occurs in corn-fields not unfrequently, and with the appearance of a native quite at home. Its pretty little congeger, L. cathartica, with its small white flowers gracefully drooping, is not only indigenous, but is one of the most plentiful of our native flowers, occurring in pastures everywhere. Now that the Phormian terebinth of New Zealand, and the hemp of Europe and India (Cannabis sativa and C. indica) subserve many of the same purposes, and above all since the cotton manufacture has begun to supply the markets of the world, flax has lost much of its former pre-eminence; but for many fabrics its tough and tenacious fibre is still unmeasured, and in the surgical wards of the hospital, as well as in the pulpit-cloths of the pulpit, they have as yet been unable to find its equivalent.

For the culture of flax, "low grounds, and those which have received deposits left by the overflowing of rivers, are deemed the most favourable situations. To this last circumstance it is attributed that Zealand produces the finest flax grown in Holland" (Materials of Manufactures, Library of Entertaining Knowledge). And to this circumstance Egypt must have been indebted for the superiority of her flax, so famous in the ancient world, and which gave to her more elaborate manufactures the subtility of the most exquisite muslin, well meriting the epithet "woven air." Herodotus mentions, as laid up in a temple at Lindus, in Rhodes, a linen cothet which had belonged to Amasis king of Egypt, each thread of which was composed of 360 strands or filaments. In length and in fineness of fibre no country could compete with the flax which produced the "fine linen of Egypt," and which made the Delta the "great linen market of the ancient world" (Isaiah) by annihilating this crop, the seventh plague inflicted a terrible calamity. It destroyed what, next to corn, formed the staple of the country, and would only find its modern parallel in the visitation which should cut off a cotton harvest in America.

From a picture preserved at Beni Hassan, it would seem that the Egyptian treatment of the flax-plant was essentially the same as that which was pursued till quite lately by ourselves, which even now is only modified by machinery, and which is thus described by Pliny: "The stalks are immersed in water warmed by the heat of the sun, and kept down by weights placed upon them; for nothing is lighter than flax. The membrane or rind becoming loose, is a sign of their being sufficiently macerated. They are then taken out, and repeatedly turned over in the sun until perfectly dried; and afterwards beaten by mallets on stone slabs. The tour which is nearest the rind is inferior to the inner fibres, and is fit only for the wicks of lamps. It is combed out with iron hooks, until all the rind is removed. The inner part is of a finer and whiter quality. After it is made into yarn, it is polished by striking it frequently on a hard stone, moistened with water; and when woven into cloth it is again beaten with clubs, being always improved in proportion as it is beaten" (Pliny, viii. 1, quoted in Wilkinson's Ancient Egypt, ii. 170).

The seventh plague of Egypt fixes its own chronology. It took place when "the barley was in the ear and the flax was in the pod, or "boll,"" Ex. vi. 7, which according to eastern travellers corresponds with the middle of February. In our own country the same crop would not be equally advanced till nearly four months later.

"The little wife garrulous could tell, "It was a townament about when that was in the bell."

In Scotland the bell or blossom, which is very fugitive, appears at midsummer, and is followed by the pod or "boll" (= boll or ball, the Dutch bol, and German bolle)— the name given to the globular carthogenous capsule.

From the circumstance of Rahab hiding the spies "under the stalks of flax, which she had laid in order upon the roof;" J.e., 8, it is evident that flax was cultivated in the neighbourhood of Jericho before the Israelites obtained possession of the Promised Land. And there can be little doubt that the Jews would maintain a tillage so essential to domestic industry, 1s. xxi, 26, although it is not unlikely that superior sorts were still imported. "Israel said, I will go after my lovers, who give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax.”

Describing the gentle, skilful perseverance of Messiah, says the prophet—

“A beaten reed shall he not break;
And a smooching shall he not quench.
He shall bring forth judgment unto truth,
He shall not fail nor be discouraged.
Till he hath established judgment in the earth:
And the isles shall wait for his law.”—Isa. xlii. 3, 4.

In the old fire-killing process there was something very interesting and exciting, from the red spark creeping round the edge of the dingy rag to the first feeble flickering; and then, after many apparent extinctions and revivals, and much smouldering, and struggling, and smoking, the grand outburst and conclusive ignition, when to the leeward of the rock the shepherd stretched his palms—"Ha, ha! I am warm. I see the fire!" and the village boys raised a shout to the signal so welcome in the wintry weather. So, full of patience and far-seeing purpose, "the smoking flax he shall not quench." He shall not be discouraged nor leave off, till that feeble spark, that smoking flax, has after many vicissitudes blazed up a beacon on the mountain tops, announcing for truth and righteousness a worldwide victory. So is it in his dealing with individual souls; and if ours be the mind of the Master, we shall foster and cherish the "smoking flax;" we shall hail and encourage in others the dim and precarious commencement of piety.

To the devout moralizers of other times was suggested an emblem of tribulation in the various processes to which the flax plant is subjected: torn up from its native soil, tied in sheaves, roasted in the sun, drawn through the long teeth of the rippling comb, drowned in water and loaded with stones; once more exposed to the heat, beaten with mallets or crushed in the break, stretched on a frame and belaboured with the scutching bat; and to crown the whole, passed to and fro between the sharp points of the heckle till all the fibres are split in smother: "linea injuria pot sector.

As the venerable Bede illustrates Ro. viii, 28, "The flax springs from the earth green and flourishing; but through much rough usage, and with the loss of all its native sap and verdure, is at last transfigured into ramint white as snow—that the more that true holiness is tried and afflicted, the more brightly its beauty come forth."—[J. H.]

FLAX [flax], a well-known insect, proverbial for its minuteness and its agility. David modestly represents himself, 1sa. xix, 14, xxvii, 28, as being as contemptible and unworthy of the king’s solicitude as a flax; that it would be as remunerative to hunt a flax, as to come out into the wilderness after him. Perhaps also there might be a latent hint conveyed, that the king would find him as difficult to catch. There is a delirium in the original σέλος, which is preserved in the LXX. and in the Vulgate, but is neglected in the English version: "after whom dost thou pursu[e] after one flea?" All oriental travellers agree in denouncing the intolerable prevalence of personal vermin. The answer of the Arab sheik to the English traveller, who in approaching Tiberias hoped to escape their assaults: "The king of the fleas holds his court at Tiberias," has been often repeated, and often repeated. "Fleas," says Kitto, "cannot by any means be excluded from the nearest houses and the most cleanly persons. The long eastern habit, affording shelter to them, is a favourite conveyance, and the streets and dusty bazaars so swarm with them, that it is impossible to walk about without collecting a colony. People of condition sometimes, for this reason, change their dress on their return home; but persons in humbler circumstances, who cannot use this precaution, are tormented to an extent which might be beyond any powers of endurance but those which habit gives. The fleas are particularly partial to the rich pieces of Europeans fresh from the West, and their presence never fails to prove a great attraction to their countless hosts. Fleas make their appearance in the spring, and riot without stint until the hot weather sets in, when they lose their wonted agility, and their numbers gradually diminish" (Hab. Hist. of Palestine, ii. 42).

FLY is used in Scripture with a considerable latitude of meaning, and in senses not found in other ancient writings which are independent of Scripture; yet so as never altogether to lose a reference to its primary meaning as indicative of the corporeal part of our nature. (1.) It denotes generally the whole animal creation, as being in their visible shape and organism composed of flesh and blood, 6sa. vii, 13; viii, 15. (2.) More specifically, but with the same reference to what constitutes the more cognizable part of man, it denotes the rational creation—the race of mankind, singly or collectively, Isa. iii, 6; Jn. vii, 2, Matt. xxiv, 22, &c. (3.) The carnal nature of man, also, is called flesh, in respect to the frailty, weakness, propensity to vanity and corruption, which is inherent in it, and which it derives most conspicuously from the tendencies and imperfections of the bodily frame, Ro. iv, 1; Mal. vii, 16, xxvii, 16. (4.) With an intensifying of this view of the carnal nature of man, the principle of corruption in him sometimes bears the name of flesh, from the preponderating sway that fleshly appetite has in maintaining and feeding it; so that the flesh stands in direct antithesis to the spirit—the one signifying the simply human and corrupt, the other the divine and regenerative principle in the soul, Ro. viii, 1, 4, 5, Gal. v, 20, 17, vi, 8, &c. (5.) As the flesh is the outward part of man’s nature, and forms in a manner the connecting link between him and all that is outward in his condition, so flesh sometimes stands for a brief designation of the merely external things belonging to him, what he is, or has, or feels in respect to his earthly state and condition, De. vi, 5; Lev. iv, 16, 2 Sa. vii, 29; Co. xvi, 16.

FLUX, BLOODY, an old English term for dysentery, so used in the authorized version at Ac. xxviii, 8, where the Greek has σέλος, It got the name of bloody flux from being usually accompanied by a certain discharge of blood.

FLY [fly], the common house-fly (Musca Domestic), “dead flies,” Ex. xii: 11; the other to some particular and formidable species, not a native of Palestine, but to be brought thither as a special judgment. (See HORNET.)

The common house-flies swarm in immense numbers in the East, and though they inflict no physical injury, yet, from their continual settling on the face, they are incessantly annoying. In Egypt, the peasants are so subject to a virulent kind of ophthalmia, that almost every second person is said to be affected with it, and multitudes are blind of either one or both eyes. The complaint is greatly augmented by the constant presence of the flies, which congregate around the diseased eyes, attracted by the moisture which exudes; and so useless is it to drive them away, that the miserable people submit to the infection, and little children are seen with their eyes margined with rows of black flies, of whose presence they appear unconscious, though presenting a most painful sight to Europeans.

The “ointment of the apothecary,” composed of substances perhaps peculiarly attractive to these impudent intruders, would be likely to become choked up with their entangled bodies, which corrupting would be the more offensive for their contrast with the expected odour. Thus would little folks render despicable him who had a reputation for wisdom. The man is the ointment, his reputation the perfume, his little folly the dead fly, his disgrace the stinking savour.

The word 6buk, fly, enters as an element into the name originally appropriated to an idol worshipped at Ekron, Berosokia, Zex. i: 9; but, according to the English version and Vulgate, in the time of our Lord applied to the prince of demons, interchangeable with “Satan,” Mat. xii: 21-28. This “lord of flies” corresponds to the Ζεβεσαντιος and the Παναγιαδος of the Greeks and Romans, as if a defender from flies. The Greek in the New Testament reads Βεροσοδι坏([Berošōdēl]). This is said to mean “Lord of dung.” (Flies are not edible.) The Greek in the New Testament reads Βεροσοδι坏([Berošōdēl]), which is said to mean “Lord of dung,” instead of “Lord of flies,” and has been considered as one of those contemptuous puns which the Jews were in the habit of making by slight changes of letters. There might be a peculiar sting in this particular case, from the circumstance that flies are chiefly bred in dunghills, and many species do greatly congregate thither; hence the deity in question being confessedly a “lord of flies,” must have been a “dungy lord.” One of the names by which “idols” are expressed in the Old Testament is 7741, gilbath, which has the closest affinity with 6buk, gilgal, dung. The margin of the English Bible, indeed, gives “dungy gods,” as the rendering of this word in De. xxix. 17. (See BELEREL.)

Having thus poured contempt on the Ekronite god, there was nothing unnatural in the Jews proceeding yet further—in the hatred of idolatry which succeeded the captivity—to make him, perhaps, considered the chief of the pagan gods, identified with the devil. The Lord Jesus certainly sanctions the application of the epithet, Mat. xi: 27, and the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. x: 20, has said that “the things which the enemies sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons.”

The word 6bok is not rendered “fly” or “flies” directly, but is considered to include the idea of “flies.” It occurs only in connection with the fourth plague upon Egypt, Ex. xii: 38-39; Ex. xxix: 15; or, “our translators having rendered it in the narration by “swarms of flies,” and in the Psalms by “divers sorts of flies.”

The LXX. have in all cases given a word, “the dog-fly,” as the equivalent for the Hebrew phrase; but what species the Greeks designated by this epithet we do not know. It is uncertain whether the fly was considered to have some marvellous qualities of the dog, obscene, unclean, impudent, blood-thirsty, or whether some fly was intended which specially made the dog its prey. The former conclusion is supported by the circumstance that vēkaron was a term of opprobrium applied to an impudent meddler (Hos. ii: 3). But the ancient naturalists describe it as a sort of wasp-flies (Tachinidae), which might include both senses, for this genus is most impudently pertinacious in its assaults.

The subject of food, as treated of or referred to in Scripture, calls for some consideration under three different aspects: first, the prohibition laid upon certain articles as of things disallowed for food; then, the articles at once allowed and commonly used; and lastly, the customs connected with their preparation and use.

1. As regards the first point, prohibitions of some kind may be said to have existed from the very earliest period of the world's history. The divine grant to Adam and his immediate descendants of things to be employed for food, comprised only the produce of the garden and the field, but did not extend to the animal creation. The words were, “Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth; and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat,” Gen. i: 29. The subject is not again referred to in the brief records which contain all that we know of antediluvian history; so that we cannot tell how far the restriction may have met with general observance. No charge, however, is brought against the antediluvians of having set it at naught; and the more extended liberty which was introduced after the deluge has all the appearance of a free and spontaneous gift, adapted to the new order and constitution of the world. It was then said, “Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things.
But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat;” (Ex. xix. 3). A distinction, previous to this, had existed among animals, in respect to clean and unclean, (vii.), but it would seem to have had reference to sacrifice, or other uses to which animals in the earliest times were applied, not to food; otherwise, neither the restriction before, nor the abstinence after, would be altogether intelligible. The grant to Noah reserves nothing but the blood of flesh; and it reserves this because the animal life or soul is in the blood; the blood is the nearest, representative and the bearer throughout the animal organism of the living principle; so that for man to feed on this seemed to be bringing the house into too close and direct contact with the animal soul or life. On this account it was forbidden, that so the difference between the two might stand more conspicuously out, and the reverence due to human blood be more easily preserved. When the law entered, another reason was supplied from the use made of the blood in sacrifice; “the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: therefore I said to the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood,” (Le. xix. 11, 12). The one reason did not destroy the other, but only superadded to it a further and more distinctly religious sanction; and this sanction obtained such a hold upon the convictions and usages of the covenant-people, that, in the first Christian communities, where Jew and Gentile met together, it was found expedient, for the sake of brotherly concord, to eschew abstinence from “things strangled and from blood;” that is, from blood, either as existing apart or as diffused through the flesh, (Ac. xx. 29). As the Mosaic ritual has ceased, this prohibition must be understood to have ceased along with it—although even now a certain respect may not improperly be paid to it, especially when viewed in connection with the earlier and more general reason derived from the superiority of the soul in rational to that of irrational beings. Accordingly, a frequent and familiar use of animal blood for food is a characteristic chieft of savage life, and is very commonly associated with a disregard of human blood.

The prohibitions of a more special kind introduced by the legislation of Moses, interdicting the use of certain animals, fowls, and fishes as unclean, and allowing others as clean, has been treated of elsewhere; it formed part of the distinctive instruction and moral discipline of the law. (See CLEAN.) Even, however, of the animals which were accounted clean, the whole might not be eaten; and besides the blood, the kidneys and the fat covering, as well as the fat generally connected with the more vital parts, were devoted to the altar, and withdrawn from common use, (Le. xi. 9, 15). They too were regarded as too closely associated with the life of the animal to be suitable for the purposes of man’s ordinary support. (See FAT.)

II. The climate of Palestine and of the neighbouring countries necessarily exercised a considerable influence in determining the articles which formed the common diet of the Israelites. For the greater part of the year the temperature was too high to admit of much animal food being partaken of; for neither could food of this description be kept in a healthy state for any length of time, nor could man’s bodily frame be usually in a state to possess much of an appetite for it. The slaying and eating that is sometimes spoken of—the flesh-pots of Egypt after which the Israélites looked in the wilderness—and the luxuriating in the richness of fattened oxen, are to be understood chiefly of extraordinary occasions, when sacrificial feasts were held, when royal repasts were given, or special honours were intended to be shown to partial objects of regard and distinction, (Ac. xviii. 7; xix. 14; Nu. xiv. 13; Ki. L. 9; Is. vii. 25; Mat. xxiii. 1). Probably as fair a representation of the ordinary articles of diet as can otherwise be obtained, may be derived from the supplies furnished by Barzillai to David on the occasion of his withdrawal from the face of Absalom into the land of Gilead. At such a time ordinary provisions would naturally be presented; and they are given thus: “wheat, and barley, and seed, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and panned quails, and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine,” (2Sa. xix. 27, 28). Here animal food forms a small proportion of what was contributed, and occupies altogether a very inferior and secondary place—the more remarkable, as the supplies were furnished in a part of the country which perhaps more of a pastoral than of an agricultural character. It is somewhat strange, too, that neither eggs nor frods are mentioned among the provisions then brought forward; nor, indeed, have these almost any place among the articles of diet in Old Testament history: the allusions to them are of the most occasional kind, (Le. xx. 22; Nu. xiv. 18; Is. xi. 25; Le. xi. 12). It would seem, as Harmer remarks (Obs. i. p. 259), that there were few or no tame fowls, such as we possess, kept by the Jews in ancient times; and few or no eggs eaten, except what might be accidentally met with in the nests of wild fowl. They are extremely common, the same writer remarks, in all parts of the East now; and when presented of provisions are made to travellers, or rulers, they are sure to form a principal part. There can be no doubt, however, that anciently, just as in the present day, corn of various kinds and the different preparations made from it—especially the flour of wheat and barley—constituted the staple of food among the covenant-people. Bread was for them emphatically “the staff of life”—bread of barley flour for the poorer part, and of wheat flour for those in better circumstances; fish, honey, cheese, butter, milk, and other such things, being used along with it as a relish rather than as substantive articles of diet. Hence, the barley sheaf presented on the second day of the passover feast, and the two loaves of fine or wheaten flour offered seven weeks afterwards at the feast of pentecost, (Le. xviii. 19, 20), formed a suitable representation, not only of the chief produce of the land, but also of the common food of the people. The few allusions to the subject in New Testament scripture, show that matters continued much the same in apostolic times, (Mat. xvi. 8; Ju. xi. 7, 8). And to this day the Arabs “rarely diminish their flocks by using them for food, but live chiefly upon bread, milk, butter, dates, or what they receive in exchange for their wool” (Shaw, p. 180). Burchardt says of them, “the frugality of these Bedowin is without example; my companions (i.e. from Wady Mousa across the western desert), who walked at least five hours a day, supported themselves for four and twenty hours with a piece of dry black bread of about a pound and a half weight, without any other kind of nourishment” (Travels, p. 189).

Beans, in some parts of the country, and for two or three months in the year (beginning with March), perhaps came nearest to barley and wheat as furnishing materials for food. Dr. Shaw even says, that dishes of them boulai and stewed with oil and garlic, are in spring the principal food of persons of all distinctions (Traces, p. 49). But this must be understood with some limitation; for in the district where beans are most plentifully produced, the Hauran, we are informed by Barchardt, that they are chiefly used as food for cows and sheep (suya, p. 26); and so far as notices of Scripture are concerned, very partial use would seem to have been made of them. However, many things were doubtless used as at least occasional articles of diet, which are left unnoticed in Scripture, simply from an incident having occurred in the narrative to draw attention to them. It is from a quite incidental allusion in the account of John the Baptist, that we learn beets, and what is called wild honey, to have been among the means of food, on which persons were wont for a time to subsist, who accustomed themselves, whether from necessity or from choice, to the meaner sort of fare. And had it been the object of Scripture to furnish us with a full account of the dietary supplies of the Israelites, we should probably have had to include in the narrative, besides those already mentioned, not only animals and food of various sorts, but also many of the vegetable productions and fruits which are cultivated throughout Syria in the present day—such as peas, beans, lettuce, cauliflower, garlic, onions, rice, dates, &c. A simply vegetable diet, however, was reckoned a poor one, cf. xxv. 17; xxi. 16; and we have no reason to suppose that in the better times of the Hebrew commonwealth, any more than now, vegetables were in much request.

Among the well-seasoned classes coarse dishes of various kinds seem to have been much relished, and comparatively speaking in pretty frequent use. References are found in Scripture to a good many articles employed as condiments in the preparation of such dishes. Not only salt and mustard, which are everywhere to be met with, but mint also, and cummin, anise, rue, almonds, and other kinds of nuts, are mentioned, Matt. xxiii. 27; xxiii. 25. So early as the days of Isaac spiced or savoury meat appears to have been known, and counted a delicacy, Ge. xxxvi. 14; but we know little of its ingredients, unless in this, as in so many other things touching the manners of the East, we can argue from the present to the past.

III. This, however, has respect to the last point that calls for consideration—the preparation and use of the articles of diet. It would appear that a sort of seasoning is very common in the preparation of food among families of some distinction. Dr. Rushed, quoted by Harmer, represents the people of Aleppo as delighting in dishes that were "pretty highly-seasoned with salt and spices; many of them made sour with vinegar, pomegranate, or lemon-juice; and onions and garlic often complete the seasoning." This, however, has respect only to the richer classes; for the samemanners of the people was very simple and plain. "Bread, dulse the juice of grapes thickened to the consistence of honey, leban (congealed sour-milk), bitter, rice, and a very little mutton, make the chief of their food in winter: as rice, bread, cheese, and fruits do in summer" (Thompson, vol. i. p. 224, 225). For such articles of food little seasoning or artificial preparation of whatever kind would be needed at any time. And when butcher-meat is used by people in the country parts, the cooking is usually still as of old of the most simple and expeditions nature. "A sheep or calf will be brought and killed before you, thrust
As the sandals were commonly put off on entering the house, and the feet washed, so to put off the sandals, or shoes (though sandals alone should be named, naturally became an emblem of respectful and devout behaviour). Hence the word to Moses at the burning bush, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place wherein thou standest is holy ground," Ex iii. 5, and the similar word to Joshua in the neighbourhood of Jericho, ch. x. 13. But the laying aside of sandals might, with respect to the common use of these for purposes of business or travel, be indicative of something quite different, and almost opposite. For it was, in that respect, a not unnatural and common sign of mourning; he who was plunged in grief being unable to leave his house and attire himself for the ordinary avocations of life. Hence, the prophet Ezekiel when called in vision to personate his people, and with that view receiving an intimation that his wife should die, but that he should refrain from the usual symbols of mourning, was ordered, among other things, to put his sandals on his feet, ch. xvi. 17. (See SANDALS.) And wearing, as the orientals did, loose and flowing garments, which fell upon the ground and concealed the lower parts of their body, when they went to do what we technically express by going to stool, the expression to cover the feet became with them a delicate mode of indicating the same action, Jo. ii. 23; 1 Sa. xix. 3; and the water of the foot was a euphony for that which the individual discharged between them, 2 Ki. xvi. 27.

To put one's foot upon the head or neck of a conquered foe was an ancient, though somewhat barbarous, custom, marking the complete subjection of the vanquished party. Many representations of this custom appear among the monumental remains of antiquity; and following the prevailing usage in this respect, we find Joshua ordering the five kings of the Canaanites, who had taken refuge in a cave, to be brought out, commision, or persecuting a course of action in obedience to another's command, to have the feet rightly directed, or kept straight and steadfast in the appointed path, were natural and appropriate images for uprightness and fidelity of behaviour. They are so, indeed, in all languages, but they were perhaps more frequently used, and in greater variety of form, among the Hebrews, than is quite customary in modern times, Ps xxiii. 2; Is. liv. 7; Nm. xii. 13; Ez. x. 1, &c.

FORESKIN, the precise, or projecting part of the skin in the distinctive member of the male sex, which was cut off in circumcision. Hence, as circumcision was an ordinance symbolical of purification, the foreskin was an emblem of corruption, De. x. 16; Je. i. 9.

FOREST, the rendering of עֹ֥שֶׁר (Oshar), is used of various parts of Palestine and the neighbourhood, which were well wooded, though the woods rarely perhaps reached such an extent as is now usually designated by the name. Beside the forest of Lebanon, which at one time undoubtedly was of great extent, we read of the forest of Hareth, the forest of Carmel, the forest of Arabia; but probably in such cases the term wood would be more appropriate; and this is the rendering adopted for the same word in the original in various passages—such as Jos. xvii. 18; 1 Sa. xiv. 25; 2 Ki. xii. 24, &c. It is also to be borne in mind, that in remote times Palestine was undoubtedly much more extensively furnished with wood than it is now, or even than it came to be in the later periods of the Hebrew commonwealth; so that tracts which had originally been forests might still retain the name, though latterly they had ceased to be so.

Fornication. This term is often used in Old Testament scripture as synonymous with adultery, especially in these passages which represent under this image the unfaithful and treacherous behaviour of the covenant people. The image is a very common one in the later prophets, in whose time the backslidings had become so general and flagrant, that the severest visitations of judgment were ready to be inflicted, Eze xxi.; Jo. vi.; Ho. i.; &c.

Fort, Fortification. The science of war necessarily exercises the ingenuity of man both upon instruments of attack and means of defence; and these bear such a relation to each other that any alterations and improvements in the one necessitate corresponding changes in the other. The great discoveries of modern artillery being unknown in classical and scriptural times, the means of defence which were then in use would be proportionally simpler. And Scripture contains evidence that the rudest of all contrivances were often resorted to, especially the caves, or rather caverns, which abounded in Palestine, and clefts of the rocks. Jos. x. 16; Jn. vii. 2; xx. 47; 1 Sa. xiii. 6, &c. In such a cliif of the rock Samson dwelt for a time, Jn. x. 5, 11, not so fully rendered in our version "the top of the rock," and in such a cavern David found shelter for himself and his 600 men, 1 Sa. xiii. 1, &c. The 600 men who remained of the tribe of Benjamin took refuge on the rock Rimmon, or more literally on or at it, and remained there four months; and not improbably they added to the natural strength of the place by throwing up earthworks around them. At all events, from the remotest period of Israelitish history we read of fortification, implying a higher degree of skill than that which merely takes Fortifications, and of building in general, found in widely separated regions of Asia and Europe, and known by several names, such as Cyclopean and Pelasgic. These, however, vary considerably, according as the stones are wholly rough or are partially cut, and as the entrances resemble the nature of doors or are little more than gaps; differences owing partly to advancing skill, yet also partly to the nature of the materials. There are huge stones in some of the buildings of Palestine, and even at the wall of the temple at Jerusalem, which have been pronounced to belong to the Cyclopean-style of building. The Canaanites of the days of Moses and Joshua were a highly civilized people, connected by commerce with the most advanced nations of the earth at that time, and specially connected with Egypt both by vicinity and by ties of kindred descent. It is therefore probable that their walled cities with gates and bars bore a resemblance to fortifications shown on Egyptian monuments, believed to be of the fifteenth century before Christ. They are of squared stone, or squared timber, on the summit of scarped rocks, with battlements, and protected by wet ditches all around them—unless indeed wet ditches be a later discovery in military art, and those referred to formed the natural channels of a river round a fortified island (Num. 29, 271). The same are to be seen in the Ninevite remains, though the sculptures are of a later date. But the similarity of the style favours the supposition that it was widely diffused, and employed from an early time without very essential improvements. If so, we may conclude that the Canaanite fortifications, which the Israelites sometimes preserved and sometimes copied, were of the same kind, with such alterations as suited a country differing from Egypt and Babylonia in this, that running water was scarce, while hills were extremely numerous. Thus Joshua, ch. xix. 15, speaks of the mass of cities that stood "on their heap," as it is again in Deut. xx. 18, or in the margin, "little hill" (No. 261).

We have seen that the "unwalled towns" are placed in opposition to the "walled cities," "fenced cities," "fortresses," "strongholds," or "cities of defence," as our version somewhat loosely and indiscriminately translates the expressions יִּבְנָה יָבְנָה יֶבְנָה (in battles and in war), "Fenced cities," or "cities of defence," are also the translations of יִּבְנָה יָבְנָה יֶבְנָה (in war), and related forms, literally perhaps "cities that could stand a siege." Ps. xxxvi. 21 (Hebrew 29); v. 9 (Hebrew 10); 2Chron. 21: 14 (in the Hebrew); and, which, in the opinion of some, imply a higher degree of fortification. In many cases these fenced cities or strongholds may have been places protected, not by walls, but by stockades of wood. Nothing precise and definite is to be found in Scripture upon the subject, unless that המֶלֶךְ "is once used, as in 23, of the modern "bolwarke" to be raised in sieges. But it has been suggested by one who has studied these matters carefully for himself, that stockaded forts have been found extremely difficult to take, and that they are used by nations in a semi-civilized condition, and were not unlikely means of defence in Palestine. Among the Israelites David was the earliest person to whom fortifications are expressly attributed subsequent to the original settlement in the land; and Solomon continued the work, to which his wisdom and his love of building might have inclined him. In the following generation the same is recorded of Japhoam and Riblah, and again of Bashan and Asa in the next generation; this being the inevitable consequence of the separation of the two kingdoms. In later times the fortification of their kingdom, particularly of Jerusalem, was carried on by Uzziah, Jehoshaphat, and Manasseh; and after the return from Babylon, the walls and gates and bars of the city were set up by Nehemiah and his associates. Jerusalem must be regarded as the most strongly fortified place in the country, both by natural advantages and by artificial aid; hence, after a siege of eighteen months, it seems to have fallen into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar chiefly through the effect of famine, while the strong quarter of Zion very probably held out for a month longer, 2Ki. xxiv. 8, 9; precisely as it had been previously taken from the Jews by David while they were weakening it to be impracticable, 2Sa. x. 9. Perhaps we may infer that in the kingdom of Judah Lachish and Libnah were next to Jerusalem in strength, as these three cities alone were successful in resisting Sennacherib, 2Ki. xviii. 14, 18. But Samaria, the capital of the ten tribes, was also a very strong city, as it seems to have remained alone to king Jeconiah, 2Ki. 25, and finally fell under the Assyrian arms only after a siege of three years, 2Ki. xviii. 19. Compare the threatenings against Samaria and Zion, Mi. 1:9-10. Compare the threatenings against Samaria and Zion, Mi. 1:9-10.

A fortified town was a town with a wall. It might sometimes happen that for greater strength it had a second wall on the outside, such as Zedekiah erected, at least in one part of Jerusalem, 2Ch. xxvi. 5, and we read of Zedekiah attempting to escape "by the way of the gate between two walls," 2Ki. xxiv. 14. The surrounding wall being so prominent a part of the city, not to say that it was almost indispensable in these times of confusion and violence, the expression "to build a city" often meant, in scriptural as well as in classical language, to build the wall, to make a fortified place of that which was already inhabited without fortifications. So we must understand Solomon's building the two Bethelhouses, and similar buildings by his son, 2Ch. viii. 5; x. 15-16; Jeroboam's building Shechem and Penuel, 1Ki. xii. 25; and manifestly Hiel's building Jericho and coming under the curse of Joshua, because the gates of it are especially mentioned, 1Ki. xi. 29; Jer. vi. 1, while there is no room for doubting that Jericho had been a habitation of men, and a place of some importance from the days of Joshua downwards, 14:1-16; 13:3, 5.

The entrances to the city through the walls were protected by gates, which were closed generally by strongly-built folding doors, as the plural "doors" occurs in reference to each gate, Ne. viii. These doors had locks, and massive bars attached to them for the sake of additional strength. The bars are noticed in one instance as being of brass, 1Ki. iv. 13; and in the case of the Babylonian conquests of Cyrus, we read of gates of brass and bars of iron, 1Es. xvi. 2. (See Gate.) This description also occurs in Ps. cxvii. 16. The buildings of the gateways were probably structures of great strength, the strongest points on the walls, and containing one or several chambers: so that "to sit in the gate" might denote not only the magistrates in time of peace, but also the military commanders in the progress of victory, 1Ki. iv. 13. By an easy extension there might be another chamber over the gate, forming a gate-tower or a place for a watchman, 2Sa. xxiv. 21,33; and for obvious reasons of convenience, we may believe that the tower which the watchmen occupied was at or near the gate, even where this is not precisely stated, 2Ki. vi. 17. In the Assyrian sculptures the gateway is generally between two towers, as in the illustrations Nos. 270, 272, and a chamber over the gateway is indicated by windows. (See Gate.) The gateway itself is simply an opening in the wall, and not the massive building frequent in the castles of medieval architecture. The folding doors of the gate are shown in No. 272. These must often have been of wood, since many bas-reliefs represent them setting them on fire. But the idea of a tower could not be long confined to the gate, though it may have originated so: wall-towers are seen in very ancient representations, erected wherever they were of use for defence. The walls of Nineveh and Babylon are well known to have been wonderfully provided with these; and Scripture names several wall-towers in Jerusalem—the tower of Hemmeel, that of Meah, and that of the furnaces. "A wall-tower" seems to be the strict and the common meaning of the word נִיגְלָף (neqlah), almost invariably rendered "tower" in our version. This shade of meaning is often suggested by the context, 1Es. xxi. 1; xxiii. 11; and it is evident in such a verse as 2Ch. xxvi. 9, "Uzziah built towers in Jerusalem, at the corner-gate, and at the valley-gate, and at the turning of the wall, and fortified them." There is another word, נִמְלָה (nimlah), which commonly means and is correctly translated "a corner," but which occasionally must mean some kind of fortification. Accordingly it also is rendered "tower" in Zep. i. 16; ili. 6, and "bulwark" in 2 Ch. xxvi. 15. Uzziah "made in Jerusalem engines invented by cunning men, to be upon the towers and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal." Colonel Hamilton Smith, however (article "Fortifications" in Kitto's Cyclopædia), rejects this translation "bulwarks," and describes the objects meant as "huge 'counter-forts'; double buttresses or masses of solid stone and masonry, built in particular parts to sustain the outer wall, and afforded space on the summit to place military engines." Yet doubt is thrown on the correctness of this definition by the circumstance that no buttresses are represented in the Assyrian sculptures, the strengthening of the walls being effected by the great number of small towers built into and projecting from them. Nor did the military engines of ancient times, which could be stationed and worked in these towers, require such massive foundations to sustain them as modern artillery does. Another Hebrew term which once occurs, is bestos, and which is commonly understood to be of the same meaning, is bestos “storehouses and fortress, or city.”

A tower, bestos, might also be the citadel, the strongest part of the city, and the place of last resort from the enemy: and in this case it would most probably not be a wall-tower. In nearly all the Assyrian sculptures, and in several of the Egyptian paintings, there is a central mass of buildings in the city, higher than the rest, which may fairly be identified with this bestos (No. 274). Such may have been the tower of Parnich which Gideon broke down, Judges vi. 19. Such certainly was the tower of Shechem, where Jotham was attempting to turn him when he met his death, Judges ix. 32, and the tower of Shechem, where the Jews were successful in the like enterprise. In that account there occurs another word, bestos, apparently the more technical term for a tower standing alone and in an elevated position, bestos “tower,” or “a hold,” as in our version, though a less distinct rendering is given in the only other passage where it occurs, Isaiah xxxv. 8, “which placed,” perhaps in connected with it, and which along with the vacant space back to the principal wall, may all have been comprehended under one name. Again, these exterior walls are often represented to us in the Assyrian sculptures, and they generally appear as low and embattled walls.

Other fortifications of a similar kind might be constructed away from cities, to stand in the neighborhood of villages and render them protection, or to stand all alone for the defence of a mountain pass, or a frontier, or the like, Zechariah x. 19. Twice over, Zechariah xiii. 19, xxiv. 2, we have the two extremes placed together, “from the tower of the watchman to the city.” Another word is found once or twice, bestos “citadel,” translated “castle,” Zechariah xiii. 16, xxiv. 1; Joshua “built cities in the mountains of Judah,” and in the forests he built castles and towers.”

Such the same seems to be meant, but perhaps with special reference to the use of such strong places for treasuries, by David’s “storehouses in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages, and in the castles,” II Chronicles xvii. 9, where “castles” is a solitary and needless deviation from the usual rendering “towers.” Besides our version at times uses “castle,” but also and somewhat unfortunately “palace,” Ezekiel xxvi. 4, to express the Hebrew bestos “citadel,” which appears to have been in use among the nomad tribes of Ishmael and Midian, Ezechiel xxvi. 4, Ezekiel xxvi. 14, though curiously enough it is once employed to describe the cities of the priests, Exodus v. 5, Hebrews v. 5. The word bestos (mizpeh), is only twice found, meaning “watch-tower,” Ezekiel xxvi. 14, xxxii. 8, but it is extremely common as a proper name, Mizpeh, and in the closely allied form Mizpah: the towns which bear this name do doubt answering to the description which it conveys. Another proper name, that of a place of great strength mentioned by Josephus, along with many others, which were erected in Palestine in later times, is Marada, which is nothing else than the Hebrew bestos (mizpeh), and which along with the feminine form bestos (mizpah), and two rare kindred forms metzub and mitzadeth, is rendered variously “mansion,” “hold,” “stronghold,” “fort,” “castle,” while at times also it is the “kite” of a wild beast. Indeed by its derivation it is simply the fastness or secure place to which either brake or man retreats for safety from the pursuing. The allusion to both meanings seems apparent in its frequent use to describe the places, whether artificially fortified or not, to which David repaired for safety while Saul was hunting him, as he expressed it, 1 Samuel xiii. 19, 20, 1 Chronicles xii. 19; and perhaps this allusion is not wholly dropped when the word is applied to Zion, Isaiah xi. 7, the resting place of the Lord of the tribe of Judah, although our version needlessly gives us there the rendering “castle.”

In besieging a town the same means seem to have been called into operation as we read of in classical antiquity, and as we see illustrated in the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. A line of circumvallation was drawn to cut off all communication between the

is a besieged city and the rest of the country, and this is expressed by גֶּלֶב (gelab), according to some good authorities like Michaelis and Thenius. But the greatly more prevalent opinion is that this word means "a fort," or collectively "a line of forts," which rendering has the support of our version. Yet unfortunately the same word "fort" is employed to represent the entirely different word מֵיהַ (miyeh), in xix. 3; while the masculine form מְהַ (meh) is once rendered "bastions," Joel xx. 20; at other times it is translated, probably better, "siegeworks," as "lay siege against," "besiege," Ex. 23, 25; xvi. 1, where it might indicate the drawing of that line of circumvallation. As the besiegers approached nearer to the city they threw up a "bank," or "mound," or mound of earth, מְהַ (meh), for their own protection as well as for purposes of attack; at times this word is rendered less well in the margin, "an engine of shell," De xxvii. 28; xxxi. 22 (Hebrew 27; in this same verse are mentioned אֶפֶל (epel), "rams," or "battering rams," favourite engines for making a breach in the walls. The engines of shot are מַשְׁקָקָן (mashkakan), 2 Ki. viii. 13, the word in Hebrew; like our own "engine," implying by its etymology "ingenious contrivance." One or other of these, perhaps both, may be designated by Ezek. viii. 9, in a rather absurd expression, "engines of war" in our version, perhaps literally "the wiping out, or obliteration, by that which he has placed over against." One other word, מָלְכָה (malkah), once used in the plural, Is. xviii. 13, "towers," and according to etymology meaning "a place for spring," must indicate some such besieging tower, though the special nature of it, as fixed or moveable, is undetermined. The classical writers make us aware that mining and counter-mining were common practices in ancient sieges, and this is the interpretation of the Septuagint and Vulgate in a passage which our translation more accurately leaves general, De iii. 20, "The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken," or rather, as in the margin, "made naked" or laid bare.

The Assyrian battering-rams, as we see from the sculptures, were worked from shed-like machines, of wood or wicker work, on wheels; in some instances two rams are shown, one above the other. Sometimes the machines have lofty towers attached to them for archers and slingers; such a tower may be intended by this word מְלַכָה. One of the sculptures is particularly interesting on account of its spirited representation of the various incidents of a siege (No. 272). It shows the besieged endeavouring to check the action of a battering-ram, by a chain which they have placed under it with a view to lifting it out of its place, whilst the besiegers are hanging on the ram by means of long hooks, so as to keep it where they desire it to be. From the towers of the city some fire is being thrown on the machines of the enemy; but it is not quite clear what is meant to be shown as burning, whether the ropes swinging the ram, or grappling. In the last relief of Sennacherib attacking the city of Lachish, the besieged are hurling torches on the battering-ram machines, whilst the men who work them are throwing water from large basins to extinguish the flames. It is worthy of notice that the rams are generally shown as on causeways or roadways (No. 269), apparently laid down for them, as they end abruptly under the machines. The Egyptians again had long spears worked from testuboes or small sheds, formed probably of a framework covered with hides, and the action of the spears was analogous to that of battering-rams. Unlike the Assyrian machines, these testuboes were not upon wheels (No. 269).

In the New Testament there is scarcely a reference to fortification, except in our Lord's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, Lk. xix. 23, 31. "The days shall come upon thee that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee," compare ch. xx. 29.

In Je. v. 10 it is written, "Take away her battlements, for they are not the Lord's." This however is an unadulterated devotion from the proper meaning of the word, which is correctly rendered in the only other two passages in which it occurs, Is. xviii. 2; Jer. xxxii. 22, the "branches" or "plants" of a vine. FORTUNATUS, a Roman name, but designating a person, who appears to have been a member of the church at Corinth, and who, having visited Paul at Ephesus, returned along with Stephanus and Achaïans, bearing the apostle's first epistle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xvi. 17.

FOUNTAIN. So Well.

FOWL. In addition to what has been observed, in the article Cock, on the question how far the early Hebrews were familiar with our domestic poultry, we may advance the occurrence of the word מַשָּׁמַשׁ (mas-
FOUL

1 Kings iv. 23. It is rendered in our English version "fatted fowl," and there seems no reason to doubt the propriety of the translation. This, however, implies domestication; and as the occasion of the mention is the daily supply of Solomon's table, including his household, it implies general and extensive cultivation of the species intended; for a rare or casual occurrence of any particular bird in the market, would not have entitled it to a place in such an enumeration. And we cannot doubt that a domestic animal which daily appeared at the king's table was no stranger on those of his subjects.

If we could be quite sure that a bird of the gallinaceous order was intended by the term barbour, we might with tolerable certainty pronounce it the barn-door poultry; for there is another native bird capable of domestication whose claim approaches this in probability. But we cannot conceal the fact, that the barbour may have been goose; which certainly were fattened in vast numbers by the Egyptians from the most remote antiquity, and formed a very important article of popular consumption in both the fresh and salted state. Of this fact we possess historic testimony:

and the copious evidence of the Egyptian paintings, in which are represented the various processes connected with the catching, keeping, feeding, killing, salting, cooking, and eating of geese—often mentioned. [B. A. G.]

FOX [Sawd. ~

Several species of the dog tribe (Canidae) are common in Palestine, and it has been matter of dispute to which of these the shvid is to be referred. One of these is a true fox (Canis lupus). Geof: E. Order. Hann. Safi, very closely agreeing with our own, but with some important specific distinctions. Another is the jackal (Canis aureus). Between these the choice must lie. The LXX, uniformly render the word by αἰγύπτιος.

An examination of the various passages in which the word occurs, which are only six in number, indicates an animal either greyer or sufficiently abundant to be taken in large numbers when wanted (three hundred foxes), not too formidable to be handled by a man, inhabiting the vineyards of Judea, apt to feed on grapes and spoil the clusters, canis found in ruined cities. Most of these characters would indicate almost equally well the jackal and the fox; but some appear to be distinctive of the former. The jackal associates in large packs, the fox is solitary; the jackal is more noted for his depredations in the vineyards than the fox, and frequents desolate cities, and violates graves, which we have not seen attributed to the fox. There is also the important point in the identification, that the Arabic name shvid, or as we spell it jackal, is manifestly the Hebrew shvid, slightly altered. Some have derived it from an unused root signifying to cry (ם), but the fox is habitually silent, whereas the nocturnal cries of the troops of jackals are proverbial throughout the East. Geographers, however, and the better lexicographers, derive it from שָׁבַד (shabad) also an unused root to dig, break through, or excavate. Probably the Shabad of the New Testament may be referred to the same animal; though nothing certain can be predicated. The crafty rapacity of Herod might be represented by either, and both are dwellers in holes. Biblical critics observe that "the Turks call vixen and crafty persons by the metaphorical name of shables [jackals]."

With respect to the device employed by Samson for avenging Israel on the Philistines, J. xxv., the abundance and social habits of the jackal would render the capture of a large number no difficult matter. Vayhey says, "The wolf and the red fox are rare, but there is a prodigious quantity of the middle species named shabad; they go in droves." Again, the same traveller observes, "Shabeds are concealed by hedges in the gardens, and among ruins and roads." A firebrand, torch, or simple lamp, might then be fastened very easily between the tails of two, so as not to destroy the animals, and yet to continue burning long enough to allow them to run some distance. The three hundred were of course distributed widely over the country by Samson's agents; the terrified animals would naturally run into the cover of the corn, at the edge... of which they were set loose; the opposing wills of the conjoint animals and the perpetual impingement of the corn stalks among them, would keep them in constant irritation, and make their progress devious:

the corn being ripe and dry would ignite with readiness, and the spreading fire would affright the jackals, and preclude the possibility of their lying down, and thus they would probably be kept rushing hither and thither, from field to field, until they were destroyed.

Abased as some writers have considered this story, the device was familiar enough to the ancients. In the year 1675 a brick was found twenty-eight feet below the pavement of London, on which was a bas-relief of a man driving into a field of corn two foxes with a torch fastened to their tails (Bennet Collection) It is possible that this may have been intended to represent the incident in the sacred narrative. But the Romans, at the feast in honor of Ceres, the goddess of corn, to whom they offered animals injured to cornfields, were accustomed to turn into the circus foxes with torches so fastened to them as to burn them to death, in retaliation of the injuries done to the corn by foxes so furnished.

"Ur ignar missive functis avensia den Terza formant vulpes."—Gvid, Fasti, iv. 841.

Col. H. Smith thinks that, contrary to the received opinion, the animals were not captured, but that "each fox had a separate brand;" for "it may be questioned whether two united would pull in the same direction; they would assuredly pull counter to each other." But this, and not the running of each animal straight to its burrow, was the very result desired. Their dragging in various irregular directions, and the prevention of their retirement to their burrows, would be double points distinctly contemplated by the avenging Israelite.

The other scriptural allusions to this animal may be briefly noticed. The words of David "when he was in the wilderness of Judah," xviii. 4, may be said to have received their accomplishment when Saul and the flower of his army, including doubtless many bitter enemies of David, lay slain on the battle-field of Mount Gilboa. The "foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines," may refer to false or worldly teachers in the Church of God, who "overthrow the faith of some," insidiously teaching perverse things. And the more because the false and foolish prophets who "prophesied out of their own hearts," are compared by Ezekiel, ch. xii. 2, to "the foxes in the deserts." But the most touching mention of this animal is that whereby the Lord Jesus so graphically sets before us his own deep humiliation and poverty. "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath no place to lay his head," Matt. viii. 20. How superabundant was the grace of the high and lofty One, who, "though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might be rich," v. 34. And what a lesson for us who bear his name, that we seek not great things for ourselves, to. an. s in a world where he was rejected and cast out!

FRANKINCENSE [el-ibonah, 2 Sam. v. 10] is a resin which exudes spontaneously, or is obtained by incision, from several species of Boswellia, a genus belonging to the natural order of Burseraceae, or incense trees. Boswellia serrata grows to a height of forty feet, and is found in Abyssinia and in mountainous districts of India. Its resin, known as Indian salbenam, has a balsamic smell, and burns with a bright flame and fragrant odour. B. papyrifera occurs on the east coast of Africa, in Abyssinia, about 1000 feet above the sea-level, on bare limestone rocks, to which the base of the stem is attached by a thick mass of vegetable substance, scaling roots to a prodigious depth in the rocky crevices (Theyse's Veg. Kingdom, 29). Its resin, the salbenam of Arabia and Africa, usually occurs in commerce in lumps, masses, and in yellow-tinted drapery or "tears," but so large as the Indian variety. This last is still burned in Hindu temples under the name of "rhondda" and "holban"—the latter evidently identical with the Hebrew "el-bonah;" and it is exported from Bandah, in considerable quantities for the use of Greek and Roman Catholic churches.

The sacred incense of the Hebrews was compounded of spicata (pompeii), galbanum, saffron, and frankincense, in equal proportions, and mingled with salt, as the original sum (mezallach) imports, and as in the margin of our authorized version is rightly rendered "scented," Ex. xxxi. 33. This composition it was unlawful for private persons to imitate. It was reserved for the worship of Jehovah, and the quantity consumed on the altar morning and evening must have diffused a grateful atmosphere around the worshippers. The rubies used to say that the perfume was perceptible as far off as Jericho; and although this is obviously exaggeration, to the true worshipper it must have really been the "odour of sanctity," and as soon as he came within its range, we can easily imagine how on its fragrant and mystical pinions his spirit felt as it wafted towards heaven. "Let my prayer be set forth before thee an incense," says the psalmist, Ps. cxvii. and at the opening of the seventh seal, in the Apocalypse, Rev. vi. 8, we find an angel standing at the altar, having a golden censer, with "the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne.

![Illustration of a fox and frankincense plant]

And the smoke of the incense, which [257] Fringed Dress came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand. What could represent in a manner more encouraging the acceptance to the Most High of his people's worship, or what could be a more exquisite emblem of that higher intercession which imports to the praises and prayers of earth a charm and a value not intrinsic? Frankincense, along with myrrh, another precious perfume, was an ingredient in the costly oblation which the eastern worshippers presented to the infant Redeemer, Mat. ii. 11, and there is one allusion in the Canticles, which seems to show that frankincense and other resinous odours, although doubtless in a form distinct from the sacred compound, were harnessed for the honour and delight of royalty. Espying the palm-branch of Solomon, with its purple hangings and its coat of sixty valiant men, the bride exclaims,

"Lo! what is this, in cloud of fragrant gum, That from the wilderness doth start? The scent of frankincense, in solemn form, And all Arabia breathes from all her stores." (Song iii. 6 Mason Greek).

But although the primary reference may have been to the sumptuous king of Israel, we are glad to raise our thoughts to the royal progress of the true Prince of peace. "Jesus came from the wilderness of Judah, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense and all the powders of the merchant; and when his work was finished, he entered his Father's mansion above, coming up from the wilderness of earth fragrant with every grace which it ever yieldeth; for none knew like him how to gather all its myrrh and all its spices" (Moses Stuart's Exp. of the Song).

[258] Fringed Dress. - Assyrian dress, supposed to represent an Assyrian painting, supposed to represent an Assyrian painting, supposed to represent an Assyrian painting. A highly ornamented Assyrian dress is exhibited in No. 278, worn by a king, who has one hand on the hilt of his sword, and the other supported by an official staff. In No. 279, we have representations of the Assyrian fringes in detail, seen from the borders to the tunic, others from the ample borders of the outside garments. But it may be doubted whether fringes of that description were intended by the Jewish legislator, since they were in such common use that they could form no proper mark of distinction between an Israelite and a Gentile; and, besides, they seem appropriate to state-dresses rather than to ordinary attire.

FRINGES were commanded to be put by the children of Israel on the borders of their garments throughout their generations, Num. xv. 38. The word used to designate them, חֵקֶק (ḥiqqeq), from the root to flourish or shine, has been rendered ὑπερχών, fimbriae, and must denote something like what we understand by fringes, or rather pendentils in the shape of loops or tassels. Fringed garments, elaborately wrought, were very common among both the ancient Egyptians and Babylonians, as has been already shown under Embroidery. No. 277 shows a fringed dress from an Egyptian painting, supposed to represent an Assyrian painting, supposed to represent an Assyrian painting. A highly ornamented Assyrian dress is exhibited in No. 278, worn by a king, who has one hand on the hilt of his sword, and the other supported by an official staff. In No. 279, we have representations of the Assyrian fringes in detail, seen from the borders to the tunic, others from the ample borders of the outside garments. But it may be doubted whether fringes of that description were intended by the Jewish legislator, since they were in such common use that they could form no proper mark of distinction between an Israelite and a Gentile; and, besides, they seem appropriate to state-dresses rather than to ordinary attire.
tassel-like fringes together, and giving it a more special appearance and aim.

The moral design of this part of Israelitish dress is declared to have been that the people might "look upon the fringe, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; that they might not seek after their own heart, and after their own eyes, after which they need to go astraying; but that they might remember and do God's commandments, and be holy unto him."

The only question is, why such a device as these fringes should have been fallen upon for promoting such an end, or how they were designed to converge towards it. "The many threads," says Ainsworth, "of the fringes on the four skirts of their garment, signified the many commandments of God which they should put upon them, to be as it were clothed with them, and to walk in them: the heaven-colored ribbon (sky-blue) taught them an heavenly affection to all the law; and an holy conversation; and led them spiritually to put on the wedding-garment, viz., that their conversation might be in heaven." Baumgarten connects them specially with the feet; the fringes were to be made for the purpose of keeping the eyes "from wanton ing abroad, and going forth to commit adultery with the powers of the world, after the manner of the nations, and that with nice delicacy they should direct themselves upon the feet, and so bring into remembrance the law of God, which prescribed the proper limits for all movements in the hands and feet." This, however, seems to take for granted that the borders or corners of the garments--to which the fringes were attached, were somehow suspended over the feet, which does not appear from the original passage in Numbers, and is plainly disconneceted by the corresponding passage in Deuteronomy, where the four corners, or wings of the garment, are mentioned as proper places for the fringes, De xxviii. 12. Only clothing, or garments generally, are connected with the fringe, but no particular part of dress individually. The explanation of Ainsworth may be regarded as substantially giving the true reason, excepting that no stress should be laid on the number of threads as indicating the number of the divine commandments. The cord or ribbon is manifestly spoken of as a unity; and if several threads were required to form it, still this is not formally indicated, nor could the number be such as naturally to suggest the multiplicity of God's precepts. In an artificial badge of that sort a certain measure of arbitrariness was unavoidable; it was enough if the thing was in its own nature not unsuitable, and was so distinctly associated by the lawgiver with its main design that no one needed to be in any doubt concerning it.

The later Jews turned the prescription into an ostentations display, and not infrequently into a sort of charm. Our Lord charged the Pharisees of his day with hypocritically enriching the borders or fringes of their garments, Matt. xvi. 5. And the rabbinical Jews have such sayings as these respecting them: "Whoso diligently keep this law of fringes is made worthy, and shall see the face of the majesty of God" (KolHassanon, on Sa., vi); "and when a man is clothed with the fringes, and goeth out therewith to the door of his habitation, he is safe, and God rejoiceth, and the destroying angel departeth from hence, and the man shall be delivered from all hurt," &c. (K. Mechechen on De.) The Jews of the present day, however, excuse themselves from making the prescribed fringes on the ground that they have lost the secret of obtaining the proper dye--still showing their excessive regard to the letter, and in their extreme punctiliousness about the mode losing the reality itself. It is said that some of them wear, instead of the proper fringe, a long tassel at each corner, consisting of eight white woollen threads knotted together; but this does not seem to be general.

FROG _piscis_ (teporthelis, _περιηχης_). The only occasion in which this animal is noticed in the Old Testament is the second plague upon Egypt. "I will smite all thy borders with frogs; and the river shall bring forth frogs abundantly, which shall go up and come into thine house, and into thy bedchamber, and upon thy bed, and into the house of thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thine ovens, and into thy kneading-troughs." In fulfilment of this menace, the frogs came out of the river in millions so immense, that when they died, "they gathered them together upon heaps, and the land stank," Ex vii. 3, 11.

Frogs exist in great abundance in the Nile. Three or four species have been recognized there, as _Rana pipiens, R. esculenta, R. punctata_, all in immense numbers; and we believe also _R. temporaria_, our common English frog, which is spread over the whole northern hemisphere. (Gunter "On the Geographical Distribution of Batrachia," Annals N. S. i. 1850.) Which of these species constituted the plague, it is impossible to say; in all probability all were included, all having the same habits, and all living under the same conditions of existence. The miracle consisted, not in the making of the frogs for the occasion, but in the gathering of them from their ordinary haunts in the river, and causing them to crowd and swarm where ordinarily they would not have been found.

Ordinarily, frogs are not to be found in great numbers, and intruding into human habitations, except in low, marshy situations; and it is well known what annoyance and disgust is occasioned in such situations, especially within the tropics, during the storms of the monsoon, or at the setting in of the rainy season, by all places becoming infected with frogs. But the annoyance and horror connected with such a visitation in Egypt, would be aggravated by the manifestly supernatural character of the calamity; since frogs are not usually found there in large numbers, or so as to occasion any trouble. And the evil would be still further increased by the circumstance, that the frog was, for some reason not certainly known, regarded by the Egyptians as a type of Pharaoh, their creative power (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, iv, p. 234, seq.)
In the New Testament, also, we have but a single mention of the frog, viz., in the symbolic imagery of the Apocalypse. Here, too, it is in connection with one of the plagues of God's wrath. "I saw three unclean spirits, like frogs, come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils [demons] working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world [sacerdotes], to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Abomination." Rev. xvi. 13, 14. For the interpretation of this symbol, we must refer to the commentaries on the Apocalypse, in particular to Mr. Elliott's Horae Apocryphi, ed. 1823, p. 129, where much curious matter may be found regarding the use of the symbol, both in earlier and later times.

FRONLETS, in New Testament Physiologus (φυσιλογος, σαρκομανικος, προσωπον). The Hebrew word is פִּילָחְתִּים (philloth, probably lipmanoth, and it occurs only in three passages, Ex. xvi. 15, 20; xxix. 3; each time in the form of a proverbial simile, "as fronlets between your eyes": each time apposed with a similar expression connected with the hand, "as a sign or token upon your hand." In another passage also, Ex. xiii. 8, we have the same saying, with the change merely of a word; instead of "as fronlets," it is "as a memorial between your eyes." In Exo. the expression is used more immediately with reference to the ordinance respecting the consecration of the firstborn and the passover solemnity; but in the two passages of Deuteronomy it bears respect to the precepts and statutes of the old covenant generally. Of the whole of these, or of the words in general which were commanded through Moses, it was changed upon the children of Israel that they should "bind them for a sign upon your hand, and have them as frontlets between your eyes;" that is, should keep them as distinctly in view, and as carefully attend to them, as if they had them legibly written on a tablet between their eyes, and bound in open characters upon their hands; so that, whenever they looked, and whatever they did, they could not fail to have the statutes of the Lord before them. That this was the meaning of the expression in question, and that no actual written memorial was intended to be enjoined upon the Israelites, is clear from the nature of the case; since no writing to be worn either between the eyes or upon the hand could, by possibility, have served the purpose of legibly expressing all the statutes and ordinances of the law. It is clear also from the alternative phrases with which those in question are associated; such as, "that the Lord's law may be in thy mouth," Ex. xiii. 9; "that these words shall be in thine heart;" "that ye shall lay them upon your forehead," Ex. xxxix. 20; in short, that the inner and the outer man alike—heart, soul, eyes, hands, mouth—might be all, as it were, imbued with the spirit of the law, and taken bound to observe its precepts. Such was the evident meaning of this class of injunctions, and so it was certainly understood in ancient times, as may be inferred alone from Pr. vi. 21, where Solomon, speaking to the young of their fathers' commandment and the law of their mother, says, "Bind them continually upon thine heart, and tie them upon thy neck"—the real import of which is plain to the most simple, and has never, so far as we know, been misunderstood, comp. above ii. 32, 33.

But the Jews, some time after their return from Babylon, did not know exactly what, gave the direction about having the precepts of the law as fronlets a literal turn, and had portions of it written out and worn as badges upon their person. These portions consisted of the following passages: Ex. xiii. 9, 16; Deut. v. 4, 5, 7, 10, 11, 12, which were written upon bits of parch- ment, and put into a case of leather, one for being bound upon the forehead, and the other upon the left arm, inside, above the elbow. The arm-case had only one cell, but that for the forehead had four, the texts for it being written on four bits of parchment, and the cases were bound by a particular sort of thread or thong, marked with small letters—that for the arm winding in a spiral manner to the middle fingers, and the other, after being tied behind the head in a knot, falling down upon the chest. The two cells which were called τοπλῆθα, σπιλιθοτήρια (according to the common Jewish derivation from τσπιλλέθ, prayer), as if being especially worn during prayer; but others, in particular Spencer (Note 18, it. iv., sect. ii., 81), would take it in the sense of adhèreses or ligamenta, much the same as ταφθαθέλα deriving from ταφθαθά, to adhere, or join to. The latter, so far as the sense is concerned, may be regarded as perhaps the more probable view; for there is no proper evidence of any peculiar connection existing between phylacteries and prayers. They had respect to the conduct rather than to devotion; and Maimonides even has this deliverance concerning them, "Let no one pass by the synagogue where prayers are being said there, but if he has phylacteries upon his head he may pass by, because they show that he is studious of the law" (L. 4, 6, 1, 2; 4, 4, 1, 8). The allusion to the Lord, also, in the passage of Matthew just referred to, indicates nothing as to any special connection with prayer, or with superstition purposes; it simply points to the phylacteric practice of binding the phylac- teries as a hypercritical show of extreme regard for the law; so, too, Josephus: "The things," he says, "which exhibit the mighty power and benignity of God toward us, are to be borne about written upon the head and the arm, so as to render everywhere manifest the good-will of God in our behalf!" (Ant. iv. 210). This seems to have been the original design of the device, in its intention good, however one may be disposed to blame the gross and somewhat childish manner of its execution. The phylacteries were to serve as kind of little monitors, calling upon the weavers and others to use them to remember the special loving kindness of God to Israel, and to keep the statutes he had enjoined upon them as their covenant God. But by and by they were turned into instruments of religious vanity and display, and abused to selfish purposes by those who sought, by a great profession of legal ritualism, to hide their deficiency of inward principle. Then they came to be employed as charms or amulets, having a divine virtue in them to preserve the wearer from sin—especially from the nomenical agency; hence such sayings as concerning them in the Talmudical writings: "Whoever has tspellion upon his head . . . is fortified against sin;" "they are a bandage for cutting off," i.e. from various kinds of danger or hostility (Heblos, iv. 3). And Jerome, in Matt. xvi. 5, speaks of them generally as worn by the Jews for guardianship and safety (ob eustolium et monumentum); "not considering that they were to be borne in the heart, not on the body." He goes on to remark that the same thing substantially was done by certain superstitious little women among the Christians, "with diminutive gospels, pieces of wood in the form of a cross, and things of that sort, showing a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge, straining out a goat and swallowing a camel." So strong is the tendency of the human heart to fall into practices of superstition, and, when not rightly informed with divine truth, to be ever treading over again the same round of folly!

The Carole Jews, who reject most of the pharisaical usages and traditions, concur in the view given above of the passages in the Pentateuch respecting frontlets. They take the passages in a figurative, not a literal sense.

FULLER. The art of the fuller is beyond doubt of great antiquity; and, in respect to its two leading objects—the cleansing and the whitening of cloth—it seems to have reached at an early period a comparative degree of perfection. Very scanty materials, however, exist for tracing its progress, or for ascertaining exactly, in any particular age or country, what substances were employed in the art, and what methods were resorted to for the purpose of making them effectual. Only two substances are mentioned in Scripture—niter and soap, De ii 22; 3d in 22; the former more generally as connected with a very strong wash, the other as distinctively employed in fulling. Niter was very extensively known to the ancients for its use in this line. In Egypt it was obtained from the ashes of some plants; and most likely the Israelites became acquainted with it there, if they had not previously obtained a species of niter from other sources. It is obtained from the urine of men and animals, the alkali in which, after a certain time, disengages itself, and this was very extensively used among the ancients in place of niter, producing at little cost substantially the same results. But an alkali was obtained from a water in Armenia, and was much employed for washing purposes. "The ancients made ointments of this mineral alkali and oil, but not hard soap; though by these means they approached nearer to the invention than the old Germans in their use of wood-ashes; for dry solid soap can be made with more ease from the mineral than the vegetable alkali." I shall here observe that this alkali (the mineral) was much preserved by the Hebrews, and that it occurs in the sacred writings under the name of borith" (Beckmann's Hist. of Inventions, p. 97). The powerful cleansing properties of this borith or soap are employed by the prophet Malachi as a figure, under which to represent the prospective results of Messiah's appearance. Mal. iii. 2; an internal purification, somewhat corresponding to this external one, should thereby be accomplished among men. The shining whiteness also of the cloth that had been subjected to the purifying process is referred to by St. Mark, when he says of our Lord's garments on the mount of transfiguration, that they became white, "so as no fuller on earth could whiten them," ch. iv. 3.

FULLER'S FIELD. Some well-known ground, in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem, twice incidentally referred to in Old Testament scripture, 2 Ki. xiv. 17; Is. vi. 3; and each time spoken of as connected with a highway, and as near the conduit of the upper pool. Its position is not more nearly defined. There was a fuller's well (see EX-BOGEL) on the southeast of the city, where, it would seem, the fullers were wont to carry on their trade. But this lay down in the valley of Hinnom; and it may be doubted whether it corresponds to the description given in the passage from Kings, where the ambassadors of the king of Assyria are represented as "coming up" to that point, and speaking from thence to the people on the walls of Jerusalem. It may have been so, though nothing can be positively affirmed on the subject.

FURLONG. The rendering in our Bibles of σταδίων, or stadion, which was the eighth of a Roman mile, and equal to about 292 yards English. (See MEASURES.)
GAAL [boasting, rejection], the son of one Eled, who appears to have resided, if not in Shechem, yet in its immediate neighbourhood, and to have been of some note there. Gaal, his son, took advantage of the discontent that after a short period began to spring up against Abimelech, and emboldened the people to throw off his yoke. He came over, it is said, with his brethren and won the Shechemites to his confidence, so that when at the close of the vintage-season the people held a feast in the house of their god Baal-berith, and became inflamed with wine, they cursed Abimelech, and made Gaal their leader. The inhabitants of Shechem it is evident were at this time to a large extent idolaters; and the majority of them would seem to have been, not Israelites, but descendants of the ancient Canaanites. Hence Gaal, who himself appears to have been of the same stock, wrought upon their national feelings, and concerted them to cast off the authority of the upstart Abimelech, and fall back upon the family of the original lord of the place, "Herod, the father of Shechem," Jn. x. 26. In short, the revolt of Gaal seems to have been an attempt on a limited scale to get rid of the Israelish ascendancy, by stirring up the old Canaanish spirit of nationality, and for the purpose of raising it the more, pointing to the wrongs and oppressions that had been practised by the usurpator son of Gideon. The attempt however failed; the party of Gaal was defeated by Abimelech, and his retreat into Shechem was cut off by Zcezai, the other whom Abimelech had left in charge of the place. Whither he fled, or what ultimately became of him, we are not told; but the Shechemite revolt which he had headed only issued in the destruction of the Canaanite interest in the place; for the people themselves who adhered to Gaal, and the stronghold of their god, were burned to ashes, Jn. x. 40.

GAASH [shaking, earthquake], a particular hill in the range of Mount Ephraim, on the north side of which Josua died and was buried. It does not occur again except in connection with one of David's valiant men, who is said to have been of the brooks of Gaash, 2Sa. xxiii. 30, 1 Ch. ml. 32.

GABBATHA, the Hebrew or Aramitic term for what in Greek was called ἡ ἀπόστασις, the Pavement, It comes into notice as the precise place in which, according to St. John, Pilate gave formal sentence against Jesus, Jn. xix. 13. The Hebrew word does not exactly correspond in import with the Greek, and points rather to the raised or elevated character of the place in question, than to the nature or appearance of the floor. From ἡ αποστάσις, back, or as some think from ἄποστασις, to be high, the term ἡ ἀπόστασις is understood to have meant ridge or elevation, such as a judge might ascend for the purpose of hearing a cause or pronouncing a decision. That it was of this nature seems plain from the words of the evangelist, "When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought forth Jesus, and sat down in the judgment-seat, in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha." It was manifestly close to the praetorium, probably in front of it, and from having an ornamental or mosaic floor was called emphatically the Pavement. Platforms with such a pavement might very naturally become common with Roman commanders, since Julius Caesar was wont to carry about with him pieces of marble ready fitted, that they might be laid down in the praetorium wherever he encamped (see, Jul. Cos. e. 40. Josephus does not mention the place before us by name, but he gives instances of Pilate and other Roman governors seating their lives for judgment in public before the praetorium or in the market place (Wars, ii, 2, 14)."

GABRIEL [hero of God, or God's mighty one], the name assumed by an angel, who was charged with communicating important messages, first to Daniel, ch. viii. 16; ix. 21, and then at the commencement of the gospel era to Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, and the Virgin Mary, L. i. 26. The chief peculiarity in the case is that any name should have been assumed by a messenger from the upper sanctuary, than simply coming to disclose the mind of God to his servants on earth, or revealing to them things to come. It arose, however, from the circumstances of the time, as compared with the nature of the messages conveyed—the one being peculiarly dark and depressing, the other giving indication of things singularly great and wonderful, such as at any time would have put faith to the stretch, and might almost have seemed to press its expectations, when delivered in a season of gloom and discouragement. In these circumstances it was well fitted to reassure the heart of faith that the messenger who brought the tidings of coming good was not only an angel of God, but an angel whose very name bore impressed on it the might and energy of Godhead. The appearance of such an one on the field of action carried with it a pledge that higher forces than those of nature should now be called into play, and that nothing utter respecting God's purposes should be found too hard to be accomplished. I viewed in this light, which is the one the Scripture narrative itself suggests, the designation of the angel in question by the name of Gabriel receives a quite natural explanation. When the visions recorded in Da. viii. and ix. were given to Daniel, everything was at the lowest ebb with the kingdom of God; it seemed as if worldly elements were allowed to ferment and work at will in the affairs of men, and the interests of the covenant were to be lost, sight of amid the struggles and projects of the great earthly kingdoms which were contending for the mastery. How cheering at such a time to learn from the God-empowered hero of the heavenly hosts, that these outward movements were but the striving of the potsherds of the earth, which should soon come to nought, while God's purpose to restore the covenant-people, to establish for ever the covenant itself, and through Messiah the Prince set all on a firm and immovable footing, was definitely fixed and settled! So, too, at the commencement of the gospel era, however general the expectation was of a coming deliverance, as regards the kind of deliverance that behoved to be accomplished and the means necessary to accomplish it, so far from there being any proper faith beforehand, the main difficulty was to get men to believe when the purpose of God was declared, and the operations of his hand were before their eyes. "Whereby shall I know it?" was Zechariah's ready question of doubt the moment he heard of the first, and comparatively one of the least wonderful, steps in the process. The affairs of the sacred commonwealth had been so long depressed, it had altogether assumed so much the aspect of a tributary worldly kingdom, and the interests of the house of David, in particular, had fallen into such deceptival and oblivion, that the things which the purpose of God required to be done, had not so much as entered the minds of men to conceive. Most fit was it, therefore, that they should have their first announcement from the lips of a Gabriel, who, as the representative and bearer of God's might, could inspire confidence in the certainty of what was to be brought to pass. The temporary visitation of dumness inflicted on Zechariah, was a clear sign that he had at command what his name importeth.

For the Jewish families regarding Gabriel, and the other so-called archangels, see under Angels. GAD [גַּד]. 1. A son of Jacob, born to him by Zilpah, the maid of Leah, and the head of one of the twelve tribes. Of God as an individual he knew nothing, except what was written of him in common with the other sons of Jacob. Along with them we are to understand that he took part in the transactions connected with the selling of Joseph into Egypt, and the later transactions which led to the settlement of the whole family of Jacob in that land of temporary protection and support. At the time of the exodus the tribe numbered 45,600 men of twenty years old and upwards; and along with Reuben and Manasseh they had large possessions in sheep and cattle, which led to the ultimate settlement in the land which, on the east of Jordan. The play upon the name in the blessing pronounced upon Gad by Jacob: "Gad, troops shall cut in upon him, but he shall cut the heel" (such is the literal rendering of Ge, xlix. 19), indicates something of a valiant, resolute, and courageous spirit as characteristic of the tribe—such as might well provoke attacks from hostile neighbors, but only to be met by determined resistance, or followed up with successful reprisals. And the fuller blessing pronounced by Moses speaks yet more decidedly in the same strain. "Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lion, and turneth the arm with the crown of the head." (v. 20). The meaning seems to be, that the tribe had displayed lion-like courage and energy in the conflicts that had been held with the former possessors of Gilgal; and now that a large portion of the conquered country was to be occupied by this tribe, it bade fair for maintaining its ground, and even enlarging its possessions. The members of it required such qualities; for their position in the land of Gilgal peculiarly exposed them to assaults from the wandering Arabs. But they kept their ground against these, and it would appear somewhat encroached upon the neighboring tribe of Manasseh; for they are mentioned in 1 Ch. v. 11, as having extended their dwellings as far as Salem, which had originally been assigned to Manasseh, in v. 15. Beyond this general activity, however, and pushing energy, which seemed to have characterized the tribe of Gad, nothing remarkable is noticed respecting them in sacred history. The tribe furnished no judge, ruler, or prophet, as far as we know, to take a distinguished and prominent place in the affairs of the covenant; and it is but too probable that their distance from the centre of worship operated unfavorably on the tone and temper of their minds in a religious point of view.

2. Gad was the name also of a prophet in the time of David, but whose birthplace and lineage are left altogether unnoticed. He is first mentioned in connection with the persecutions of David, during which he gave David the advice to remove from the hold of Adullam, and get into the land of Judah, 2 Sa. xxii. 1. He must therefore have been among the first who attached themselves to the person and cause of David, and in all probability had become acquainted with David in the course of those visits which in early life he paid to Samuel and the schools of the prophets. As God's connection with David began early, so it continued through life. He is called "David's seer," as being much about him, 1 ch. xx. 5; and was the medium of the divine communication to David in one of the latest public transactions of his reign, when three forms of chastisement were proposed to him, that he might choose which should be administered to him and his people for their backsliding, 2 Sa. xxv. 11. Gad is also mentioned as one of those seers who wrote accounts of the transactions of David's time, 1 ch. xxix. 29; but whether his narrative has been engrossed in the histories that have come down to us of that period, or has been altogether lost, we have not sufficient materials for determining.

GADARA. GADARENES. Gadara is not explicitly mentioned in the gospel narrative; but there can be no doubt that it is the country of the Gadarenes, where one of our Lord's most remarkable miracles was wrought, Mt. vi. 1. To suppose this to be the correct reading. In the corresponding passage of St. Matthew's gospel, ch. viii. 28, the received text has Gergesenes, instead of Gadarenes; but, as four of the older MSS., including the Vatican B, read Gadarens, Tischendorf and several of the later critics have adopted this as the proper reading. The same authorities, however, have substituted Gerasenes in the gospels of Mark and Luke, and it is very probable that there were from the first two names applied to the locality—the one more specific and the other more general. (St. Germain). Supposing the country of the Gadarenes to be the name given to the region in St. Matthew's gospel, then Gadara must have been the place from which the name was derived. Its position was to the south-east of the lake. It was sixty stadia, or nearly eight Roman miles, from the town of Tiberias, and is spoken of by Josephus as the capital of the district called Peræa (Wars, ii. 7.3). It stood on an elevation, was well fortified, and is even called by Polybius the strongest city in these parts (v. 71). After having been destroyed during the wars which the Jews had to wage with the Syrian kings, it was restored by Pompey at the suit of one of his freedmen, Demetrius, a native of the place (Jos. Wars, i. 7.7); and it was added by Cæsar Augustus to the dominions of Herod, along with Hippos and Samaria, as a special token of favour on account of Herod's loyalty and munificence (Jos. Wars, i. 7.7). It was, however, a Greek town rather than a Jewish city; and after Herod's death it was on that account assigned to the prefecture of Syria. Yet that there must have been a considerable Jewish population in it is evident from its having, Gaulus, an early convert, residing at Corinth, and Paul's host there the time the epistle to the Romans was written, ch. vii. 23; but mentioned elsewhere as a man of Macedon, Acts xix. 29, who had gone with Paul from Greece to Asia, and was with him at Ephesus, when the uproar broke out respecting the worship of Diana. There was another Gaulus, however, who was also a convert and companion of Paul in travel, called Gaulus of Perse, Acts xx. 4. But we know nothing further of either of these district which then formed a district which then formed part of the Roman empire.

GALATIA, a district of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia and Phrygia, on the east by Pontus, and on the south and west by Cappadocia and Phrygia. It was traversed in its eastern portion by the river Halys, and, though hilly, abounded in tracts of fertile country. Originally a portion of ancient Phrygia, it received its name from a detachment of these vestiges which, under the conduct of Biamus, in the third century before Christ, left their native country Gaul, and spread themselves over the northern parts of Italy and Greece.

The word Galatians, which is the same as Galatia, indicates the Celtic origin of these tribes. On their arrival at Phrygia, disputes took place among the chiefs, and a considerable body, after traversing Thrace, settled near Byzantium, where they became the scourge of the surrounding country. Attracted at length by the rich plains of Bithynia, and the offers of Nicias I., the king of that country, who was anxious to secure their assistance in the civil wars by which he was harassed, they crossed the Bosphorus, and at once established themselves in Asia Minor. By, though in number, it is said, only 29,999, such was their activity and skill in war that they speedily overran the peninsula, which they divided among their three tribes, the Trocmi, the Tectosages, and the Taurisci. Without any fixed territory they supported themselves partly by predatory excursions and partly by engaging as mercenaries in foreign wars. At length their expeditions became insupportable, and the neighbouring kings took up arms against them. The Tectosages first suffered a severe defeat at the hands of Antiochus I., king of Syria, who was hence called Sabir, or saviour. Attalus, king of Pergamum, gained a victory over the other two tribes. They still, however, remained the terror of Asia, until, siding with Antiochus at Magnesia, they brought upon themselves the power of the Roman empire. In the year B.C. 189 the coastal Cn. Manlius, assisted by Eumenes, king of Pergamum, marched against them, and after two sanguinary battles succeeded in reducing them to dependence, and continuing them in Asia Minor. For a long time was known by the name of Galatia. At first they were governed by four tetarchies, which were afterwards reduced to one, in favour of Didymus, the freedman and partizan of Pompey, whose fall he shared. To part of the dominions of Bithynia Amynus succeeded; and on the death of the latter, A.D. 26, the Romans assumed the direct government of Galatia, and made it a province.

The Taurisci came from the country near Teutoburg, and after the lapse of centuries, Jerome (c. 400 A.D.) discovered an affinity between the language of Galatia and that spoken at Teucra. From their admixture, however, with the native population, the immigrants became familiar with the Greek tongue; and hence the inhabitants received the name of Galatians. Ancient writers make mention of three principal towns in this district: Ancyra, the metropolis, which still exists under the name of Angora or Angara; Pessinus, and Tavium: the latter were commercially important. Large numbers of Jews frequented the province for the purposes of trade. The Galatians, as portrayed by
St. Paul in his epistle to them, seems to have retained strong traces of that impassible and fickle character which history ascribes to the Celtic tribes, and which is still visible in the nations that have sprung from them (see Strabo, 12, 350-2; Lec. 36, 16, 19; 2 Mac. iii. 29; Crozer, Asia Minor, 2, 91; Winer, Riedmüller, c. c.).

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. One of the lesser, but most important epistles of the great apostle of the Gentiles, written probably soon after his second visit to Galatia, recorded in Ac. xviii. 23.

Gentleness.—This epistle bears so unmistakably the impress of the apostle's mind and style, and its contents tally so closely, yet naturally, with the history of the book of Acts, that its gentleness has never been doubted. It is one of the few which the relentless scepticism of German criticism has not as yet ventured to assail; for Bruno Bauer's attempt (Bcin, 1830), to prove that it is a compilation of later times from the epistles to the Romans and Corinthians, has received the merited condemnation even of rationalistic interpreters. External testimony, though not in the earliest age very distinct, is also, in the absence of anything on the other side, decisive. Apparent allusions in the apostolical fathers are the following:—Clemens Rom. (c. xvi. 1), Christ gave his blood for us by the will of God;—comp. Gal. 1.4; Ignatius (Ep. ad Phil. 1.1), Your bishop did not receive his ministry from himself, or from man, but through the love of Jesus Christ, and of God the Father, who raised him from the dead;—see Gal. i. 1. Polycarp (Ep. ad Phil. 1.12), Who are about to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in his Father, who raised him from the dead;—comp. Gal. 1.6. Justin Martyr, or whoever was the author of the Aed. Grec., in his works, quotes Ga. iv. 12, 'Ye ye as I am, for I (was) as you.' With Irenæus the evidence becomes express. 'Paul the apostle,' that elder writes (c. Hier. ii. 8, 45, 36), 'saying, for if ye served them which were no gods, now knowing God, or rather known of him, distinguishes false deities from the true God,'—Ga. iv. 8, 9.

So Clemens Alex., Wherefore Paul to the Galatians says, 'My little children, of whom I travail in birth.'—Ac. (Stron. 1.11; comp. Gal. iv. 19.)

After this date the references become as numerous as they are to other portions of the New Testament.

Time and place of writing.—Upon these points different opinions have prevailed. We may dismiss as exploded the two extreme hypotheses—the first, that of Michaelis and Koppe, who regard the epistle as among the earliest of St. Paul; the second, that of Schrader and others, who rank it among the latest—the former defending the authenticity of the subscription importing that it 'was written from Rome,' which the best critics pronounce spurious. The determination of the question partly depends upon the number of visits which St. Paul may be supposed to have paid to Galatia. The advocates of a date earlier than A.D. 50 suppose that the persons addressed under the name of Galatians were not the inhabitants of Galatia proper, but of Lystra and Derbe, Ac. xv. 6, since among the seven districts into which Asia Minor was divided by the Romans the name of Lycaonia does not occur; the latter therefore, with its cities of Derbe and Lystra, must have been included in the province of Galatia, as indeed Pliny (ii. x. 27), makes it a part thereof. It is urged, in addition, that while papions data imply the founding of the Lycaonian churches, the first mention of Galatia, Ac. xv. 6, is merely to the effect that St. Paul passed through that country. On these grounds Paulus, Ulrich (stud. und. krit. 1850), Böttger, and others, hold that under the term παλαιάς, "the region round about," Ac. xvi. 8, Galatia must be included; and therefore they put back the composition of the epistle to a date anterior to the apostolic council, Ac. xv. Plausible as this hypothesis is, it rests upon insufficient grounds. It is certain that Luke did not follow the Roman division into provinces (which, moreover, was frequently changed), because he specially mentions Lycaonia, which was no province, and distinguishes it from Galatia. And as to the latter point, no valid inferences can be drawn from the comparative silence of the inspired history upon the details of St. Paul's labours in particular places; his journey to Crete, e.g., is nowhere recorded. There seems therefore no reason to depart from the common opinion that the apostle's first visit is recorded in Ac. xvi. 6; and consequently the epistle must have been written subsequently to the council, Ac. xv., or A.D. 50. With this, the references in the epistle itself best agree. The visit to Jerusalem alluded to in ch. ii. 1-19, is, on the best grounds, supposed to be identical with that of Ac. xx.; and the apostle speaks of it as a thing of the past. The second visit of St. Paul is mentioned in Ac. xviii. 23; and the expressions of the epistle (c. 1.9; iv. 30) point also to this as a thing of the past. If with these data we couple the plain inference from the expression in Ga. i. 6, οὖν ἔρχεται, that no long time had elapsed since their conversion, we shall be led to place the writing of the epistle no later than the commencement of St. Paul's prolonged stay at Ephesus, Ac. xix., or about A.D. 55. From the similarity between our epistle and that to the Romans, it has been supposed by some (Combe and Horne Stac. Anti. Ac.), to have been written at the same time, viz. at Corinth, about A.D. 57; but for the foregoing reason this is improbable. The order of things then was probably as follows:—At his first visit St. Paul experienced a most favourable reception from the Galatians, who exhibited a strong personal attachment to him, Ga. i. 13. After his departure the judicializing teachers commenced their work; and on the apostle's second visit he found the noxious influence taking effect. During his short journey he endeavoured by oral instruction to counteract the evil; but learning after his departure to Ephesus that his converts were again lapsing from the faith, under deep emotion of mind he addressed this fervent epistle to them.

Occasion of the epistle.—This lies on the surface of it. Of all the epistles of St. Paul it discovers most clearly the sentiments of that judicializing party which with such inveterate hostility pursued the apostle, and endeavoured to mar his work. Undeterred by the decisions of the council of Jerusalem, they trespassed the Christian world, teaching not only that the Mosaic law might, without prejudice to the gospel, be observed by born Jews, but that in all cases it was indispensable to salvation. St. Paul himself, as appears from Ac. xxi. 25, when among Jews, observed the legal ordinances, but only on the ground of expediency; no sooner was it attempted to impose them as a yoke upon Christians, either of Jewish or Gentile origin, than the attempt met with his determined opposition, even to the withstand:ing a brother apostle to the face, Ga. ii. 11. Naturally the J udaeans regarded him as their principal antagonist, and part of their tactics consisted in insinuating doubts respecting the validity of his apostolic with God. It is the same faith which saves, and which distinguishes, all the spiritual descendants of Abraham. To be of the law is to misunderstand the curse; a curse from which Christ alone by his death has relieved us, ch. 3:17. The question may be asked, Why then was the law promulgated, seeing it could never give life? Answer—It never was intended to give life; it was introduced between the original promise to Abraham and the coming of Christ, for special purposes, viz. to curb the outbreaks of a sinful nature, especially the sin of idolatry, and by means of its inward discipline and its ritual to prepare the way for the reception of Christ.

Now that Christ has come, its function has ceased, ch. iii. 22-24. As emancipated by Christ from the yoke of legal bondage, let them jealously guard their Christian liberty, ch. iv. 1-10. Their present tendency to legalism, contrasted with their former zeal for the purity of the gospel, made him almost doubt whether they did not need a second regeneration. They made much of the law; let them listen to it. In the history of Sarah and Hagar, ch. xvi. the son of the free-woman supercing, as rightful heir, the son of the bond-woman, they had a divinely intended illustration of the inferiority of the law to the gospel, ch. xii. 20-23. To sum up, if they underwent circumcision, as a mere covering to salvation, they would thereby open dissolute their connection with Christ and the blessings of his salvation—in whom no outward distinctions of any avail, but "faith which worketh by love," ch. v. 12.

This leads to the third and practical portion of the epistle, in which the apostle admonishes the Galatians against a licentious abuse of the Christian liberty which was their birthright. If they were really led by the Spirit, they would necessarily abate in the fruits of the Spirit, in their two great divisions of personal purity and Christian love, chs. v. 5-26, vi. 1-18. As a proof of the intense interest which he felt in them, he mentions the unusual circumstance that he had written the epistle with his own hand; and concludes with a brief repetition of the doctrinal points upon which he had laboured, ch. vi. 19-23.

This epistle has been often commented upon. Luther's work was one of the main instruments of promoting the Reformation; and in this point of view it still retains its value. He drew much from Augustine's commentary, the most valuable of the patristic remains upon this subject. The doctrinal tendencies of the great writers of the Eastern church, such as Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, &c., render their labours less valuable. Among modern critical commentaries may be mentioned—Winer (1824), Profess (Holder, 1831), Racette (Leips. 1852), Usteri (Zurich, 1837), and others. Romerstein, 1841, Meyer (1853), Alfred (1857), Elliott (1859). [C. A. E.]

GALBANUM [GÇ¥·ëèë²ìëš, Greek, χαλβάνη, 172].

Ex xxxi. This was one of the ingredients used in composting the sacred incense. Of the gum galbanum of pharmacy and commerce, two specimens now lie before us—the one a gray and dirty conglomerate, full of sand and impurities; the other evidently collected with care, and probably obtained by tapping or sacrificing the plant which yields it. With its resinous fracture, its colour varying from a transparent gray to white or brownish yellow, there is not much to distinguish it at first sight from the crude state of other gum-resins; but a scent similar to that which we know so well in frankincense, angelica, and kindred plants, at once suggests its umbilicated origin.
the paved pattern in which the tiny flowers are arranged, every one is familiar (see the figure, article GALEED; but to vegetable chemistry there is no order which at first sight offers so many anomalies and curiosities. The roots of the parsnip and carrot are popular condiments; the root of a species of Nasturtium yields the horrible drug asafetida. The juice of rhubarb, comfrey, and water-hemp (Cassia, Cicuta, and Eranthis) is deadly poison; pickled saffron and candied angelica are regarded as delicacies; the seeds of the caraway and cumin are extensively employed as condiments; innumerable dishes are flavoured or garnished with parsley; and in Tiberias, Dr. Falconer tells us, that the young shoots of the asafetida plant are cultivated as a relish (Georgian Transactions, vol. xx, p. 280). All these and other anomalies are owing to the presence or absence in different parts of the plant of certain principles, such as the alkaline conia in hemlock, an aromatic oil in caraway and coriander, and a gum-resin, such as is found in the stem of the fennel and the roots of the asafetida. Such a gum-resin is galbanum. There seems no reason to doubt that it is an exudation from the Galbanum officinale of Don, a plant which occurs along the eastern coast of Africa; although a gum not unlike it is obtained from the Oospuma Gutterifera of Lindley. According to our standard of smell, its colour is by no means agreeable. But we must remember that it was not used except in combination with other fragrant substances; and when so used, Dioscorides says that it enhanced their efficacy. (see Kiihne or Ex. xxx. 11.)

GALEED [heap of ruins], the name given by Jacob to the sort of cairn, or heap of stones, raised by him and Laban on Mount Gilgal, in commemoration of their brotherly covenant. (Gen. xxxii. 18.)

GALEEL, COUNTRY OF. The northernmost of the three parts into which the Holy Land was divided in our Lord's time. Its name is derived from the Hebrew word גַּלֶל (galel), which as a noun signifies anything circular, such as a ring, Ex. ii. 6; Gen. xiv. 14, then a circuit or region of country, and specifically the region indicated above, or some part of it, Jos. xx. 7; Josh. xvi. 11; Ps. xli. 1. The limits of Galilee varied at different times. Its northern boundaries were the mountains of Hermon and Lebanon, where it adjoints Cæc-Syria and "the coasts of Tyre and Sidon." On the east it was divided by the Jordan and the lakes of Menah and Gennesaret from Gaulanitis, Hippea, and Gadesara, and the rest of the Batanean territory. Its southern border ran from Scythopolis (Bethshan, through Ginaa, Jenin (Heb. Engannim, Jos. xxii. 21, or Beth-Can, 2 Ki. ii. 27, translated in Eng. ver. jenae-house) to Mount Carmel. On the west it was separated from the Mediterranean by the narrow strip of the maritime plain of Phœnicia. It occupied the ancient territory of the tribes of Zebulon, Issachar, and Naphtali, with the northern settlement of Dan; and at one time comprised part of Asher, from Carmel to the Ladder of Tyre, which was in Roman times assigned to Phœnicia. At one time it was divided into two districts, Upper and Lower Galilee, of which Josephus (Bell. Jud. ii. 14, 2, 1) says, that "the Upper extends in length from Tiberias to Zabulon, having in the maritime parts Poenas for its neighbour. Its breadth is from the village called Xabath, which lies in the great plain, and as such is Sabae; from this also begins to be taken the breadth of the Upper Galilee as far as the village Racah, which divides the land of the Tyrians from it. Its length is also from Mephat to Tholin, a village near to Jordan." Upper Galilee was sometimes called Gaulitis, the Gentiles on account of the mixed races by which it was inhabited, hence the terms of the prophecy in Isaiah ix. 1, 2 which are freely rendered by St. Matthew, ch. ix. 14, 15, and applied to the ministry of our Lord, after he went to reside at Capernam—"The land of Zabulon and the land of Naphtali, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilean of the Gentiles; the people which sat in darkness saw great light, &c." That is, the inhabitants of Upper Galilee in Zabulon and Naphtali, on the shores of the lake, and even those beyond Jordan, were illuminated by the Light of the world dwelling at Capernam. The region above all others characterized by its spiritual darkness and depression was the first to partake of the glory of the new dispensation. The rabbinists divide Galilee into three parts—upper, middle, and the valley.

The modern traveler who approaches Galilee from southern Palestine by way of Nazareth, descends from the hills of Samaria upon the frontier town of Jenin. In this neighbourhood was probably the scene of the cleansing of the ten lepers, Luke x. 13, as described in taking place while our Lord was travelling from Galilee to Jerusalem through the inhabited (i.e., the border-land) of Samaria and Galilee. Dean Trench (Notes on the Miracles, p. 222) supposes that our Lord, avoiding the unfriendly land of the Samaritans, was journeying due eastward toward the Jordan, having Galilee on his left and Samaria which is therefore first named on his right, "and on reaching the river, either passed over it at Scythopolis, where we know there was a bridge, or crossing the river by the ford near Jericho, or kept on the west of the bank till he reached that city, where we presently find him," Matt. xvii. 5.

From Jenin the road heads over the undulating valley of Jezreel, now called the plain of Esdron (see Jezreel), till towards its northern extremity the hill-country of Lower Galilee appears in full view. Tabor is on the right, and the traditional Mount of Precipitation on the left. On leaving the plain, the road descends through the mountains to Nazareth, which is built on the steep southern slopes of one of the latter hills that surround it on all sides. From thence, between the northern side of Tabor and Kefr Kenna, one of the supposed sites of Cana of Galilee, the road lies over rugged hills to the deep basin of the lake of Tiberias. The scenery of Upper Galilee is hollower and at the same time richer than that of southern Palestine, and the dreariness as of a blighted country less conspicuous. It is now thinly populated, but abounds in forests of oaks and other trees. Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 223) suggests that the prophecy of Jacob, ch. xiii. 1-2, should be translated, Naphtali is a spreading tercbeth, he putteth out goodly leaves; and quotes Van de Velde's (ii. iv.) description of the country of Kedesh-Naphtali as a natural park of oaks and tercbeths.

The Galilean tribes are but little mentioned in early Jewish history, and were removed to Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser 20 years before Ephraim and 150 years before Judah. Henceforth the inhabitants were a mixed race of Jews and Gentiles, amongst whom Strabo enumerates Egyptians, Arabs, and Phrygians. They followed the fortunes of Judas in its subjection to the Babylonian, Persian, and Grecian empires successively, and afterwards formed part of the Macedonian and Idumean monarchies. Upon the death of Herod the Great, Galilee was assigned to Herod Antipas, who continued to govern it till his banishment in A.D. 39, six years after the crucifixion. Its inhabitants had then the reputation of being rude in speech, Matt. xxiii. 25, and manners, independent in thought, and warlike in disposition. Having afforded a safe retreat to the holy family on their return from Egypt, Galilee was well adapted to become the chief scene of our Lord's ministry, from its freedom from priesty and pharisaical prejudices, which in Judea constantly proved dangerous to his person as well as to his ministry. It was in truth the only part of Palestine in which it was at the time practicable for him to carry on his supernatural working, and lay the foundations of his kingdom. Herod Antipas was succeeded in Galilee by Herod Agrippa, the tetrarch of Trachonitis, who received the title of king, and two years later added Judea and Samaria to his dominions. On his death, A.D. 44, Galilee formed part of the Roman province of Syria, and was governed with the rest of Palestine by a procurator. At that time it was very populous, and contained 200 cities and towns, which together paid 200 talents in tribute to the Roman empire. Upon the outbreak of the Jewish rebellion, at the end of Nero's reign, Galilee was reduced by the Romans under Titus and Vespasian, about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem.

GALILEE, SEA OF, called also the LAKE OF TIBERIAS or the LAKE OF GENESEaret. Its Old Testament name is the "Sea of Chinnereth," from the town of Chinnereth on its banks, Jos. xiii. 31, or perhaps the town was named from the oval or lumpy-like shape of the lake—Kinnereth being the Hebrew word for a lump. The modern name is Bahr-Tabarich. It is the second of the three lakes into which the Jordan flows (Num. xii. 16). Its size is variously computed. Josephus (Wars, ii. 197), gives its length as 110 stadia or 65 miles, and its breadth as 10 stadia or 6 miles 5 furlongs. Dr. Robinson states it to be about 11½ geographical or 13 English miles long, and 5 or 6 miles broad. Its depression below the level of the Mediterranean is also the subject of much dispute. The results of trigonometrical observations have varied between 145 feet and 606 feet, but according to the trigonometrical survey of Lieut. Symonds, R.E., in 1841, its depression is only 328 feet. In this Van de Velde thinks there must have been some mistake; and he adheres to the figures of Lieut. Lynch, which give 655 feet, as probably the most accurate (Memoir, p. 138; 183). The surrounding hills are described as sometimes bare and barren, sometimes as green and fertile. The writer, who first saw the lake on the road from Nazareth to Tiberias in the latter part of the month of April, found the tops of the hills gray and rocky, and destitute of vegetation. Lower down, the grass, which during the winter rains had flourished, was now withering in the sun, Matt. x. 11; but in the valleys and ravines, wherever any of the many fountains and streams gushed forth, there was verdure and cultivation, Matt. x. 11. This view from the Nazareth road is one of unusual beauty.

THE SEA OF GALILEE AND ITS COASTS.
of rowers could have brought a boat to shore at any point along that coast. In a wind like that, the disciples must have been driven quite across to Gennesaret, as we know they were. To understand the causes of those sudden and violent tempests, we must remember the lake lies low—400 feet lower than the ocean; that the vast and naked plateau of the Jordan rise to a great height, spreading backwards to the hills of the Hauran, and upward to snowy Hermon; that the water-courses have cut out profound ravines and wild gorges, converging to the head of this lake, and that these act like gigantic fountains to draw down the cold winds from the mountains. “Moreover, these winds are not only violent, but they come down suddenly, and often when the sky is perfectly clear. I once went in to swim near the hot baths, and before I was aware, a wind came rushing over the cliffs with such force that it was with great difficulty I could regain the shore.” The town of Tiberias, toward which the Nazareth road rapidly descends, has never recovered from its destruction by an earthquake in 1837. It is now surrounded by a dilapidated wall, and consists of a number of miserable hovels which are scattered over its former site. The road along the western shores of the lake to Khan Minyeh, is hallowed at every step by associations with our Lord’s history. The country is thinly populated, almost desolate; the narrow strip of level land is covered with thickets of scrub and other shrubs. The hills are broken by a succession of narrow valleys watered with innumerable springs, and cultivated wherever a patch of malleable land is found. The lake itself abounds in many kinds of fish, but scarce a boat or fisherman is now seen upon it. At the village of Medjdl, the ancient Maghala, which is situated on the western shore of the lake, a little to the north of Tiberias, is an opening in the hills, which reveals here from the lake, and we come in full view of the fertile plain of Gennesaret. According to Josephus (Wars, iii. 108), it is 30 stadia or 33 miles long, and 20 stadia or nearly 21 broad. It is well watered by springs, of which the most noted is at the north-western side of the plain, and is called the Pool Fountain, from the circular basin of which it is inclosed. There is also An-el-tiny, or the Spring of the Fig-tree, near the ruined Khan Minyeh, to the north-east, where the hills again approach the lake, and form the northern boundary of the plain. Among these hills is a heap of ruins identified by Dr. Thomson with the site of Chorazin, and on the shore of the lake is Tell Hum, where the same traveller places Capernaum. Farther to the eastward is the confluence of the Jordan, which is here easily fordable, though its bed is rocky and uneven. On the left bank of the stream is the site of Bethsaida Julias, the city of Andrew and Peter, and in its neighbourhood is the plain of Batlah, the supposed scene of the miracle of feeding the five thousand. The country on the eastern side of the lake consists of steep and barren hills rising almost immediately from the water, intersected by narrow gorges, the beds of winter torrents. Opposite Maghala is Kerak, probably the ancient Gergesa (see Gergesenes). At the south-west corner of the lake is the outlet of the Jordan near Kerak, the ancient Terapha. It is thus described by Dr. Thomson, who is one of the few travellers who have visited this spot: “The源源不断 of fresh-water shells.” “The ruins of an ancient bridge partly choke up the exit and narrow it to about 100 feet in width at low water, and even there it was not more than 4 feet deep; the current however is very swift.” (The Land and the Book, p. 268.)

The whole scenery of the lake has a certain air of brightness and cheerfulness unknown elsewhere in Palestine; but the absence of human life in all this fertility of soil is most remarkable. Very different was its aspect in the days of our Lord’s ministry. Its hills, now bare, were then covered with vineyards, and abounded in walnut, fig, olive, and other trees (Josephus, Wars, iii. 108). Like Come, its shores were studded with towns and villages. Like Lucerne, its waters were a great highway, and brought the merchandise of Damascus to the south and the balm of Galilee to the west. It was also covered with numerous boats engaged in fishing or carrying passengers to and from the many villages on its borders. Tiberias, newly built by Herod the Great in honour of the Roman emperor, was the capital of his luxurious sea Antipates. Among its numerous inhabitants there was ample scope for the great Physician’s labours. There were the Galilean ill-doer, Jn. iv. 10; the Gentile centurion, Matt. viii. 5, the publicans, Matt. xix. 29, the women that were sinners, Luke, x. 37, the fishermen of the lake, Mark, i. 15, etc.—all collected in great numbers to witness his miracles and to hear his words. And while the waters of the lake were themselves the scene of some of those miracles, in particular of the stilling the tempest, Matt. viii. 26, and the miraculous draught of fishes, John xxiv. 19, the sower, Matt. xiii. 31, the Draw-net, Matt. xiii. When we read in Josephus of the mercenary disposition of the people in those days, and witness the same feature in the modern oriental character, from the Bedouins on his desert to the shepherd boy on the hills, we shall see the wisdom with which our Lord constantly aimed at its correction both by his example and his teaching. Again, the secluded region of the eastern shore afforded him solitude and rest from his labours, Mark x. 37, and opportunity for secret converse with his heavenly Father. “The lake, in this double aspect, is thus a reflex of that union of energy and rest, of active labour and of deep devotion, which is the essence of Christianity, as it was of the life of Him in whom that union was first taught and shown” (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 276). No wonder that after his resurrection he recalled his disciples to this well-known spot, so as to connect their future labours at Jerusalem and throughout the world with his own life in Galilee, xx. 21.

Of the towns on the shores of the lake it is unnecessary to speak more particularly here, as they have found distinct and separate mention elsewhere. (See Capernaum, Bethsaida, Magdala, Gergesenes, Tiberias, &c.) vipers" is manifestly but another name for the poison of Vipers. Mary, in the same way, Shakespeare connects it with the spiced soup—"You shall digest the venom of your spleen, Though it be but three."

GALL (Σανδάμονας, Greek), a poisonous plant, De xxix. 15, growing quickly and luxuriantly, Is. x. 4, of a bitter taste, Ps. xxvii. 13; L. iii. 3, and therefore coupled with wormwood, De xxvii. 17; L. iii. 19. So says Gesenius; but which of many possible plants it may have been, it is not easy to determine. In many instances popular names are to the botanist a source of confusion and perplexity. For example, our own word "nightshade" is sometimes given to a species of Solanum, sometimes to an Atropa, whilst the "enchancer's nightshade" is the Catharanthus Roseus. When we speak of "hemlock," we mean Conium maculatum; but in some localities it would rather suggest the "water-hemlock," or Cicuta virosa. We are therefore inclined to agree with Rossmüller (Beitr. zur Ephemer., 1861), that the name rokel may have been given to a variety of muskelemon plants, which cannot now be determined with absolute certainty. In Hose. x. 4, and Am. vi. 12, the English version is "hemlock," and Celsus renders it hemlock in all the passages where it occurs. Gesenius gives his verdict for the poppy, "so called from its heads," and we are surprised that a recent authority should state as an objection to this, that poppy-juice is not bitter. Poppy-seeds are not particularly narcotic, nor are they unpleasant; but surely opinion, or the juice obtained from the seed-vessels of the Poppaea

GALILEI, so called, mentioned twice, 1 Sa. xxvi. 41, Is. x. 39, and in the last passage in connection with other towns in the tribe of Benjamin; so it was probably a town of Benjamin. But no certain information or definite traces of it exist.

GALLIO (Gr. Γαλλίος), in Paul's time, the deputy or procurator of Achaia. His full name was L. Junius Annanus Gallio. Originally it had been Marcus Ann. Novatus; but on being adopted by the rhetorician Junius Gallio, he changed it into L. Junius Ann. Gallio. He was the brother of Seneca the philosopher, who refers to him in a preface to one of his works (De Nupt. Augustae), and addresses another to him (De Vita Beata). It is in the fourth book of the former of these productions, that Seneca more particularly notices the excellent qualities of his brother, and especially commends him for his intense dislike of flattery. So loveable was he in his general temper and bearing, that no one, Seneca declares, was so attractive to a single individual as he was to everybody (nemo mortali usu tam dulci est, quam hic combinavit). In this respect some allowance should, no doubt, be made for the partiality of brotherly affection; while on the other hand, such strong assertions made on purpose to meet the eye of the public, could scarcely have been hazarded without some solid foundation for them. There is certainly nothing at variance with them in the brief notice that is given of Gallio's behaviour in connection with the apostle at Corinth. The Jews, irritated by the success of Paul's labours, excited a tumult, and dragged him before the judgment-seat, under the charge of concerning men to worship God contrary to the law. But Gallio, with the emperor's authority, and one of his temper for which he is said to have been distinguished, discouraged their violent proceeding, and refused to entertain the question, as one which did not properly belong to his jurisdiction. He told them it was for other matters that he was called to do the part of a judge. As xxi. 12-17. It would appear that the Greeks who were present on the occasion, and some of whom doubtless felt personally interested in the matter, were greatly pleased at the repulse which the contentious Jews thus met with; and turning round on them, and determined to give them a practical lesson from the occasion, they made an assault on Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, in the very presence of the governor, while he looked on with indifference—probably thinking that a certain measure of casting was not undeserved. The result was, that the apostle was allowed to prosecute his labours undisturbed, and with growing success. The language employed by the sacred historian respecting Gallio implies, that he held the office of procurator of Achaea (Γαλλίος ἄρχων ἐν Αχαΐᾳ). The perfect accuracy of this designation, which at one time was questioned, is now beyond dis-pate. It was the senatorial provinces which were proselytized over by a proselytist; and Achaia, the usual name among the Romans for Greece as a province, was at that particular time in the hands of the senate.
Not long before, in the reign of Tiberius, the province at the request of the principal inhabitants, had been made over to the emperor (Tac. Ann. i. 50), but it was again restored to the senate by Claudius in A.D. 44—probably about seven or eight years before the time of Paul's visit (Suet. Claud. c. 25). The language of St.
Luke, therefore, is strictly accurate.

Little is known of the subsequent history of Galilee.
After the murder of his brother Seneca by Nero, he became alarmed for his own safety, and is represented by Tacitus as having made application for his life (Ant. x. 5). He does not say whether the suit was successful or not. The Chasids numbers him among the victims of Nero's cruelty; but by Jerome's account
he committed suicide (Euseb. eccl. hist. iv. 36).

GAMALIEL [begot of God], was an ancient name among the Jews, though it occurs only of one individual in the Old Testament. It was borne by the head of the tribe of Manasseh at the time of the exodus, Num. i. 39, 41; 2. 29. But it is chiefly thought of now as the name of the Jewish rabbi or teacher at whom Paul represents himself as having been brought up, Acts xxii. 3. A great many notices are found in the rabbinical writings of this man (see testim. hebr. Rab. Acts x. 51), from which it appears that he was held in the highest respect among his coun-yemen. He is there reported to have been the son of Rabbi Simeon, and the grandson of the famous Hillel;
and the son of the presidency of the sanhedrim at Jerusalem during the reign of Tiberius. Calvinists, and Claudianists; and to have survived the destruction of Jerusalem eighteen years. These accounts cannot be altogether relied on; but they may fairly be taken as evidence of the high place held by Gamaliel about the period of the gospel era among Jewish authorities.
In the same writings, the epithet of hebr. kaddish, the aged, or the elder, is frequently ascribed to him. There is a patriotic tradition of his having become a Christian, and received baptism from the apostles Peter and John; but it is entitled to no credit. On the one occasion on which he appears taking any part in connection with Christianity, it is not as an advocate of its claims, but as a man of moderation and prudence, restraining the intemperate zeal of his fellow-counsellors, and advising them to leave matters to the testing influence of time. His speech may certainly be regarded as indicating both a broader and a calmer view of the subject, than was taken by others around him; but it bespeaks no leaning toward Christianity itself. It had, however, the effect of saving the apostles from immediate violence, and in that point of view is to be regarded as among the means employed by God for shielding the infant cause of the gospel.
But men could not remain long in the neutral position of Gamaliel; and within a few years afterwards, the most noted representative of the school of Gamaliel, Saul of Tarsus, comes forth breathing threatenings and slaughter against the followers of Jesus.

GAMES [Aγαθη, Ludi]. This word does not occur in Scripture, though frequent reference is made to the things signified by it. Games may be divided into private and public. The first are such as are practised in private, and to which the public are not invited.

Of these the principal among the Jews were music and dancing, especially on occasions of festivity, such as weddings, the weaning of children, sheep-shearing, and the harvest-home. Our present article will not refer to these, but to public games, which the public were invited either to watch or to engage in. Indeed it was from their public character that their name among the Greeks was given them, the Agôn (Ἀγών) properly signifying a gathering or assembly of people.
The object of instituting public games was manifold.
They afforded recreation and amusement to the spectators, who eagerly anticipated their celebration, enjoyed them when they were being celebrated, and spoke of them when they were past. They were also generally intended to promote habits of agility, energetic action, and temperance among those who practised them, and thereby foster those qualities which tend to create a brave, hardy, and warlike nation. They were, too, almost invariably, bound up with the religion of the land where they were practised, being in heathen countries instituted in honour of the gods, or of deified men, and always beginning and closing with sacrifices to the gods. When conducted with temperance and modesty they were productive of great national advantages; but they were often, and especially in times of luxury and national decline, attended with circumstances which made the evil effects arising from them greater than the good. The Roman circuses, with its fights of savage beasts and gladiators, nourished a selfish and cruel spirit in those who come to feast their eyes on bloodshed and death.

Games do not occupy a prominent place in Jewish life. Some of the chief objects aimed at in the Greek and other games, were gained among the Hebrews by their three great national festivals—the passover, the feast of weeks, and the feast of tabernacles. At the recess of these festivals the nation was brought together in honour of the true God; and in times of religious feeling these great meetings were looked forward to and were celebrated with perhaps not less joy, though joy of a somewhat different kind, from that with which the Greeks looked forward to and celebrated their Olympic, Isthmian, and Nemean games. The public games of the Hebrews seem to have been exclusively connected with military sports and exercises, and even then these were few and brief. It was probably in this way that the Jewish youth were instructed in the use of the bow and of the sling, 1 Sam. xi. 20, 29; 28; 31;

3. 16; 1 Ch. xxii. 2. Allusion to what would seem to have been a kind of war-dance, such as we read of in different countries, seems to be made in 2 Sam. ii. 14, where Abner proposes that the young men should arise and "play" before the two armies. The Hebrew עָהל (shachol) for "play," is frequently used for dancing, 2 Sam. vi. 21; 20; 30; 31;
3. xxiv. 4; and Abner seems here to refer to a sport of this kind, not now to be used as an amusement, but turned into true reality. From the custom of lifting stones of certainous weight practised in his time by the Jewish youth, Jerome, concluding that a similar game was in use in earlier times, elucidates a difficult passage in Zec. xii. 3, in which the prophet compares Jerusalem to a burdensome or weighty stone which should crush all who attempted to raise and carry it. These were the only public games among the Hebrews until, in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, about B.C. 187, Jason made in consequence high-priest, introduced into Jerusalem the Grecian gymnasium, for the express purpose of training up the Jewish youth in the fashions of the heathen, 2 Mac iv. 8, 11. With many of the young men, and even with several of the priesthood, Jesus succeeded in gaining favour for his new games. But the plan of the nation regarded those proceedings with abhorrence. They could not approve of games celebrated in honour of false gods, and held for the wicked purpose of alienating their nation from Jehovah, 2 Mac. iv. 13-17. Accordingly the final expulsion of Syrian influence from Judea, and the triumph of the Macedonian princes, caused the extinction of these pagan games. There was no attempt to revive them until the time of Herod the Great. A foreigner by descent and in feeling, Herod made little account of the religious possessions of his people, and introduced as far as possible the ways and customs of heathen Greece and Rome. He built in Jerusalem a theatre, and a great amphitheatre in the plain, and celebrated in honour of Caesar every five years games of wrestling, chariot-racing, the contests of wild beasts with each other and with criminals, in the most costly manner (Joseph, Ant. xvii. c. 17). Those proceedings were deeply offensive to the religious feelings of the greater body of the nation. He afterwards established similar games at Gerasa (Ant. xv. c. 5). At a subsequent period his grandson, Herod Agrippa, established games of the same kind at Berytus (Ant. xix. v. 35).

The games and theatrical exhibitions of the heathen were regarded by the early Christians with as strong disapprobation as they were by the Jews generally, and for better reasons (Skeat's Church Hist. i. 254, sect. iii.) National antagonism to everything foreign as such had much effect in producing Jewish opposition to the games. It was as ministering in them by and by to their attendant circumstances to the lusts of the flesh and of the eye, as producing almost of necessity a cruel temper in the beholders, and running counter to the moral feeling, shame-facedness, and sobriety of the Christian character, that the public spectacles and games of the heathen were ranked among those pomps and vanities which the Christians were obliged to renounce by their baptismal vow. Even the better-minded among the heathen regarded these games with disapprobation. Pliny the consul speaks with approval of Junius-Mauritius, who expressed an earnest wish that they could be abolished at Rome (Pliny's Letters, iv. 22); nor does Tacitus appear to treat them with much greater respect (Hist. iii. 52). Several of them were however in themselves of an innocent character; and in these, and even others which were not of this kind, i.e., ii. 43, are frequently alluded to in the epistles of the New Testament, and afforded illustrations of the most appropriate kind of the Christian life, it will be of advantage to give a brief view of them before we turn to the passages of Scripture which they serve to illustrate.

The games of ancient Greece were the most celebrated in antiquity. It was in great measure after them that the games of other countries were copied, being sometimes introduced into those countries by Grecian colonists, as in Asia Minor, and in other cases imitated by foreigners. Rome added to the Greek example features of cruelty which were unknown in the original Grecian games; and there was one feature of difference between the Grecian and Roman games which rendered the former a much more fitting illustration of the Christian life than the latter were—namely, that in the Grecian games the most eminent men in the land came forward and contended personally for victory, while in Rome the most eminent men were merely spectators of the contests of their inferiors (ibid. iii. 52). Hence the Roman, Antichrist, and Grecian, Antichrist, were the kings, great warriors, and wise men of the Grecian states, deemed it an honour to contend for victory in their countries' games, and even old Nestor, the Homeric type of perfection in the qualities of mind and body, regretted that his years prevented him from joining in the glorious strife (Ibid. i. xiii. 11); but "a senator, or even a citizen, conscious of his dignity, would have blushed to expose his person or his horses in the circus of Rome." Hence the Grecian games were a far better illustration than the Roman of that Christian life where every one is called on to be both a spectator of the efforts of others and a partaker in them himself.

The more celebrated of the Grecian games were four in number—viz. the Olympic, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. The Olympic games were held in the territory of the Pisians, the Pythian near Delphi, the Nemean near a village of that name, and the Isthmian near the famous city of Corinth. The Olympic games were the last celebrated, and in describing these we describe the others, with certain differences of no great moment. They were celebrated only once every five years, and hence a period of five years was termed an Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who reckoned their time by periods of this length. In the later periods of Grecian history there were twelve presidents or judges chosen, for the purpose of deciding who had been the victors in the games celebrated before them, but until the fifth Olympiad there was but one person who occupied this most important and responsible office (Peter's Antiquities, ch. xxiii). These judges were obliged to meet together and to reside for a period of ten months before the celebration of the games (at a place called E'Apogeuon) in the Elean forum, in order that they should take care that those who would afterwards offer themselves as competitors at the games had duly performed their preparatory exercises, and were instructed in all the laws of the games by men called from this office "keepers of the laws." They were also, in order to inspire confidence in the competitors, obliged to take an oath that they would act impartially, would take no bribes, nor discover the reason why they rejected or approved of the contestants. They sat where they could exactly see all that took place on the part of the competitors, and the crown of victory was placed before them until the exercises were finished, when it was presented to whichever of the contestants they judged to have deserved it. To preserve order in the games there were officers (Eptaroi) appointed to correct such as were unlucky. Women were not at first permitted to be present at these games, but this law seems to have become at first neglected, and at length so entirely hid aside, that women sometimes contended in the games. All persons who intended to compete for the prize were obliged to repair for ten months previously to the public gymnasion at Elis, where they prepared themselves for the contest by continual prescribed exercises, which grew severer as the day of decision drew near. No one was permitted to enter the lists who had not submitted to this preparatory exercise, nor was any emission of it, for whatever reason, excused.
Temperance in every indulgence, and that of the strictest kind, was required during this period, as well as the bodily exercise in the particular games in which each intended to compete. Epictetus (Enhed. iii. xiv., quoted in Thomson's Greek Text, p. 20) graphically describes the temperance which such must exercise. He tells us that they must behave orderly, that they must eat by regular periods, and not after their own appetite; that they must abstain wholly from high-spirited meats; that they must use gymnastic exercises to an extreme, at the fixed time, in heat and cold; that they must not drink cold drink or wine on every occasion or opportunity—that they must, in fine, give themselves up to a directing physician, and thus prepared enter on the contest. Each competitor also, and his near relatives, were obliged to take an oath that they had not given no bribes to their antagonist, and would not by any sinister or unlawful means endeavour to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games. No criminal or impious person, or even any nearly related to such characters, was permitted to compete.

The exercises in use at these games were divided into the Pentathlon (Πενταθλόν, Ἐπιστάθλον) and the Pankration (Παναρτικόν). The former consisted of the five exercises of leaping, running, throwing the shot, darting, and wrestling, though instead of darting some writers mention boxing. The pankration consisted of the two exercises of wrestling and boxing. Horse-racing, generally with chariots attached, was also usual at the games. The exercise of leaping was sometimes performed with weights upon the heads or shoulders. The exercise of running (τρέχον) was in very great esteem among the ancient Greeks, and was one of the first practised by them. It was reckoned to be one of the most valuable qualifications of a warrior to be able to make a rapid onset on his enemy, and to be able to retreat quickly if occasion required. Homer constantly gives to Achilles the character of "the swift-footed," and David, speaking of the warlike character of Saul and Jonathan, joins the swiftness of the eagle to the strength of the lion, xxviii. 25. Hence the exercise of running was valued very highly in Greece, as necessary to the perfect warrior. The course (ενθάδα) was one hundred and twenty-five paces in length, and from this the name (ενθάδαθλον) was given to the runners. They frequently ran this twice, backward and forward. At other times they increased the distance to be run, and indeed this would seem to have varied according to the supposed strength of the runners. The longer courses required, in addition to agility, great strength and endurance. Sometimes, in proof of remarkable strength, the runners ran in armour. The contests were generally most severe, and whoever reached the goal first, even by the smallest distance, was adjudged the prize. As they approached the goal the efforts of the runners became more earnest. They then put forth the strength they had husbanded for the final effort, and the anxiety of the spectators was raised to the highest pitch as the various competitors, every nerve and muscle strained, each eye fixed on the goal, pressed on with their utmost speed. Throwing the quoit was another of the games. The quoit (δίκας) was a round plate, originally made of stone, but in later times made of brass, iron, lead, or wood. It had a hole in the middle for a leather strap to swing it by. This distinguishes the quoit from another similar instrument.

shoulder, and these being filled with plumes of feath and iron added feebly to the force of the blow. In order to be able to bear the blows thus inflicted, the body required to be fat, as well as unscarred and hairy. These were the principal exercises in use in the ancient games of Greece.

In process of time, however, other public games were introduced, and here Rome led the way. These were characterized by features of brutalit and cruelty, unknown to the Grecian games, and altogether opposed to the merciful spirit inculcated and engendered by the gospel of Jesus Christ. One of them was the fighting of wild beasts with one another. From every quarter to which the sway or influence of Rome extended, the powerful and ferocious beasts of the forest and the desert plain were gathered, and the lion and the tiger, the bear and the elephant, contended together to afford sport for the multitude assembled in the Roman amphitheatres. On other occasions these ferocious animals were brought out to fight with men. The latter were generally persons who had been condemned to death for various offences against the laws of the state. They were brought into the arena, and wild beasts, stirred up to madness by the shouts and light darts of the spectators, were let loose upon them to tear and wound them to death in a shocking manner. The assembled crowds looked on with savage delight as the condemned criminals were forced upon the stage, or torn by the claws of the beasts. But sometimes the men who fought with the wild beasts were men who, induced by hire, or from a fervency of disposition, offered themselves voluntarily to contend (admitting Roman custom). The fights of the gladiators with one another was also a common practice at Rome. It began a.p. 490, and increased to such a fearful extent, that on a single occasion, in honour of the triumph of the emperor Trajan over the Dacians, ten thousand gladiators fought for the amusement of the people. They were at first composed of captives or condemned malefactors; but afterwards, as the passion for blood grew stronger, free-born citizens, men of noble birth, and even women, fought after this fashion. The spectators betted on their favourite gladiators with much the same feelings as they betted on the favourite horses which ran before them in the circus.

We now return to the ancient Grecian games. When the day of the actual contest arrived, the judge (hyperephor) or judges sat in the appointed place, the spectators assembled, and the combatants came forward. A herald then called over their names, recited to them the laws of the game, encouraged them to exert all their powers, and exhorted them to prevent the contesting, and took an oath of themselves that they would strictly observe the laws of the game. In all the athletic exercises the combatants contended naked; the chariots of victory were openly exposed to their view, to inflame them with ardour, and the prodigious assembly, brought together from all the parts of Greece, looked on with eagerness at their contest, and applauded to the skies those who were victorious. When the judges had passed their solemn sentence, a public herald proclaimed aloud the name of the victor, and the crown was placed in his hands. Such as had obtained prizes at any of the games, but especially at the Olympic, were held in universal honour. The statues of the conquerors at these latter games were erected in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was celebrated with marks of the highest honour. They rode in a triumphal chariot into their city, not through one of its gates, but through the walls broken down to give them entrance, in toto, as Plutarch says, that that city had no need of walls which had such men to defend it. Painters and poets were employed to celebrate their names. Nor did their honours terminate with themselves. The city which had given them birth and education ranked higher than before on this account, and their parents were honoured for the merits of their sons. The victories obtained at the Olympic games form the subjects of some of the most beautiful odes of Pindar. Such is a brief account of those games, which are frequently alluded to in the epistles of the New Testament, and afforded some of the aptest illustrations of the sufferings and the trial of the Christian life. To these we will now turn our attention.

It is only in the writings of St. Paul that we find allusions to the games. This is just what we might expect. The other writers of the New Testament, with the exception of Luke, were Jews of Palestine, to whom these games were little if at all known. Paul was a man much better acquainted with the manners and customs of the world. Those whom he wrote to were generally at least, if not always as we think, persons to whom the customs of the games were familiar, and who had probably been cognizant of the preparations made for them, and witnesses of their performance.

The inhabitants of Greece, and Macedon, and Asia Minor were all acquainted with them, and any, the very faintest allusion to them, would be understood. It is quite possible, as Conybeare and Howson suppose (Conybeare and Howson’s St. Paul, ii. 31, 260), that St. Paul was at Ephesus when the annual contest in honour of Diana was being there celebrated, and at Corinth when its world-renowned games were going on, Acts xiii. xx.

To suppose that he was not present at these games as a voluntary spectator, is, in our opinion, quite inconsistent with the apostle’s character. That there was much in the games that a man of his good sense and broad views of things would not condemn, we are quite willing to admit; that there was much there too which must have been distasteful to him, we are equally sure. That his using them as an illustration true and graphic of the Christian life, affords any evidence of his approving of them as a whole, is scarcely worth a reply. Part of the games at Ephesus consisted in the savage combats of men with wild beasts, of which no humane person, Christian or heathen, could approve. Yet the apostle uses this as an illustration of his strife for his Master with men as fierce as the wild animals, just as readily as he illustrates the Christian life by the blows of the boxer, and the swiftness and endurance of the runner, 1 Cor. xv. 32. They afforded admirable illustrations, felt and understood by every one, and as such he used them. He referred not to the sports themselves either in praise or blame. He could not praise them as a whole without sanctioning much that was wicked, and untrue, and base; he could not condemn them in the same way without condemning much that was innocent and useful. And so he left the question untrammeled, for later times to institute manly and recreative games, which must be in accordance with the modesty, sobriety, mercy, and temperance of the Christian character. Such were not the games of his time, and he therefore could not praise them; such might be—such as are as recreative for the youth of a Christian nation—and we have no word of his to condemn such. Meanwhile he used the customs of his time to illustrate and enforce that Christian life which it was the whole aim of his own life and labours to produce and perfect with God’s Spirit working with him. They brought before him and before his readers great and glorious themes: the crown of unadulterated glory; the preparation for gaining it; the necessity for great, continued, and lawful struggle; the witnesses who look on to encourage the just, and righteous, and loving Judge, who crowns each victor in that struggle in which he himself by his own example taught them how to be victorious.

The illustrations of the Christian life are drawn by St. Paul from three only of the games—viz., from running, boxing, and the lights of men with wild beasts or gladiators. Those taken from running are the most frequent, that game being referred to distinctly in four passages, in three of which it is largely used in illustration, iv. Co. iv. 21-26; Phil. iii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 7; Heb. xi. 2. The passage of all others in which the life of the Christian is most fully illustrated by the games is the first of these three, and the Corinthian is the church to which such allusion is most frequently made, 1 Cor. iv. 21-25, x. 32. This was natural, as the Isthmian games, the most renowned in Greece after the Olympic, were celebrated in the neighbourhood of Corinth, and as the inhabitants of that city were greatly attached to them. The apostle Paul had been speaking in the context of 1 Co. xix. 24-26 of his own earnest efforts to gain men of every class to the gospel of his Master, and to be partaker with them of its blessing. This led him to enlarge on the nature of that life which they and he must live if they would have this hope sure and well-grounded:

"Know ye not," he says, "that they which run in a race run not all, but one receiveth the prize? So run that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest by any means when I have preached to others I myself should be a castaway."

There are here intermingled allusions to two exercises, running and boxing, but chiefly to the former: and in this beautiful passage the grand features of the games are seized by a master’s hand, and used at once to illustrate the real nature of the life in which he and all Christians are engaged, and to set forth by contrast the infinite superiority of that which the humblest Christian aims at and attains beyond which the noblest of the heathen contended for, and in which but few of them could possibly succeed. In the first verse the apostle brings forward the distinguishing features of the day of trial for the runners. We have ‘the race-course’ (στάδιον), a number of the swiftest men running (τάρατσα τρεχοντα), the prize (φθινόπιον), the one successful runner (εις δε λαμβανει το φθινόπιον). In these brief words we see the earnest eager efforts of many, striving with all their power, using every muscle of their body, husbanding their strength for the final effort, all having throughout the race one object, the prize, in view; and as the result, one man surpassing his competitors it might be by but a foot-length, he coming forward amid the shouts and plaudits of multitudes to receive the prize, while the remainder, though among the swiftest and most enduring of their country, turn taunted and disappointed away. They had all run well, some probably to a nearness as well as the victor: they had all probably deserved the prize, but there was only one prize, and by the laws of the game it had been adjudged to another. The games which Virgil describes so beautifully in the fifth book of his "Eclog" were exceptional, in which Jesus, from the promptings of his generosity, declares that every competitor shall receive a prize:

"Audite hec manibus, letasque ad crinita mentes, Recteque proficiscantur dulci melodie.
"So even victors;"

This was not a sample of the games of Greece. In them many ran, while only one received the prize. But this was not all. Surrounding the Grecian stadium were multitude who might and did wish for the distinctions of victory, but into whose minds it never entered to contend, because contention would for them be hopeless. The actual runners were as one to a thousand who would wish to wear a crown, but who would make no effort, because the very blindness of those who might have defeated them would have overtipped them. Of the runners might break some records of the Grecian and tens of thousands of the Grecian states a few only ran. From hence the apostle turns to draw the Christian lesson. It is, "No one that goeth obtains.

Here is at once a lesson taught to Christians by the games, and an intimation how much more blessed they were than the runners in them. "No one that goeth obtains" is well explained, not only by the laws of the games, but by another text of St. Paul, of a similar meaning and allusion. "If a man also strive for masteries, yet he is not crowned, except he strive lawfully," 2 Tim. iv. 5. There were in the games certain rules to be observed, and whoever did not observe these could not be victorious, no matter what strength or agility he had displayed. So for the heavenly prize there are certain rules laid down by God which every competitor must observe. If he neglect them, and choose other rules, either selected by himself or by other men, he cannot hope to succeed. And in this there could be no mistake or deceit. It was possible that a runner in the games might break some records and yet win. He might swear that he had observed them, and his deficiency might not be observed by human judges; but with the divine Judge there could be no mistake. While, however, there was an analogy, there was also a superiority. No matter how lawfully men had striven in the games, only one could be victories; in the Christian life all who strive lawfully assured of a crown. It was as though the herald at the games had proclaimed to assembled Greeks, Here is a game at which every one assembled may gain a crown, and its value shall be none the less because all shall be victors. Such is the proclamation of the gospel. To all it proclaims its crown: So even, and ye shall obtain - not one or two, or many, but all. An additional feature of great interest in the game of the runners is brought before us in 1 Thess. iii. 11. The interest in the game, both on the part of the spectators and the runners, increased as it progressed. It was not always the foremost in the beginning who was foremost at the end. It might be only a sign of insincerity to put forth strength at first, which might have been more properly kept for the final struggle. It was when a great part of the course had been passed that the runners would most earnestly regard the prize before them, measure the distance to be run, calculate their own strength, and then press on with all their might. A similar thing to this occurs in the Christian life when he is striving lawfully. As the crown is approached he presses on with fresh ardour to win and wear it. So it was with St. Paul: "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which were before, he pressed towards the mark (επισκοπή) for the prize of a heavenly calling in Christ Jesus." Other features of interest in the game of the runner are brought out in 2 Th. iv. 7, 8. We may imagine the joy and pride of the runner when he had finished his course and disposed victory in his favour, and could beyond any mischance the crown of his desire. This is beautifully brought out by St. Paul in the passage referred to. He was now at the very close of life. He looked back on years of struggle and difficulty, in which, through the grace of Christ, he had been more than conqueror. He had now but very little more "accounting, nothing more to do in a masterly way for his Master. He had but to bear his last testimony before the tyrant, hear his sentence, and die. He had all the marks for him who in life "did daily," 2 Tim. iv. 8. He felt as the runner who had made his last effort, and who stood, panting it might be, but flushed with victory and elated with joy, before the judge who had not yet placed the crown upon his brow: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course.

"I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." The interval between his victory and his crowning at the appearance of Christ seemed to him to be as the short time which elapsed between the victory of the runner in the games and his being crowned by the judge. We have here other features in the Christian life illustrated by the games. We saw that originally there was only one judge appointed to decide, but that afterwards the number was increased to twelve. The change was made lest any unfair partiality should be shown by the judge, which was sought to be avoided by an increase of number: a danger not always escaped even by this change (Istec-eriin Antiquities, xxvii). The original institution of a single judge illustrates the Christian course, where Christ is the only and one judge, because he is the "righteous Judge." It is shown again, in whose decision there is no error or partiality, and from which consequently there is no appeal. We have also illustrated the interval which elapsed in the Christian course between victory and crowning. There was a period when the runner in the games was an uncertain victor. It was after he had ceased to run, and while the judge deliberated on his claims, over the crown was placed in his hands. He was at rest, all his labour over; he was calm, for he was assured of victory; but he was also expectant till the sign of victory was actually given him, the sentence passed, his name pronounced, his crown given to him. How beautifully does this illustrate the Christian life! At death he ceases to strive, he is at perfect rest and peace, but he awaits still the closing scene, when the righteous Judge appears to crown him, and all like him, at the great day of his appearing, etc., etc.

The apostle only makes one brief reference to the game of boxing, and that seems introduced merely to add weight to the illustration just used from the game of running, for both illustrations evidently point to the same thing. In 1 Cor. ii. 26 we read, "Therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight, 1, not as one that beateth Vol. 1.
the air." The context, as well as the verse itself, show us its force. St. Paul was just comparing, not only the superiority of the Christian's crown over that of the games, while all Christians might win in their course, ver. 21. From this he takes occasion to say that, living as the Christian should do who looks for victory, he ran in such a way as that there was no uncertainty (ἀποφαίνομεν) as to the issue; he fought in such a way as could not resemble the boxer, who, striving as he might, often spent his strongest blows on the air, and not on his antagonist, and thus weakening himself to no purpose, exposed himself to the danger of defeat. The runner ran uncertain of success; the best-aimed blows of the boxer, missing their aim and falling on the air, weakened him, and put him in the power of his enemy: but the runner in the Christian life ran with the assurance of victory, and the Christian combatant could not spend his blows idly or to his own injury, as one in the games beating the air, but every effort faithfully and truly made would help to success in the great fight in which he was engaged. That St. Paul here speaks of the blows of the boxer engaged in actual fight, not of his private exercise by himself, is evident. For first, the words here spoken of are worse than useless, as they are a hindrance to success. The blows aimed at an antagonist and missing him are such: the blows in private exercise are useful and requisite to prepare for the fight. Again, it is of the actual running in the course on the day of trial that he is speaking throughout, and therefore it is also of the actual contest of the pugilists. We have an admirable description of the actual event of a boxer striking only the air and not his enemy, and of its injurious effects, in Virgil, Entellus aims a blow at Buceo, who avoids it, and then the poet tells us:

Entellus vices in ventum efficiat, et utris
Ipsa gravis gravitique al terma pudere vasto
Concidit.—(Aen. vi. 145.)

How admirably does this feature of one of the games show us as Christians our superiority! The best effort of the boxer might only endanger his success; every true effort of the Christian brings the final victory more nearly within his grasp; there is for him no such thing as idly beating the air.

The persecutions of Christians by their enemies, their danger to person and life from this source, are in three passages of the New Testament illustrated by the cruel game in which, at Rome, Ephesus, and elsewhere, men were brought forward on the arena to contend with wild beasts or gladiators, 1 Co. xii. 32; 1 Th. v. 31; 1 Th. v. 32. In the two former of these St. Paul refers to his own persecutions, or those of his fellow-apostles; in the last to the case of Christians generally when under grievous persecution. In the first of these passages he refers to an incident of his life at Ephesus, in order to show how foolish it were for him to endure what he did if he were not animated by the sure hope of the resurrection: "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantage had I if the dead rise not?" The reference here is to what took place at Ephesus during the apostle's stay there, as related in Ac. xii. 31. Some suppose he actually contended with wild beasts, as it was no doubt usual for criminals and others to do at Ephesus. This view is untenable. In the first place the very phrase (παραμασία), and similar phrases, are in constant use to signify contests with men of temper, as savage as wild beasts. "From Syria to Rome I fight with beasts," said Ignatius in his epistle to the Romans (ch. v), meaning by the beasts the savage soldiery by which he was led in chains; and similar language is in frequent use in Scripture, 2 Th. ii. 17; Tit. iii. 1. Again, in the history in Ac. xix., we find no occurrence of this kind related. Again, in 2 Co. vi. 23, where Paul enters minutely into an enumeration of his past trials, he makes no mention of anything like this. The apostle's right of citizenship, which he always used for his protection, would not permit of such a thing. And his own qualifying phrase, "speaking after the manner of a man," seems to signify his own assertion that he used the phrase metaphorically, borrowing a custom of men at the games to express significantly the persecution he endured for Christ. We only then require such a scene or scenes at Ephesus as would justify the application of the term to them, and we have such in Ac. xix., and may well suppose that the raging spirit then fully put forth was shown upon many of those numerous occasions when Paul testified to the fierce idolaters of Ephesus that "they were no gods which were made with hands," ver. 28. We have in this chapter a scene fully described which exceeds the savage scenes of the amphitheatre, in that it is men, not beasts, who are the actors. We have the savage passions of the beasts, the stirring up of these to fury when their keepers thought fit to do so, their furious roaring filling the air, their fierce rushing, the varied cries of beasts of different kinds, exactly brought before us in the multitude of the great city, cruel by a fallen nature, and made doubly so by a false and cruel worship, raised from their habitation by artful and influential leaders, stirred up to madness by their artful addresses, rushing in fury with Paul's companions into the theatre eager to destroy them, and there in blind passion shouting out some one thing some another. These were the wild beasts with whom Paul fought at Ephesus. The Greek therion, the Latin bestia, was the apt resemblance of the untaunted apostle contending with the idolaters of Ephesus. The next reference, 1 Co. xvi. 9, represents the sad case of the apostles generally by a yet more fearful feature of those savage games. The combattants in the morning with beasts had armour of offence and defence; but those who were brought last in the day upon the arena were naked and defenceless, exposed without any defence to their foes, and if they chanced to escape one day it was only to be reserved for the same fate on another. How forcibly does this illustrate St. Paul's description of himself and his fellow-apostles: "I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as appointed to death, for we are made a spectacle (σκαραβαίοι) unto the world, and to angels, and to men." The last scene of the amphitheatre, where wretched men were exposed to certain death to satiate the cruel or excite the pity of the crowded seats, was required to set forth the condition of those devoted men who stood the brunt of the world's hatred and opposition to Christ in the first age of the church (Whitby's Commentary). Something of a similar kind in the history of those who are addressed in the epistle to the Hebrews seems referred to in ch. x. 32.

The universal temperance, not abstinence, which was required for a long previous time by those who would look for victory in the games, is admirably used to express the temperance which is required in the Christian life, 1 Co. ix. 25-27. Strict temperance, and that life-long, is the Christian man's rule, who would with a good hope expect the heavenly crown. It signifies the restraint of one's inclinations in permitted things, for from sinful things he must wholly abstain. This restraint of the inclination within moderate bounds implies constant self-denial. There is no temperance where there is no self-denial. The throwing off restraint is the abandonment of temperance. That which must be subdued and brought into subjection, is not merely the craving of the body, but also the desires of the mind. The body must be the Christian man's servant, not his master. He must learn to rule its appetites, not to be ruled by them. The picture which classic writers give us of the preparation—long, earnest, self-denying—on the part of those who sought the crown in the games, exactly sets forth the corresponding preparation which Christian man must make, if they would not lose their hope. Without it they might as Paul did, and be cast away—judged unworthy of a prize (vss. 12. 13).

The competitor at the games fought and ran before a grand and numerous assemblage. From all quarters the ardent and earnest inhabitants assembled to look upon those who were to put forth before them all their vigour. Some of these spectators had themselves been, or would afterwards be, competitors for victory. Before a nobler or more spirit-stirring assembly none could contend for a human crown. This feature of the games is held held of beautifully in Hc. xii. 1. 2. In the previous chapter St. Paul had brought forward in grand array the heroes of faith. The Old Testament is searched from its first pages to its last to furnish material for the preparation of the saint's mind. It is true. We are always in need of fresh inspiration, and the apostle reminds them again of how many things of greater worth are put upon record. All had been strugglers for victory, and all had secured its crown. Before these the apostle tells the suffering believers he is writing to that they are contending for victory, and especially before them who is the grand example of faith and patience, as he will be the crown of all who exhibit faith and patience in his cause. "Saying we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus." The Christian assembly at the Olympic games illustrates, while it falls infinitely short of, this glorious assembly of saints, and martyrs, and faithful men.

The difference of the crown which men contend for at the games and which the Christian contends for could not escape the apostle's attention, and he has brought it forward in few but striking words: "They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible," vss. 24. 25. The crowns at the games were pleasant to the victors—

"Vindictive corona Et palmar, pretium victoriae."—(Ex. x. 10.)

but they soon lost their freshness and faded; the Christian's crown is incorruptible, and unfeigned, and fadeth not away. [v. c.]

GAMMADIMS, Exe. xxii. 11, not, as some have supposed, the name of a people, but an appellative probably meaning the "guardian or owner." GARDEN.

If what Solomon spoke concerning "trees, from the cedar to the hyssop," was consigned to writing, the work has long since perished; but it is impossible to read the Bible without perceiving that the Hebrews were a people who delighted in flowers and green fields, in groves and plantations, in orchards and gardens. The two hundred and fifty hard botanical terms occurring in the original of the Old Testament are enough to prove this. No collection of classical authors of the same extent, and not professedly treating on Husbandry, could furnish so long a list; and it must be remembered that all these terms occur incidentally in their laws, their poetry, their history. Trees and flowers enhanced the enjoyment, or relieved the gloom, of almost every scene in Jewish life. Like the streets of modern Ishan, like many of the towns of America and the Continent, their cities were sometimes a temple and shaded by trees growing beside the water-courses, Ezech. xxiv. 2. Volgate. Even in towns, the vine was trained along the walls of their houses, and as it clung to the trelis, or wound round the balustrade of the outside staircase, it was both a graceful and useful ornament, Ps. cxxxiii. 3. The courts of their houses usually rejoiced in the shade of some spreading vine-vine or terebinth; and, except in the temple, where there was a special prohibition, the areas of the public buildings were still planted with fruit-plants. And occasionally the shelter of a single tree, were a chosen scene of retirement and devotion; and it was in such cool and fragrant bowers that the pupils loved to collect their disciples, and dwell forth their wisdom. The very rustics had a taste for flowers; and, by way of bringing spring and autumn together, the grain newly reaped on the thrashing-floor seems to have been occasionally crowned with lilies or some equally graceful flower, &c. &c. &c. 4

On high occasions, the pathways of conquerors and distinguished personages were strewn with branches in blossom, or with the leaves of the palm. To their feet a fresh charm was added by beautiful and fragrant flowers; and the apocryphal Solomon puts into the mouth of his vaviputative truly Amaranthine ditty:—"Come on, let us enjoy the good things that are present. Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments, and let no flower of the spring pass us. Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they be withered." Wisdom, i. 6. Even to the grave this propensity follows them. The modern Egyptians deck the tombs of the dead with palm, or other branches, or fragrant aegopodium; the Turks and the Syrian plant cypress and myrtles in their cemeteries. So among the Jews one mode of "carnishing sepulchres" seemed to have been to plant or sew flowers upon them (Barmer's Obs. on. vol. iii. p. 186, 111. 12; Porcher's Oriental Antiquities, vol. iii. p. 16; Brown's Antiquities of the Jews, vol. i. p. 142). When Abraham bought the field at Machpelah for a burying-ground, besides the cave, special mention is made of the trees which surrounded it; and whether or not interment in gardens was common, by far the most memorable of earth's sepulchres was in the garden of a Jew.

But who can fail to recall that imagery from the grave and the garden, from the field and the forest, which over sacred poetry diffuses the glowing tints of as when its silvery or amethystine peonies, clear against the cloudless sky, proclaimed the approach of spring, and invited forth to the fields and villages the youth of Judah. By the wayside grew gymnococones, as when Zacchaeus climbed into one to catch a glimpse of the illustrious stranger; and under the terracloth the Bedouin sets up his tent, as when Abraham beneath the oak at Mamre received his angel visitors. As early as the days of Joshua, Jericho was the city of palm trees; with branches of the palm the jubilant procession strewed the road as they conducted the Son of David from Jericho to Jerusalem; and it is only in our living day that palms have disappeared from Jericho. “The solitary relic of the palm forest, seen as late as 1858, has now disappeared” (Stanley’s Palestine, ch. vii). The pine, cypress, and myrtle still cast their shadow, although no feast of tabernacles returns, whose boughs they once adorned. If Sharon has lost its rose, Galilee still yields its lilies, descendants of these lovely flowers to which the divine Teacher pointed in his sermon, and bade his disciples “consider” them, with a feeling which an illustrious naturalist has characterized as “the highest honour ever done to the study of plants” (see J. E. Smith’s History of Botany). Hasebipist was charmed with the jasmine of Palestine; another traveller speaks with rapture of the delicious odour which sprang at every step of his journey from Jerusalem to Jaffa, when the rain had revived the thyme, the balm, and the rosemary; and in the glen of Lachish where Cannan lies embosomed (Alphonse Daudet).

In pots and vases flowers were distributed through the apartments, and they grew in the courts of the houses. Residences of the latter sort were approached through an avenue of trees, and the villa was not complete without its garden and orchard. Their pleasure-grounds were laid out in what used to be called the Dutch style, so fashionable in England last century; the flower-beds square and formal; the raised terraces running in straight lines; arbours of trellis-work at definite intervals, covered with vines and other creepers which it is difficult to identify. Some of the ponds are represented as stored with fish, others with water-fowl. Vegetables are depicted in great variety and abundance. It is indeed impossible to look at any representation of an Egyptian garden without feeling some sympathy for the complaints and murmuring of the Israelites in the desert. "The children of Israel waxed ... in bread, and leeks, and fitches, and melons, and cucumbers, and figs, and berries. But now our soul is dried away; there is nothing at all beside this must..." (Taylor's Memoirs of Egypt). Judging from the paintings and sculptures brought to light by Rosellini, Wilkinson, and recent explorers, the country mansion of an ancient Egyptian must have made a near approach to modern sumptuousness. When Pharaoh stripped forth from his palace he found himself beneath an avenue of stately palms and cypresses, whilst the breeze from the river trembled through the light foliage of the one, and scarcely a ray of sunshine could penetrate the massive leaves of the other. If he went into his vineyard he might walk under trellises from whose roofs and sides rich clusters depended, or through colonnades where, thorny-wise, the vines twisted round gilded props or carved pillars. Then passing into the wilderness or park, he and his courtiers might try their skill in archery by shooting at a target, or might spend their arrows on the game preserved in the thickets; or, if inclined for easier sport, the monarch might lounge in his barge and angle for fish, whilst slaves along the shore towed the pleasure-boat of their luxurious lord. Or, if he pleased, he might ascend to the upper and richest apartment of his kiosk, and there, quenching the juice of his grandniece's vintage, or the wine of his own dates, he might listen to the timbrel and harp of the minstrels, whilst every branch of air came laden with perfume, the water-flood shook their wings and made rainbows in the pond, and the gardener's miscellaneous apprentices, the monkeys, played their antics in the pomegranates."

and drink the water of the rain of heaven. And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments, which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to serve him with all your heart, and with all your soul, that I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain, and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thy oil, and thy goods.

At a later period of their history the Jews sojourned for two generations in Babylon. There they must have seen that wonder of the world — "These are gardens, which thou poudest vast: Spread round, and to the morning air do hang forth. Their golden fruits and dewy opening flowers; While still the low mists every in key fields Over the house tops breathed. — Milton.

It is possible that the "hanging gardens" of Babylon may have supplied some hints applicable to the terrace-culture so general on the hills of Palestine; and the reservoir at the summit, with the hydraulic contrivances for filling it, could not escape the notice of an observant people. But whatever practical use the Jews may have made of their Babylonian experiences, their sacred writings contain no admiring allusions to a country which they only recalled as the scene of an irclesome and ignominious exile.

In Scripture we have indications of various inclosures which occasionally bear the general name of garden.

1. We read, ca, vi. 11, of a "garden of nuts," which of course means a plantation of walnuts or almonds, or some other nut-bearing tree. In the same way the Jews had inclosures dedicated to the cultivation of the vine and the olive; so that we continually read of "vineyards" and "olive-yards," and, ca, iv. 13, we find an "orchard of pomegranates."

2. Then there were orchards where trees of various sorts were reared together. Says the Prophet "I made me orchards, and vineyards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits." Ez. ii. 15. Amongst the fruit-trees cultivated in the Holy Land were the almond, the chestnut, the citron, the date-palm, the fig, and the pomegranate, besides the vine and the olive. For the sake of a dense shade, however, the orchard sometimes contained trees more valued for their foliage than their fruit, "trees of emptiness," like the plane, the terebinth (or "oak"), the mulberry.

3. One of the first times that we read of a "garden of herbs" is when the unscrupulous Ahab coveted the vineyard of Naboth, wishing to convert it into a kitchen garden, 1 Ki. xxi. 2. In every country such an inclosure contains the vegetables which suit the taste of the people, and which the climate allows to be cultivated. Amongst the culinary vegetables of the Hebrews were greens, cucumbers, and melons, which in sultry weather were delightful refrigerants, besides such aromatic herbs and carminatives as mint, anise, rue, and coriander; nor were they likely to omit the onion and the garlic.

4. Like most oriental nations, the Jews were fond of perfumes. Their clothing was often scented. Blind Isaac, "smelling the fragrance of Jacob's vineyard, blessed him, saying, Behold, the fragrance of my son is as the fragrance of a field which the Lord hath blessed," Ge. xxvi. 27. And to the king's daughter the psalmist says, "Myrrh, aloes, and cassia are all thy garments; from the palaces [or cabinets] of Armenia they make thee glad, Ps. iv. 6, 7. The box of precious ointment poured on the head of a guest was the mark of a distinguished reception; and, in later times at least, a garland of roses sometimes circled the heads of the banqueters. We are therefore prepared to find the chief place occupied by odoriferous plants in the flower garden of ancient Palestine. Thus, in the impassioned address of the bride of Solomon — "A garden art thou, filled with rushes sweet; A garden walled, these matchless seats to shield; A spring inclosed, a fountain fresh and sealed; A paradise of plants where all unite, Dear to the smell, the palate, or the sight; Of rich pomegranates that at random blow; Cypress and myrrh, in fragrant gales that flow; Nard, saffron, cinnamon, the dulcet airs Deep through its canes the colurnus prepares; The scented aloes, and each shrub that flowers Gums from its veins and spices from its flowers; Of pride of garden, front of endless sweets, Walling of oil in Lebanon that tastes," — Song of Solomon, iv. 12-15 (God's Translation).

Solomon's own gardens have probably suggested the imagery. As he informs us himself, "I made me great works; I builded me houses: I planted me vineyards; I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits: I made me pools of water to water therewith the wood that brought forth trees," Ez. iv. 16. Of these the traditional site near Bethlem is certainly correct. No locality could in itself be more likely or more convenient for a royal retreat far not from the capital; and it is fully confirmed by the names which still linger, Wady Urts, The valley of the Garden (Hortus Conclusus of the Romans); Gebel El-Fureidis, The hill of the little Paradise (παραδείσας); besides "Fig Vale," "Peach Hill," "Walnut Walk," "Garden of Nuts," &c. Taking advantage of the water supplied by the fountain of Ethan, a Christian Jew has within the last four years created a portion of this territory once more into a fruitful field. The brook, "clear as crystal," which creates its fertility, is thus described by Miss Bremer, who was there in March, 1859: "Everything on its banks seemed to rejoice over the lively running water; swarms of little gnats, which danced above them; the rose-red cyclamen which shot up out of the hollows or cracks in the stones, and bowed their lovely little heads as if to reflect themselves in the clear water; the grass which grew so abundantly on the banks as almost to conceal them. The almond-trees were in blossom, and hundreds of little goldfinches, with red crests round their beaks, twittered and warbled in the trees, although most of them were yet without leaves" (Genner's Holy Land, vol. i, p. 190). At the same season a few years previously (1852) Van de Velde expatiates in glowing terms on the scenery of "The Song," as reproduced on the very site of Solomon's pleasure-grounds—the flowers appearing, the singing of birds, the pomegranate blossoming, and then "the getting up early to the vineyards, to see if the vine flourish, if the tender grape appear" (Van de Velde's Syria and Palestine, vol. ii, p. 25). It is one of the sweetest valleys into which the eye can look down; a well-watered orchard covered with every easily fruit-tree that Syria nourishes" (Bross's Land of Promise, 20).

Owing to the density of the population, and the wonderful fertility of the soil when duly watered, a greater proportion of Palestine was laid out in gardens and vineyards than of almost any land. This was especially the case in the neighbourhood of cities. According to Josephus, the environs of Jerusalem were almost all garden together; but from the statements of the rabbis it would appear that, except a few plantations of trees which had existed since the days of the prophets, there were no gardens within the walls (Lightfoot's Works, vol. i, p. 53, vi, 230). For this a sanitary reason is assigned in the danger apprehended from the decomposition of vegetable matter.

Gardens were occasionally used as places of seclusion. Manasses, and Amon his son, were not buried in the royal vaults, but "in the garden of Manasseh's own house, in the garden of Uzza," 2 Ki. xxi. 19, 20. And "in the place where Jesus was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid. There lay they Jesus therefore, because of the Jews' preparation day; for the sepulchre was nigh at hand," Ju. xvii. 12.

The existing gardens of the East are not calculated to give an exact idea of Syrian husbandry. They are arranged with little taste and kept with little care; at the same time their productions are far the greater part identical with those yielded in the sunny days of Palestine. Like the "garden of cucumbers," it is, in any valuable plantation still needs a lodge for the watchman till once the crop is secured; "when the shed is forsaken by the keeper, and the polec fall down or lean every way, and the green boughs with which it is shaded are scattered by the wind, leaving only a rugged, sprawling weed." (Thomson's Land and the Book, p. 368.) Now that her "country is desolate," there could not be a more vivid emblem of the daughter of Zion; but the amazing capabilities of the soil, where industry and irrigation are brought to bear, not only help us to recall the past, but make it easy to believe that when the set time is come for the Lord to comfort Zion, "he will make her wilderness like Eden, her desert like the garden of the Lord," Is. xxv. 10. [4, 5.]

GARLIC [laun, shoon, xix. 13] Hasseleqtiq, Frets, 170-22, whilst mentioning that garlic (Allium sativum) is much used by the modern Egyptians, expresses a doubt whether it was known to the Israelites, "as it does not grow in Egypt, but is brought thither from islands in the Archipelago." On this point, however, the inscription quoted by Herodotus (b. ii. 129) may be held as conclusive. He expressly mentions garlic (οἰλίκον) as one of the articles of food supplied to the builders of the pyramids; and with his statement tallies the latest and best authority. "Though garlic grows in Syria, that brought from Egypt is most esteemed." Till the name 'Syrian' was tabbed in Cairo, during the war, those who sold it in the streets cried, 'Tom shimee,' 'Syrian garlic'; it was then changed to 'Iafa o' tom,' "garlic is useful." [G. Wilkinson, notes on Herod, 129.]

Even in the days of the Israelites, imported varieties may have been preferred to those of native growth; but there can be little doubt that the pungent bulb was as popular in the streets of Noph and On, as it is now in Cairo and Damascus. Both the common garlic (Allium sativum), and its less rank cousin, the shallot (A. ascalonicum), are well known bulbous-rooted plants; along with the hyacinth, the squill, the star of Bethlehem, forming a tribe in the beautiful order of the Lilies (Liliaceae). Besides other medicinal properties, garlic is said to have a considerable effect in quickening the circulation, and stimulating the entire system. [6, 7.]

GATE [the common rendering of שִׁוֹעָן, shoon, from the root to cut asunder, to divide, and meaning originally a fissure, aperture, then an entrance], the entrance into a camp, a palace, a temple, &c., but especially a city. It first occurs in Ge. xxi. 17, in God's promise to Abraham that his posterity should possess the gates of his enemies, signifying that they should have power or dominion over them. The gate was the place for great assemblies of the people, 1 Sa. ii. 21; for reading the law and proclamations, 1 Ch. xxiv. 61; 2 Ch. vi. 2; for administering justice, Jos. xvii. 14; i Ki. iv. 1; for fortification and strength in war, 1 Sa. iv. 21. The gate of the town was also a market-place, Zech. iii. 1, apparently as now for country produce. The gate often signified the city, Ge. xxxvii. 17; xvi. 6; De. xxxii. 12; Ps. lix. 2, or the people of the city, as it was necessarily the most public thoroughfare of the town, Esa. xxvi. 2, and the chief place of concourse either for business or pleasure, where the people went to learn the news, Ge. xiv. 1, and to gossip, Ps. lxii. 12; to prefer suits, or to attract the notice of the sovereign or dignitary at his going out or his coming in, Ki. ii. 15, 19; iii. 2. The priests and prophets seem to have delivered their discourses, admonitions, and prophecies in the gates, Ps. vii. 12; Am. ii. 15; viii. 2; Jer. xxxiii. 10; xxxvi. 26. Jeremiah, xxv. 36, mentions that the heads of the people met under the new gate of the temple on the occasion of a disturbance amongst the people. Criminals were punished outside the gates, 2 Ki. xxv. 19, Ezk. vii. 15, xiv. 12. The king of Ai was buried in the entrance of the gate, Jos. xvii. 23. Pashur smote Jeremiah the prophet and put him in the stocks at the high gate of Benjamin, J.c. xx. 2. At Rome the executions took place outside the Porta Metae or Esquiline. The burial places, as now, were beyond the gates. Gates of “death” or “hell” denoted the region of the departed, or the domain which was conceived to belong to the region, John xvii. 14; Ps. cxliv. 18. The Mahumetans assign seven gates to hell. To evade the gates to exhibit vanity, Ps. vii. 19.

Gates of cities, as places of security, were fortified, and had two valves, generally of wood or of wood covered with sheets of copper or iron, Ec. vii. 18; Is. xvi. 19. There were often also two gates, an outer and an inner one, and they were further protected by outworks or walls in advance of the gates. The Assyrian sculptures contain frequent representations of double and even triple walls with fortified gates in each (Botta, pls. 35, 59, 72, 73). Botta (p. 23) shows the fortified gate with the “chamber over the gate,” 2 Sa. xix. 21, the windows being square, while the gates are arched. That the double valves of the gates were of wood is to be inferred from the repeated representations of setting fire to them by the besiegers. In the walls of Babylon were “100 gates of solid brass” (see Babylon). The gates of the ancient cities of Greece and Etruria were flanked by towers. The entrances to the temples of Thales in Egypt (see Egypt and Fig. 231), to which in all probability Homer alludes in the epithet “hundred-gated,” which he gives to that city, were all flanked by towers. For the much larger gates of Jerusalem, see under that heading. That the valves were of wood and burned with fire we learn from Ne. i. 3. Subsequently the six great gates were covered with iron (Thompson’s Voyages, p. 290). The gates of cities were opened at sunrise and closed at sunset, Ne. vii. 3. They were closed during war, comp. Jos. iii. 9, 11, and “thrown wide open on festive occasions,” Ps. xcviii. 7, 8.

Gates, i.e. valves of iron and brass, mentioned in Scripture, are conjectured to have been wood plated with metal. The Greek and Latin poets, Hesiod, Ovid, and Virgil, all speak of gates of iron. Manvell describes the principal gates of the mosque at Damascus as being in his day covered with brass (p. 129).

Gates of stone were, i.e. xii. 12, most probably formed of a single slab turning on pivots inserted into sockets above and below. The doors leading to the tombs of the kings near Jerusalem were each formed of a single stone seven inches thick, sculptured to resemble four panels, and turning on pivots. Similar doors are described by Dr. Clarke in the sepulchres at Phoemus, and likewise by Irby and Mangles (Travels, p. 125) in the sepulchres near Rysan (Bethshan). They are also found in the Haemot beyond the Jordan and in Persia (Dyer’s handbook, p. 97). Inferred by Mr. Cyril Thornton, Trans. Roy. Soc. Lit. May 4, 1849, Dr. Wilkie’s Narrative, etc., 1831.

Gates of wood were usually of two valves, and secured by strong locks of brass, iron, or wood, 1 Sa. iii. 18; 1 Ki. iv. 13; 1 Co. viii. 5; 2 Co. xi. 3; Ps. civ. 13; Is. viii. 12. Faber supposes that the wooden gates had wickets to allow of passage without opening the large gate, Mat. vi. 23. Some of the passages in the Assyrian palaces appear to have been closed by a strong single valve, probably of wood, which was fastened by a wooden lock like those still used in the East, of which the key is as much as a man can conveniently carry, and by a bar which moved into a square hole in the wall. It is to a key of this description that the prophet probably alludes: “And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder,” Is. xlix. 2, and it is remarkable that the word of the text for key in this passage of Scripture, warehouses (Dongh), is the same in use all over the East at the present time, but pronounced mahfeth. The key of an ordinary street door is commonly thirteen or fourteen inches long, and the key of the gate of a public building, or of a street, or of a quarter of a town, is two feet and more in length. The key has a certain number of iron pegs at one end, which correspond to so many holes in the wooden bar or bolt of the lock, which, when the door or gate is shut, cannot be opened until the key is inserted, and the impediment to the drawing back of the bolt removed by raising up so of good omen, doubtless put up at the dedication of the house, a ceremony also in use among the Jews. The door was in the centre, or at a corner of the front, and turned on pivots, and was frequently painted with numerous devices. In order to strengthen the wall over a doorway, a beam of wood or stone was let into it, and the jambs were upright posts on which the lintel rested. Sometimes besides the framework and flat beams the doorway had a round log for its lintel. Over the lintel was the cornice with an overhanging curve like that of the roof, generally with the winged globe or other significant decorations, highly coloured. The stone lintel and the door behind the threshold of tombs and temples, exhibit the holes in which the pivots turned, as well as those of the bolts and bars, and the recess for receiving the opening valves. Some of the bronze pins have been discovered in the tombs. The folding doors had bolts in the centre above as well as below, and a bar was fixed across from one wall to the other.

GATE

Gates as places of Punishment and Sculpture. The Assyrian sculptures again most aptly illustrate these customs, for there are numerous examples of execution by impalement outside the city walls (see Botta and also British Museum, No. 104, and of burying outside the gates (Botta, pls. 69, 70, and Niniveh and the Palace). That the practice prevailed with the ancient Romans, we have the evidence of the several avenues to Rome, which are lined with the ruins of ancient sepulchres and of the Street of the Tombs at Pompeii. That it is still the custom in the East, we may just refer to the multitude of beautiful structures outside the Bab el Nasr, and the gate at the foot of the citadel of Cairo.

Gates as places of Jurisdiction and Judgment. "Judges and officers shall then make thee in all thy gates; and they shall judge the people with just judgment," Ex. xix. 19; Lev. xiv. 3; Deut. xvii. 19. Judges also judged by the lot, as stated in the text, and were fixed in the gates, 1 Ki. xiv. 28; 2 Ki. xv. 17; Je. xxxix. 7. Judges sat on chairs at an appointed place within or under the gates, 1 Ki. xiv. 29, xxv. 9. The sculptures found by Botta (p. 19) contain representations of an armchair or seat of judgment, in which the king sat at the gate. A high seat, called brows, exactly like this excepting in the decorations, is to be found in the court-yard of all respectable houses in Cairo, where the master sits to give judgment in domestic affairs. These seats are never wanting in the court-yard of the houses of sheikhs, of heads of tribes, or of persons in authority. The seat is placed in some shady part of the court against a wall or column, exactly as described in Scripture, 1 Sa. 1, 9, and in some houses it is converted into a high sofa continued the whole length of one side of the court, 1 Sa. xxv, in which case the master sits in one corner. The Assyrian sculptures also afford examples of the high seats without a back, such as the prophet Eli "fell from off backwards by the side of the gate." 1 Sa. v. 17. The ancient Trojans assembled their elders in the gates of the town to determine causes (Hadj. p. 194, Ed. 1, 290). The Romans used the Porta Capena for this purpose (Journ., sat. iii.) The custom of holding courts of justice in the gate of the capital town prevails throughout the East; the governor of every city, town, or village sits in or near to the gate to settle affairs of all within his jurisdiction. The very title of the Sultan, "the Sublime Porte," is derived from the Italian "porte," or gate; and the office of the Capuci Bassi of Constantinople (beauh of the gate) must be analogous to that which Daniel held in Babylon.

The first transaction on record of a legal character is that of the purchase of a field by Abraham, which took place in the gate of the city of Hebron, then called Kiriath-arba, Gen. xviii. 19. 21. Then the judgment between Boaz and a relation of Naomi's, R. v. iv. That custom of giving judgment at the gates of cities and royal abodes was universal in the ancient world; we learn also from Egyptian, Assyrian, and Greek sculptures. The metaphorical language, "and thy seed shall possess the gates of his enemies," is derived from the custom of the king sitting at the gate of the city or palace to give audience or judgment, and in obedience to which ancient custom the statues of the Pharaohs and kings of Egypt are always placed at the gates of the temples. On Egyptian monuments, before the entrance of the mansion of the blessed, sits Harpocrates, the type of youth and new life, and a hideous monster, the prototype of Cerberus, sometimes called the devourer of the wicked—guards of the gates of the Ameni or haides. In the sculptures on the sarcophagus in the Soane Museum, the weighing of the deeds of mankind, or the place of judgment, is at one of the many gates of Amenti, Tit. xxviii. 17, which are always guarded by a great serpent. At Thebes there is a bas-relief representing the king giving audience at the door of his tent. The Assyrian sculptures show us Semacherib at the door of his tent giving judgment in the case of the Jewish prisoners taken at Lachish (Isa. xxxix. 35). The gates and courts of judgment in the palaces themselves are sufficiently indicated by the subjects represented on the walls. The Ionic trophy monument excavated at Xanthus by Sir Charles Fellowes furnishes a representation of a Persian satrap sitting at the gate of the city under the shadow of an umbrella dictating terms to Greek ambassadors.

In the Assyrian palaces the gates were remarkable for many significant illustrations of Scripture. The principal gates were guarded by six symbolic figures, compounded of the man, the bull, and the eagle; the elaborately sculptured wings being extended over the back of the animal. These figures are built into the sides of the opening. We regard these symbolical combinations of the human-headed figure of a bull with eagle's wings as probably derived from traditional descriptions of the cherubim, handed down after the deluge by the descendants of Noah; and to the same origin also may be attributed their situation as guardians of the principal entrances of the palaces of the Assyrian kings. In the Assyrian palaces such compound figures are never found, excepting as guardians of portals. Ordinarily the entrances on each side of the central portal recede from the general line of the façade, and are guarded on each side of the doorway by winged divinities, which turn their faces to the entrance, and present the pomegranate to those who enter, affording a more remarkable similarity to Egyptian temples. In Assyria he who was privileged to enter was met by the divinity presenting him with the fir cone: and in Egypt the king is represented receiving from the divinity in the same way the symbol which is understood to signify life. See cast in Brit. Mus., of Pharaoh Ramses IV., entering his tomb, at the threshold of which he is met by the divinity Herries. Another curious feature of the entrance to Assyrian palaces or temples is, that the tile or brick pavement ceases at the threshold, and their place is supplied by a single large slab of gypsum, the width of the jambs, and covered with a cuneiform inscription divided into two columns. Before the three doors of the façade forming the porch are holes the size of one of the bricks forming the pavement, from eleven to thirteen inches square, and about fourteen in depth. These holes are lined with tiles and have a ledge round the inside, so that they might be covered by one of the square bricks of the pavement without betraying the existence of the cavity. In these cavities Botta found small images of baked clay of frightful aspect, sometimes with lynx’ head and human body, some with human head and lion’s body, and others with the upper part human but terminating in bulks’ legs and tails. As we have no analogous contrivances in the temples of Egypt and Greece, we can only speculate on the peculiarities in the Assyrian structure. It may however be supposed, from the constant recurrence of the emblematic figures at the entrance, that this part of the palace or temple in the Assyrian mind was of the greatest importance, and connected with the religious opinions of the nation. Hence it was tenderly guarded by divinities, inscriptions, and hidden gods from the approach of any subtle spirit or more palpable enemy. With respect to the clay images, they may be the “teraphim,” a name given to certain images which Rachel had stolen from her father Laban the Syrian, and “put them in the camel’s furniture and set upon them,” Ge. vii. 14, 15, circumstances which favour the conclusion that the teraphim, Laban’s gods, were no larger than these Assyrian images. (See Teraphim.) Another word however is worthy of consideration, as it agrees with the places in which these images were found. It is the Arabic word horf, signifying a boundary or margin—a meaning analogous to doorway, the margin or boundary of a chamber. Thus both the Hebrew and Arabic afford significations immediately connected with the gods teraphim; and we have yet another illustration furnished by modern Persians, who call their talismans “tollin,” really the same word, the l and r being the same in some languages, and easily interchanging in many. These speculations are strongly supported by the existing characteristics and superstitions of eastern nations; the pertinacity with which all orientals adhere to ancient traditions and practices; the strongly implanted prejudices entertained in the court of Persia respecting the going out and coming in of the shadow of his palace, and the belief in unseen agencies and the influence of the evil eye, which has prevailed in all countries, and still exists in some, especially in Asia and the south of Europe. The gates above described formed the side of a court, the size and decoration of which favoured the conclusion that it was a court of reception—the place where offerings were presented and where justice was administered; the king’s gate—the gate of judgment—the “porch for the throne where he might judge, even the porch of judgment.” 1 Ki. vii. 4. In this court were want to assemble the princes, governors, judges, treasurers, counsellors, sheriffs, and all the rulers of provinces, Da. iii. 2, 3, of Assyria. When the king gave audience, the porch or seat of judgment was on the south-western or shady side of the court, and communicated immediately by the several entrances with the interior of the palace. It was in a court or a gate of this kind in the royal palace of Babylon that the prophet Daniel sat when Nebuchadnezzar had made him the “Sultan” or ruler over the whole province of Babylon, to i. 28, 29, and it was in a similar court of the king’s house in Shushan the palace, that Haman watched to speak unto the king to hang Mordecai, Ezra vi. 1. [R.] GATH [vine-press], one of the five cities of the Philistines, which were presided over by so many princes or lords, from the time of Joshua till a comparatively late period, Jos. xiii. 2. In Jos. xi. 22 it is stated that Gath was one of the cities in which, at the time of the conquest, there still remained some of the ancient Anakims or giants; and they appear to have perpetuated the race there till much later times, as it was from Gath that the renowned Goliath issued, 1Sa. vii. 4. Nor was he the only representative in David’s age of the gigantic race; for several more are mentioned, 2Sa. xvii. 23; 1Ch. xvi. 3. To Gath, as one of the chief Philistine cities, among others, the ark of the Lord was sent on being taken by the Philistines, and the prophet there also suffered under the severe visitation of Heman, 1Sa. xxx. 8, 9. During his severe persecutions David sought and found in it a temporary refuge, 1Sa. xxii. 17, 18; and he seems to have won the confidence of the people there to his side; for the Gittites, as they are called, who to the number of 600 entered into his service, and stuck so closely by him, were simply Gathites, being the men “who came after him from Gath,” 2Sa. xiv. 1. It was probably, however, at a later period, that these in any number attached themselves to David; and not till he had, among his other success, established his supremacy over Gath and the land generally of the Philistines, 2Sa. viii. 1; 1Ch. xii. 3. It was still, however, allowed to retain a lord or king of its own, though under tribute to the house of David, 1Ki. vii. 28. During the wars that succeeded the division of the kingdom, Gath passed through considerable vicissitudes of fortune, but appears to have last to have been a place of some strength and importance, 2Ki. xii. 17; xiii. 21; 2Ch. xxiv. 6; Am. vi. 2; Mi. i. 10. “We sought in vain,” says Robinson (Researches, ii. 1), “for any authentic trace of the name of Gath throughout the whole region”—so completely has its memorial perished. The precise site of the ancient city is unknown. The Omannah of Eusebius mentions two Gaths: one five miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Diospolis; the other, which he held to be the Gath whither the ark was carried, a large village between Antipatris and Janin. Jerome in his Commentaries (1. 1. 11) places it somewhat differently, on the borders of Judæa, between Eleutheropolis and Gaza. So that even in the first centuries of the Christian era, there seemed to be no certain tradition on the subject. Porter would identify the site with the eminence Tell El-Rushid, about midway between the sites of Eleon and Aschab (Syria and Palestine, p. 290). GATH RHEPER [vine-press of the wall], the birth-place of the prophet Jonah, 2Ki. xix. 25, and a town in the tribe of Zebulun, Jos. xix. 12. GATH-RIMMON [vine-press of the pomegranate], a town in the tribe of Dan, inhabited by the Levites, Jos. xix. 42. 52; 1Ch. viii. 52. This Robinson supposed to be the Gath which Eusebius and Jerome placed at five Roman miles north of Eleutheropolis on the way to Gaza

Diospolis (ii. p. 12) But here also there is no certainty.

Gaza [strong, fortified], one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, but which, unlike Gath, has witnessed the desolations of many generations, and continues to the present time a comparatively thriving and well-peopled place. It may be regarded as one of the oldest cities in the world, being mentioned in Ge. v. 11. It was one of the border towns of the Canaanites. Like Gath it was also one of the seats of the giant race, the Anakims, that were prior even to the Canaanites, Josh. xii. 21, 22. It was included in the lot of Judah, and is said to have been taken by the tribe, along with Askelon and Ekron, Isa. v. 17; though it is clear they did not attempt to drive out the original inhabitants, nor interfered with the regular government, but were content with some nominal fealty. By and by it became the scene of Samson's mournful captivity and last triumph, Jud. xvi. Afterwards it had its full share in the varying fortunes of the Philistine territory; and had ever and anon to endure sieges which frequently brought it to the brink of ruin. "To the Egyptians it was the key of Palestine, to the Syrians it was the key of Egypt," hence it was the scene of many a severe conflict. That it was a strongly fortified place, as its name import, appears above from the resistance it made to the arms of Alexander. So vigorously was it then defended by the forces under the command of the eunuch Natus, and of such massive strength were its walls, that the engineers of Alexander's army found themselves completely baffled in their attempts to effect a breach. They were obliged to erect an enormous mound 250 feet in height, and about a quarter of a mile in width, on the south side of the town; and even with this advantage, and the use also of the engines that had been employed at the siege of Tyre, the besiegers were frequently repulsed, and Alexander himself sustained no slight bodily injury. It was at last carried by escalade, and the garrison put to the sword. The town itself was not destroyed, but most of the inhabitants that remained were sold into slavery, and a fresh Arab population settled in their stead (Arrian, ii. 27). During the Macedonian wars it was taken and retaken several times; on being taken by Simon it was strongly fortified, and peopled by Jews in place of its former idolatrous inhabitants; further on still it stood a whole twelvemonth's siege against Alexander's army. After its recent reconquest by Jonathan, and a last was carried only by treachery, &c. (Josephus, Ant. x. iii.). In the gospel age it appears to have been a place of some importance; it was among the cities given by Augustus to Herod, as a mark of the imperial favour; and after his death it was assigned to the province of Syria. Though not noticed among the places visited by the apostles in the early propagation of the Christian faith, it is known to have become the seat of a Christian church, the name of whose bishop frequently appeared in the records of the ancient councils. But there are evidences of idolatry having retained a strong hold of the place for centuries after the Christian era; and as many as eight heathen temples are said to have existed in it at the beginning of the fifth century (Acta S. Paul., ii. 90). The present Arabic name of the city is Chuzaad, and its population is estimated by Robinson and by Porter at about 13,000 inhabitants, of whom only a few hundreds profess to be Christians; the rest are Mahometans. It stands about three miles from the sea, and the farthest south of any of the towns on the Philistine coast. Some have supposed that the ancient town stood considerably nearer to the shore; but there is no certain evidence of this. "Between the city and the shore are hills and tracts of sand, on which are scattered a few trees and hedges. Around the city on the south, east, and north, are numerous gardens hedged with prickly pear, which forms an impenetrable barrier. The soil of these is exceedingly rich and productive. Apricots and mulberries were already ripe [21st May]; the former delicious and abundant. Many palm-trees are scattered around the city, though they form no grove as in Egypt; while beyond the gardens, towards the north, lies the extensive drive-grove through which we had passed" (Robinson, vol. ii. p. 256). "The town itself," says Porter, "looks like a collection of large villages that chance had placed near each other. The median stands on a broad-topped hill, which constitutes a kind of strong point containing the Sci, the great mosque, the government offices, and the houses of the chief citizens, all stone buildings, once substantial and in repair, though no one can tell how long ago. On the south-east is a large suburb more densely populated than the hill; on the south-west is a smaller one; and on the north is another still smaller. All these are of mud architecture, differing in nothing from the villages of the surrounding plain, except that here and there is a large mosque and minaret. The present town has no gates, no fortifications, no defences of any kind; and yet from its position one would think it had more need of them than any other place in Syria. It is not only a frontier town, but lying situated on the borders of the desert it is open at any moment to a Bedawin raid. Yet it never suffers; and the secret of its safety is just this—the inhabitants are themselves half free-booters, half receivers, whom the Bedawin deem it more politic to conciliate than to plunder" (Handbook for Syria and Palestine, p. 269).

From what has been stated respecting Gaza, it will be evident that the expression in the message to the evangelist Philip, "Go toward the south unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza, which is desert," as xiii. 24, must have respect not to the city itself of Gaza, but to a part of the way leading to it. Even in the present day Gaza could not with propriety be described as desert; and much less could it have been so in Philip's time. Coins still exist of Gaza that were struck in honour of Titus, Hadrian, and some following emperors, showing it to have been a place of considerable importance both at and subsequent to the gospel era. But that portion of the road which lies between Eleutheropolis and Gaza passes through a region which is now, as it was probably then also, without villages, and might fitly be called desert. (see Robinson, ii. p. 1)

GAZER. So Gezer.

GEBA [hill], sometimes written Gara, a town belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, Jos. xvi. 21; hence called "Gage of Benjamin," 1 ki. xvi. 22. Some have thought it the first of the seven cities of the desert.

It appears to the exact point to the extreme north of the territory of Benjamin; especially the expression "from Geba to Beersheba," 2 ki. xxii. 15, which appears to describe the whole extent of the kingdom of Judah from north to south, as in the similar expression "from Dan to Beersheba" did in respect to the entire Jewish territory before its division into two distinct kingdoms.

In xvi. vii. 30, it is coupled with Ramah, in a way that appears to indicate the local juxtaposition of the two places.

GEBAI [mountain] occurs only once in Scripture,

111. xvi. 7, and without any definite fixing of the region or locality marked by the name, yet in such a connection as to show that it must have belonged to that portion of Arabia which lies to the south and east of Palestine. For it is coupled with Moab, Ammon, and Amath, Edom and Ishmael, as together joined in conspiracy against the people of Israel. Now, there is a mountainous district, immediately south of the Dead Sea, which bears much the same name still --

Jebel or Djebel -- and which is generally identified with The Gebal of the peacemaker, also with the Gebalitis of Josephus, and the Gebal or Gebun of the Romans. It was simply a portion of the range which is generally design-nated, as a whole, the land or mountains of Edom.

But there must have been some reason in the circumstances of the time, which led the peacemaker to assign it a distinct place; probably it was occupied by a separate branch of the Edomite race, who were very forward in showing their hostility.

GEBER [son, in the sense of the Latin rei]. 1. The name of one of the officers of Solomon, who were set over distinct provinces for revenue or commissariat purposes, 1 kr. vi. 9. 2. A Geber is also mentioned at ver. 15 as the father of another of those officers.

GEDALIAH [made great by Jehovah], occurs as the name of various persons, of whom otherwise we know nothing. For xvi. both the canon and 3 of historical moment simply as the name of the governor who was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar, after the destruction of Jerusalem, to preside over the affairs of the feeble remnant that still survived in Judah, Je. xxxvii. 2; ki.

xxv. 22. As it was the mind of God that the king of Babylon should, for a time, have the ascendancy over the land and people of the Jews, so it was in conformity with his will that those who were left behind should submit themselves to Gedaliah, as Nebuchadnezzar's deputy. The prophet Jeremiah, accordingly, went to Mizpah and put himself under Gedaliah's protection,

Je. xi. 9; he used his influence also with the people in endeavouring to persuade them to the same peaceful course. But there was a party whose chafed spirits and blighted ambition would not suffer them to fall in with any arrangement, which formally acknowledged the supremacy of the king of Babylon; and this party headed by Ishmael, of the seed royal, who had taken refuge for a time among the Ammonites, entered into a conspiracy to kill Gedaliah. Information of the plot was secretly conveyed to Gedaliah, that he might take measures to have it defeated; but he refused to give credit to the intelligence; and so, in the midst of a rebellion, was treacherously murdered by Ishmael and his associates. This was done only about two months after the destruction of Jerusalem. The murderers made their escape, and Gedaliah's body was consigned to the flammes of Jerusalem.

GEDE, GEDERAH, GEDEROTh, GEDOR,

all applied to a city in the territory of Judah; but whether they were all different cities cannot be ascertained. Nothing of historical interest is connected with the names, Jos. xii. 21; xxvi. 8; 1 ch. xviii. 11;

1 ch. xvii. 7. The last in the list, Gedor, is commonly identified with a height in the mountains of Judah, having on it some ruins, and bearing the name of Jedor.

Gedor is thought from 1 ch. xiv. 7, where mention is made of certain brethren of Saul, Benjaminians, sons of Jerahmeel of Gedor, to have been also a town of Benjamin; and the allusion made to a Gedor in 1 ch.

iv. 50, in connection with the tribe of Simeon, seems to refer to some place on the boundary line between Judah and Mount S'or.

GEHAIzi [valley of vision], found only as the name of the servant of Elisha, 2 ki. i. 12. He appears for a time to have enjoyed the entire confidence of his master, and to have acted in a manner consistent with his situation. It was he who suggested the most fitting mode of recomposing the kindness of the Shunammite woman, and the suggestion was adopted, 2 ki. i. 11.

Some years afterwards, when the same Shunammite came to Carmel, to inform Elisha of what had befallen her son, Gehazi received from the prophet his staff, with instructions to go in his name, and lay it upon the face of the child. Though the method proved ineffectual to the end in view, it manifestly betokened

Elisha's part entire confidence in the character and intentions of Gehazi. We are therefore the more surprised to learn, in the next notice which has been preserved respecting him, that he should have been capable of acting in the presumptuous and deceitful manner he did. It was in regard to Naaman, from whom, on his restoration from leprosy by dipping seven times in the Jordan, Elisha steadfastly refused to accept of any of the gifts he had brought from Syria.

Gehazi thought this a piece of false delicacy on the part of his master; and hastened after Naaman, to secure a portion of the treasures before they were entirely out of reach. He ought to have understood, from the determined rejection of Naaman's offers by

Elisha, that there were important principles involved in the matter, which he should have been careful on no account, or by any movement on his part, to bring into suspicion. But so far from this, he had the audacity to it was in his chamber in the temple-buildings that Barach read the prophecies of Jeremiah in the audience of the people; and he interceded, though in vain, to prevent the burning of the roll that contained them, Jer. xxxvi. 24. Nothing more is known of him.

\textbf{GENEALOGIES;} formed of two Greek words, and signifying race-accounts, or family registers, tracing the descent and ancestral relationships of particular tribes and families, and especially of the human family out of which they spring, from the remotest times placed special attention to the preservation of such registers. It had undoubtedly a divine authorization.

The purpose of God in respect to the higher interests of mankind took from the first a specific family direction; and it was of importance that at least the more prominent links in the successive generations of these more nearly connected with the development of that purpose should be preserved to future times. The manifestations of the divine goodness were never indeed absolutely confined to any single branch of the human family; nor, even when they assumed meet of a partial and restrictive aspect, were members of other tribes excluded from partaking in them—if only they showed themselves ready to fall in with the terms, on which the way was laid open to the favour and fellowship of Heaven. But the imperfections that inevitably attached, in the earlier stages of the world's history, first to the organization of human society, and then to the means and agencies connected with the divine plan, led by a kind of necessity to the employment of particular races, through which, as the more select channels of working, the truth of God should be more especially disclosed, and the testimony for it more faithfully maintained. It is the genealogy of mankind in its bearing on this higher interest-reaching from Adam through the line of Seth to Noah, then from Noah through the line of Shem to Abraham, then again from Abraham through the lines of Isaac, Jacob, Judah, and David to Christ—over which the providence of God has most carefully watched, and which it has most fully exhibited in the historical records of Scripture. In other branches of the human family, and especially those more nearly related to the one in question, not a few genealogical tables are also given: but they have no more than a subsidiary place: and the chief interest and importance of the genealogical matter of Scripture hangs around the great central chain which connects Adam with Christ, and indeed with that more select portion of it which stretches from the call of Abraham to the birth of the Son of Mary. Nothing of spiritual moment now depends upon any question of genealogy, except what lies along the track of this definite line.

It was different, however, under the old covenant. From the period of its establishment, the people of God were obliged, not as a matter of family pride, or for the sake of a merely antiquarian interest, but for the determination of important questions of civil and religious polity, to keep with the utmost care and regularity their genealogical tables. It was these chiefly that preserved the landmarks between tribe and tribe, family and family, and regulated the succession to inheritances of land, so as usually to render unnecessary the specific destination of property or the framing of wills. It was on these, as connected with the family of Aaron, that the right of any individual or family turned to enter into the sacred and honourable functions of the priesthood; and when, as happened on the return from Babylon, any persons claiming this distinction were found unable to produce the proper register establishing their descent from Aaron, they were "removed, as polluted, from the priesthood." Ezr ii. 62. The settlement of the kingdom in the house of David, imposed of course a similar necessity for scrupulous exactness upon the members of that house, in order to secure their title to any participation in its honours. So that a manifold and intricate network of registers, the keeping of correct genealogical registers among the tribes of Israel from the conquest of Canaan to the coming of Christ. And that a corresponding degree of attention and care was applied to the matter is certain, not only from the place given to genealogies in Scripture, and the high, even undue account that is said there to have been ultimately made of them, (171, 1; but also from the testimony of Josephus as to the state of things regarding them in his day. He expressly affirms, that he ascertained his own pedigree from the public registers (l. c. 1); and further states in regard to the priesthood, that most exact tables of their descent and family connections had been kept from the time of their original appointment, and that not in Judea only, but in all the places of their sojourn, the members of the priesthood were at the utmost pains to have their family registers kept, so as to be above all suspicion (Contra Ap. i. 7). Josephus mentions these things respecting the families of the priesthood, because his own priestly origin, and his immediate purpose in writing, led him to refer more especially to them; but such exactness and careful preservation in respect to the priestly families, necessarily implied a great degree of the same in respect to the families of the other tribes.

As the keeping of correct genealogical tables had a national interest, so it may be said to have formed a national peculiarity.

A report indeed is mentioned, in a fragment of Africarius, preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 17), that the public registers had been destroyed by Herod, who was conscious of the infidelity of his Edomite origin, and sought thereby to prevent the possibility of its detection. But Africarius himself seems to have been doubtful of the truth of this report; for after noticing it, he adds the qualifying clause, "whether the matter actually stood thus or not" (εἰ ἦν έπειτα, ἐπιστέπησαν έκ τούτων, οἱ Άφρικανοί, καί Ευσεβίες, the learned editor of Eusebius, in his notes on the passage, finally rejects the story as altogether at variance with the known facts of history. "There can be no reasonable doubt, that down to the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, the genealogical registers of the Jews were kept with singular care, and with sufficient accuracy to determine all ordinary questions of relationship and descent; but after that event they cease to be heard of. The fearful catastrophe which finally destroyed the place and nation of the Jews, also scattered their genealogies to the winds — fused family and family, tribe and tribe together; so that it henceforth became impossible to tell, if there were an altar, who had a right to minister at it; or if a throne, who stood in the line of succession to its honours. The hand of God was as visibly in this as in the general overthrow of the old typical constitution of things; and if a judicial blindness were not upon the minds of the Jews, they would see in the loss of their genealogies, and the distinctions therewith connected, the clear sign of the abolition of their ancient polity, and the necessity of looking for a fulfillment of their prophecies of a different kind from what they have been expecting.

The relation of the Genealogies of Scripture to questions of Chronology is somewhat variable, and even where it seems most precise requires to be applied with caution. That some of the earlier lists have been framed with a reference to this use — those, for example, of Ge, y, and again of Ge. xi. 10-26 — there can be no reasonable doubt; for specifying, in the exact year of each father's life when the son was born, through whom the line of descent was to be transmitted, they necessarily provide the materials of a chronological reckoning. But in the great mass of genealogical registers this is not done; we have merely a certain number of generations given, and, on the supposition of there being no blanks in these, for the sake of brevity or any other purpose, we can only form an estimate of the entire period by striking an average for the successive generations. We cannot, however, be always sure that every link in the chain is given; and a degree of doubt or uncertainty as to the number, not less than the length, of the several generations, must render chronological calculations founded on such a basis in many cases problematical. Thus, the register of Levi, in Ex. vi. 16-20, gives only two links between Levi and Moses — Levi, Kohath, Amram, Moses: and it has been frequently argued on this ground, that the children of Israel could not have been in Egypt at the utmost above the half of the 490 years mentioned in Ex. xii. 40, as the term of their sojournings. Such also is the view taken of the matter in this work in the article CHRONOLOGY. It is connected, however, as is there admitted, with serious difficulties; such, indeed, as appear almost insuperable, when placed alongside of other things connected with the same table. Tiele, in his Chron. alt. Test. p. 38, thus states them: "According to Nu. iii. 27, the Kohathites were divided in Moses' time into four families — Amramites, Jehozadackites, Hebronites, and Usathites, which together composed 8000 men and boys (women and girls not being reckoned). The fourth part, or about 2150 men and boys, would fall to the Amramites. Moses himself had only two sons. If, therefore, Amram, the son of Kohath, the father of the Amramites, were identical with Amram the father of Moses, Moses must have had 2177 brothers and brothers' sons. But as this is an impossible supposition, it must be admitted as proved that Amram the son of Kohath was not the father of Moses, but that between him and his descendant of the same name a considerable number of generations has been dropped out." Such, at least, is one solution of the difficulty, and one in perfect accordance with other known instances of abbreviation, as in the priestly register of Ezra, ch. vi. 15, 16, compared with 1 Ch. vi. 15, there is only one Azariah given, where the other has two, and several intervening generations are dropped out. Genealogies of this description appear to have been formed, not so much with the view of furnishing definite measurements of time, as of noting the ramifications of tribal and family relationships, and certifying them in a manner from one age to another. For not this, but the former was the matter of chief moment, as regarded the purpose and arrangements of the old economy; and to apply such family registers to the determination of historical epochs in a chronological respect, especially if in doing so some violence has to be done to the facts recorded in the history, is to turn them to a purpose for which...
What some have done with the genealogy of Levi in reference to the sojourn in Egypt has been done by others—in particular by Lord Arthur Hervey, in his treatise undeniable in many respects on the genealogies of our Lord with that of Nachon, of the tribe of Judah, in the book of Ruth. Nachon was the representative of the tribe, in the line of Pharez, at the time of the exodus, and between him and David in the table referred to, in 4 Ch. xxvii, there are just four interlinking links—Salmon (who married Rahab), Beaz, Obed, Jesse, the father of David. Supposing this to be the entire line of descent, and striking a probable average for each generation, the number derived from the settlement in Canaan to the commencement of David's reign is computed at 230 or 240 years—scarcely the half of the common reckoning from the historical data in the book of Judges. The chronology of the period is undoubtedly involved in some obscurity, and it is possible that the briefer period in question may be as near the actual time as the longer. But the genealogy of the house of David is a very narrow and uncertain basis on which to rest it; for here also several names may have been omitted—a supposition which appears quite probable notwithstanding what Lord A. Hervey says to the contrary, by the much greater length of the genealogies of the house of Levi, which for much about the same period exhibit nearly double the number—seven between Phinzechas and Zadok, and still more by the line of Gershon, 1 Ch. vi. It seems, therefore, rash to press a particular genealogy as alone entitled, in such a case, to be regarded; and still more so, when this of necessity carries along with it a disparagement of the historical correctness of some of the narratives in Judges. (See Jer. xxxvii, also JARUS.)

Besides the tendency to precise abbreviation in the genealogical lists, the peculiar regard sometimes manifested in their construction to specific aims requires to be taken into account, in order to guard against improper deductions from them. No more is the strictly historical, than the chronological element always made the ruling principle of their formation: for in not a few of them marked respect was had to the wisdom of family traditions, under which the offspring of each tribe ranged themselves, and in others a regard to specific numbers exercised a determining influence. For example, in the Levitical genealogy already referred to in Ex. vi, four sons of Kohath are mentioned—Amram, Ishar, Hebron, Uzziel; then follow the sons of three of these, while Hebron is dropped out, as if he had died without issue. But in 2 Ch. xxvii, we find no fewer than four sons ascribed to him; so that it must have been from some specific reason—in all probability because no distinction of family sprung from him as its head, that Hebron has no offspring connected with his name in the earlier genealogy. An anomaly of nearly the reverse kind exists in the case of his brother Ishar; for while three sons are ascribed to him in Exodus, in the table of Chronicles there is only one, and he apparently different from any of the three. Such things clearly show that it was often not intended by particular genealogies to give a complete list of the descendants in that line, nor perhaps farther than was required to mark the formation of distinct families—whence calculations as to increase of population founded on these tables, and proceeding on the supposition of their including all the male offspring, are entitled to no confidence; they are based on insufficient data, and turn the genealogical registers to an account for which they were not framed. And the same doubtless may hold in other directions, when they were constructed with a specific regard to the significance or coincidence of certain numbers. A regard of this sort plays a prominent part, as will be more particularly noticed below, in our Lord's genealogy according to Matthew, affecting it in the way of what seems to us viewing the matter in a simply historical aspect arbitrary omissions and absurdities. It does so yet more peculiarly in the genealogy of Jacob's family in Gen. xvi, where for the purpose of making out the seven times ten—the combined number of the male propinquity and completeness—Jacob is counted among his own family (reckoned with the sons of Leah); and two genealogies of Judah (Hezron and Hammul), all Benjamin's ten sons, are contemplated as among the original settlers with Jacob in Egypt, though neither the two former, nor many of the latter, could be born till some time after the descent thither. The persons mentioned, with only an exception or two, which probably arose from subsequent changes, became heads of families (comparable in Nu. xxvi.), and the setting down for the Egyptian sojourn only appeared when they, when they came into existence and made up the ideal number seventy. They have therefore a place in the genealogy, which, along with its general historic aim, comprised the specific design of preserving a memorial of the other circumstances referred to. Such a regard to numbers and family distinctions may appear to us unnatural; it may seem to want exactness, or, as has been recently alleged, to violate historical verity; but the real question is, whether it did not exist, having certain ends to serve for the time then living which might otherwise have been lost? For if so, then it is as much our duty to consider it, and make reasonable allowance for it, as to make account of the idios of language and forms of expression which are peculiar to the original records of Scripture. It is only through such knowledge and consideration that we get at the real purport and proper bearing of their contents.

If the principles now briefly indicated respecting the Old Testament genealogies are rightly apprehended and applied, no difficulty need be experienced on the general subject, nor will hasty and groundless deductions be raised on them. For the individual peculiarities and occasional corruptions found in connection with some of them, we must refer to the particular names in connection with which they occur, and to the work of Lord Arthur Hervey already mentioned.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ. The question of chief moment, as regards the substance of the genealogies in relation generally to the interests of truth and righteousness, is the bearing they have upon the person of Jesus Christ, whether in reality he was, after the
G E N E A L O G I E S

1. One of these is common to both genealogies, and consists in this, that they both apparently give the descent of Jesus through Joseph, who was only his reputed father, not through Mary, who was his sole human parent. This has not always been admitted; and a very common, in itself plausible view of the subject, and other, that, if it were fairly tenable, would afford a ready solution of difficulties, has been to regard the one genealogy (Matthew’s) as that of our Lord’s legal connection with the house of David through Joseph, who in the eye of the law was his father, and the other (Luke’s) as that of his real parentage and descent through Mary. But the words of the latter evangelist cannot by a natural construction be made to yield this sense. Their precise rendering is, “And Jesus himself was about thirty years of age, when beginning to show in public, or to enter on his mission, being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph, who was the son of Heli, the son of Nца, the son of David, the son of Abraham.” The plain and natural meaning of the passage evidently is, that by the common reckoning Joseph was the father of Jesus, and that this Joseph was the son of Heli, and so on. The phrase ad was supposed, goes no farther than to intimate that it was but a reputed connection, the filial relationship of Jesus to Joseph. It indicates nothing as to there being any other link of connection with the remote progenitor Heli; for the Heli is manifestly in apposition with Joseph; and what Joseph was to Jesus, Heli also must have been, only a stage farther removed. Had the meaning been, that Jesus was the reputed son of Joseph, but in reality the son of Heli, namely, his grandson, through Mary the daughter of Heli, the construction in the original would have needed to be different. And in further proof of this, none of the ancients appear to have had the idea, that the words of St. Luke could have had any meaning but that given above; they never seem to have imagined that the evangelist meant to mark the relationship of Mary, and not of Joseph, to Heli.

This therefore must be regarded as one of the peculiarities in the two tables; while both evangelists record the miraculous conception of Jesus, and consequently disclaim the real parenthood of Joseph: yet when exhibiting the genealogical connection of Jesus with the house of David, they seem it enough to present the lineage of Joseph. How should this have been? Did Christ’s legal connection with Joseph, as the husband of Mary, of itself determine the question of his relationship to the house of David, and constitute him in truth a member of that house? So it may fairly seem to be indicated by the prominence which is given to the royal pedigree of Joseph. The evangelists not only content themselves with exhibiting Joseph’s genealogy, but when the angel goes to Mary to announce the miraculous conception, he is represented as going to a “virgin espoused to a man, whose name was Joseph, of the house of David,” Lk. i. 27. When the same or another angel is sent to Joseph to instruct him to consummate his marriage with Mary, he is saluted “Joseph, thou son of David,” Mat. i. 24 and, still again, when the circumstances are narrated which led to the confinement of Mary at Bethlehem, it is said that they went thither because, not she, but Joseph, was “of the house and lineage of David,” Lk. ii. 4. On this ground Augustine threat out the idea, that simply from Joseph’s relation to Mary by the marriage tie, he was Christ’s father, Christ being born of his wife in a manner far more intimate than if he had been adopted from another family. “And on this account,” he adds, “if any one should be able to prove that Mary had no blood relationship to David, it was competent to hold that Christ was the son of David, for the very same reason that Joseph was entitled to be called his father” (De Horn. Evang. ii. 9). There is undoubtedly an element of truth in this view. Jesus was the fruit of Joseph’s marriage with Mary, not indeed as the offspring of his body, but as God’s special gift to him through his proper spouse. In every case, children are God’s gifts to men; and if for high reasons God should dispense with the ordinary agency in bringing them forth, and substitute one extraordinary and miraculous, still the relationship in its essential characteristics would not be altered the offspring being brought forth in the way of God’s appointment, in lawful wedlock, would be entitled to the proper filial relationship to the head of the family. Thus Jesus was God’s gift to Joseph through his proper spouse; and Jesus being born in a Davidic family, the son by special dispensation of a Davidic person, he was in the eye both of human and divine law himself of the house of David. (Bolitze in Riedel’s Zeitschrift für d. LXX, 150 sq.)

Such, apparently was the view taken of the matter by the evangelist Matthew, perhaps by both the evangelists. But by no means excludes, it might possibly rather imply and take for granted, the relationship of Mary to the house of David. The days of the apostolic age, we can conceive, might admit her relationship, or make no question about it; but since the wife’s tribal or family connection was properly determined by that of her husband, they might demand satisfaction as to Joseph’s right to be reckoned of David’s lineage. In truth, Mary’s personal relationship to the same house is taken for granted by the angel who first announces to her the high distinction of the son she was to be honoured to bring forth, when he says, “And the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David,” Lk. i. 32: an announcement which was made before she could know that her husband to Joseph was to be carried into effect, and while she alone could be thought of as supplying an earthly link of connection with a particular family. It is most probable that her genealogy consisted at a comparatively short distance back with that of Joseph—a circumstance which, if it existed, could scarcely fail to be known generally at the time. At all events, the statements made upon the subject by the two evangelists seem to proceed upon the ground, that the relationship to the house of David belonged in common to Joseph and Mary.

2. But other peculiarities, and, on the supposition of both evangelists having given the genealogical

descent of Joseph, somewhat perplexing difficulties attach to the two tables. For they differ even in regard to one of the nearest links of the chain—the father of Joseph, who appears as Heli in Luke, and Jacob in Matthew. And in the whole period between Joseph and David they have but two or three names in common. This will be more readily seen from the following table, presenting this portion of the two genealogies:

Various schemes have been devised to account for this serious discrepancy, and reconcile it with the truth of things; but none was so readily adopted, or met with such general and continued acceptance, as that of Arianus, which proceeded on the principle that the table of Matthew indicates a stricter bond of relationship than that of Luke—that in announcing what son each father begat as his son begat the real or natural descent; while the latter, in naming successively the son of such an one as his father, included sons by adoption or relatives of the second and third degree; that, consequently, in the first evangelist we have the actual descent of Jesus from David; in the third, only the legal succession. It is strange that this explanation should ever have appeared satisfactory, and especially that it should have so long held its place, since the principle on which it is based is manifestly not in accordance with the facts of the case. The Jews made no such distinction in their genealogies as is implied in the explanation. It was all one whether these took the form of representing what son a father begat, or who stood in the relation of father to a son. In both cases alike they were wont to include a more distant, as well as a nearer degree of affinity. In the table itself of St. Matthew, we find no fewer than three links in the chain omitted: Judah is said to have begotten Onias, or Uzziah, although in reality he begat Ahaziah; and Ahaziah begat Jehu, and Jehu begat Uzziah. And instances are found in the Old Testament genealogies of persons being said to have begotten whole races and districts of people, merely because these spring from them, e.g. Ex. xii. 14; 1 Chron. ii. 20.

The proper solution of the difficulty under consideration appears to be that which was proposed by Calvin and some others about his time, but was first distinctly set forth and vindicated by Grotius. "For myself," he says, "I mistake not, by very clear and not fanciful grounds, I am fully convinced that Matthew has respect to the legal succession. For he recounts those who obtained the kingdom without the intermixture of a private name. Then, he says, Jehoachin begat Salathiel. But it was not doubtfully intimated by Jeremiah, under the command of God, that Jeconiah, on account of his sins, should die without children. His son, Neri, being afterwards assigned, and Luke assigns Neri as the father of the same Salathiel, a private man, while Matthew gives Jeconiah, the most obvious inference is, that Luke has respect to the right of consanguinity, Matthew to the right of succession, and especially the right to the throne—which right, since Jeconiah died without issue, devolved by legitimate order upon Salathiel, the head of the family of Nathan; for among the sons of David, Nathan came next to Solomon. On every account this seems to be the natural and proper mode of explanation. It first of all present a sufficient reason for the exhibition of a second genealogical table; for, as we plainly have the royal successions in Matthew's table, it could only be, if these did not in some instances accord with the actual parentage of the line which connected Jesus with David, that there could have been any temptation or conceivable reason for presenting another. Had Joseph's direct line of ancestors been all one with Solomon's direct or legal successors, this had been clearly the natural, as well as the most honourable, line of descent; no other had been needed, nor could it scarcely have been thought of. But if there were certain breaks in the line, then it came to be of some importance to know how the actual pedigree ran. It is also a confirmation of this view, that immediately after Jeconiah, when it is supposed Solomon's direct line was first broken, the two tables coincide—the names of Salathiel and Zerubbabel, the two next in order, being found in both. These would naturally be brought in from Nathan's line to take the place of Solomon's, which had come to a close in Jeconiah, of whom it was declared that "he must be written childless; for no man of his seed should prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah." Whether Jeconiah might have any children behind him or not, this authoritative utterance could scarcely be regarded otherwise than as a sentence of exclusion from all right to the honours of the kingdom; and Salathiel, the eldest in the next line of descent from David, would naturally be substituted by those who had the charge of the public registers. It would appear that after Zerubbabel there was at least another break in the direct line of descent; so that the tables again diverge till we come to the third from Joseph: for that the Matthew of Matthew is but a variation of the Matthan of Luke, there can be little doubt. Here the representative of the line appears once more to have become also the representative of the legal succession. Then, on the supposition of Matthan and Matthew being substantially one, Jacob, the son of Matthan, and Heli, the son of Matthan, must have been brothers; and if Jacob, the elder, had daughters, but no son, then Heli's son would come to be Jacob's heir-at-law. We have only to suppose farther, that this son of Heli was Joseph, and that Mary was a daughter of Jacob, in marrying whom he married his own cousin; and thus would come more readily to be recognized as legally the next of kin to Jacob, in order to establish the perfect agreement of the two accounts. These suppositions, and the view in connection with which they are advanced, are all quite natural; and they are borne out by many examples of a collateral kind in the Jewish genealogies. See for proof of this the able and learned investigation of the subject by Lord Arthur Hervey (The Genealogy of our Lord).

3. A name exists in the post-diluvian portion of the genealogy, as presented by Luke, which is not only wanting in Matthew, but is also wanting in the list of Genesis, etc. The name is that of Cainan, inserted in Luke's table between Sala and Arphaxad. It is quite uncertain how this second Cainan (prior one belonging to the antediluvian period being in all the tables should have originated. It is wanting in the Vatican copy of the Septuagint, but is in the other extant copies, though purged by the same copies in the corresponding table of 1 Chronicles. It is wanting also in the Samaritan Pentateuch, as well as the Hebrew; and seems to have been unknown to Josephus. Nor does it appear to have been in the copies of the Septuagint used by Theophilus of Antioch in the second century, by Africans in the third, or by Eusiceus in the fourth. Jerome, in his annotations on the table, takes no notice of it; but Augustine had it both in his copy of the Septuagint and his copy of St. Luke. There can be little doubt that the name has somehow crept in by mistake, but whether into the Septuagint first, and from that into the copies of Luke, or vice versa, cannot be certainly determined. The greater probability is, that it first appeared in the Septuagint. (So Caian, and more fully in Bochart's Phyleg. i. ii. c. 13.)

4. A peculiarity in Matthew's table: its division into three fourteen is, in perfect accordance with a very common practice among the Jews respecting genealogies. They occasionally resorted to artificial arrangements for the purpose of the memory. Lightfoot gives various instances in his Hist. Heb. on Mat. i.; and we have the following by Schwei. Zeman from the Synopsis of Sahad: "From Abraham to Solomon there are fifteen generations, and at that time the moon was full; from Solomon to Zedekiah there are again fifteen generations, and at that time the moon was down, and Zedekiah's eyes were put out." Arrangements of this sort would naturally lead to abbreviations of some of the divisions; as here, in the second portion of Matthew's table, three links, as already noticed, but left out, to restrict the number to fourteen. It is very probable, also, that some were omitted in the last division; since for the fourteen of Matthew, we have twenty two in Luke. But such omissions were constantly made in the genealogical tables, even when there was no such purpose to be served by it; and was indeed rendered necessary by the inconvenient length to which the tables, when kept in full, often extended. It may be added, that to make out the second fourteen, either David must be counted again, made the first of the second, as he had been the last of the first division, or after Josiah there must have dropped out a name: that of Jehoiakim. This name is given in a few MSS, in the form "Laxax; and whether it should be in this text of not, certainly Josiah did beget Jehoiakim, and Jehoiakim Joachin; so that if the existing text is correct, we have again the intentional omission of a link in the chain.

5. A still further peculiarity may be noticed in the table of Matthew, which may be regarded as an additional proof of the respect had to system in its construction. It is the mention of certain female names in it, which are altogether five—Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Uriah's wife (Ruth'sheba), closing with Mary, the wife of Joseph: all, it will be observed, out of the usual course; and is viewed as regards the production of a chosen seed, and striking monuments in the successive generations of the grace and power of God. By much the most illustrious instance of this was Mary, chosen, though a fallen sinful woman, to be the mother of that holy One who should be called the Son of the Highest. And as types of the virgin mother in this respect—types of the more remarkable and significant kind, the evangelist brings in remembrance, as he passes along the line of preceding generations, those ancestral mothers in Israel, who, from their natural relationship or their previous history, might justly be regarded as wonders in Israel, and as such prophecies of the amazing phenomenon realized in the person of the Virgin. The connamonizing wonder might thus seem related, as it had in part been anticipated, by what had gone before it.

GENERATION. This word is used in at least three shades of meaning in Scripture, which, however, are all closely related, and naturally grow out of each other. (1) The radical meaning is that of the production of offspring, viewed whether it be naturally produced, or related to the parent. In this sense it is applied to the offspring of an individual, or successive offspring noted in a genealogical table. Such a table was called by the Hebrews sopher toledoth, or Greek στοιχεία γενεαλογίας, book of generations, of de, xv. xvi. cx. i., i.e. lists of successive lines of descent from father to son. (2) Then it is used as a mark of time—the successive lines of offspring being taken to represent so many stages in the world's history. Differing in the intervals at this respect from one stage to another, generation could never be intended to mark a very definite period, and it must be understood with some latitude. But people in such cases readily come to strike a sort of average in their minds; and so many successive generations are observed to fill up the interval between two or more notable points of history, so they take generation to signify much about that space of time. Thus Herodotus says, "three generations (τρεις γενεαλογίας) of men make an hundred years" (i. 121). The term is generally used more indefinitely in Scripture, much in the sense of time, or successive divisions of time, as in Ac. xx. 21, "from ancient generations," q. d. from times of old; Acts iv, "in bygone generations," q. d. times that have gone past; 1 Th. ii, "to generations of generations," q. d. to periods of periods, or one age after another. (3) Finally, the word is sometimes taken more concretely to denote the persons actually constituting a specific generation, as exponents of its state or character. In this sense our Lord speaks of "this generation," or "an adulterous and sinful generation," "an unbelieving generation," Matt. xxi. 40; xxv. 13, 31, and the apostles of an "evil" or "ungodly generation," Acts xvii. 25-28. In all such expressions the existing races are viewed, not in regard to their paternity, or in the light of offspring, nor as filling up a certain space of time, but as possessing and exhibiting distinctive marks of character; they are identified with their age or time as its concrete representatives. In the same sense our Lord speaks of the children of this world being "in respect to their own generation" (for so the words should be rendered), Isa. xxi. 5, εἰς τοὺς γενεαλογίας τούτους, wiser than the children of light; i.e. in dealing with men of their own stamp and character, they manifest a wisdom which is but rarely Genesis, the book of. 1. Name and contents. The first book of the Bible is named in the Hebrew canon as Genesen, "In the beginning," from the term with which it commences (as in like manner the other divisions of the Pentateuch are denominated either from their initial or first specific words; and by the LXX., Genesis, in the sense as well and indeed chiefly of 'origination' or 'production,' as of its more common biblical acceptance, 'generation' or 'genealogy,' as in Matt. i. 1. The Greek title is exceedingly improper to the contents of the work, which show it to be truly a genealogical as well as the material universe, ch. i. 1, of man and of all history; a genealogy of sin so far as man is concerned, but not as a means of salvation through a promised Redeemer, ch. iii. But more particularly this book is an account of the origin of the Hebrew nation, the seed of Abraham, in their character of the divinely designated channels of redemption to the human race fallen in Adam.

Genesis consists of two great but closely connected divisions. The contents of the first part form a general introduction to the sacred volume, but more particularly to the history which forms the subject of the second part. This will appear from the sub-joined synopsis:

1. The history of the creation and the human race to the call of Abraham, the father of the Israelitish nation, ch. i.-xi., viz.:--

A general history of the creation, ch. i.-ii. 3; a particular account of the creation of man, the provision made for him, and the law under which he was placed, ch. i.xvii., man's violation of that law; the consequences of his transgression, with the divine intention of a recovery, ch. iii. commencement of the history of fallen humanity in the propagation of the race, which is seen to consist morally of two classes, but without prejudice to the divine promise, ch. iv. This last particular confirmed by the genealogy of Adam in the line of Seth down to Noah, ch. v., when the corruption of mankind reached a degree which called down a judgment on the guilty, which, while destroying the wicked, saved a godly seed for re- peopling the earth, ch. vi.-ix.; the descendants of the family thus saved, and their dispersion over the earth, ch. x.-xi.

2. The history of Abraham (to which ch. xi. 37-32 is the special introduction) and of the other Hebrew patriarchs to the death of Joseph, including notices of Abraham and Isaac's descendants in the collateral lines, ch. xii.-xlv. 1, viz.:--

(1.) History of Abraham: his call and journey to Canaan accompanied by his kinsman Lot, ch. xi.-xxxii.; his journeyings in that land and descent into Egypt, ch. xiv.-xx.; his return to Canaan and separation from Lot, who removed towards Sodom, ch. xiii.; invasion of the land; Lot taken captive, but rescued by Abraham, who pursued and defeated the invaders, ch. xiv.; renewal and enlargement of the divine promises to Abraham, ch. xxv.; birth of Ishmael by Hagar, ch. xxvi.; further divine communications with Abraham, ch. xxviii.; destruction of Sodom and deliverance of Lot, with notice of his posterity, ch. xxvii.; further details in Abraham's history, ch. xxvii.; birth of Isaac by Sarah, ch. xxviii.; trial of Abraham by the call to sacrifice Isaac, ch. xxiv.; Sarah's death, ch. xxv.; Isaac's marriage, ch. xxvii.; Abraham's death, ch. xxvii.

(2.) History of Isaac, with brief introductory notice of Ishmael and his sons, ch. xxvii.-xxviii.; birth of Isaac's two sons, Esau and Jacob, ch. xxviii.; Isaac's sojourn in Gerar, ch. xxix.-xxxii.; his return to Beersheba; Jacob's birth, &c.; Isaac's patriarchal blessing, ch. xxx.; xxvii.; Isaac's death, ch. xxx.

(3.) Jacob's journey from his departure for Mesopotamia; divine promises made to him on the journey, ch. xxxviii.; his arrival at Haran, the residence of his uncle Laban; his marriages and issues, ch. xxvii.-xxxvii.; his desires for home, and journey thither, ch. xxxvii.-xxxix.; troubles and discourses in Jacob's family, ch. xxxvii.-xxxviii.

(4.) Joseph's history, with settlement of Jacob's family in Egypt. Jacob's affliction for his son Joseph, ch. xxxviii.-xlvii.; Joseph's first birth, ch. xxxix.; Joseph's imprisonment, ch. xxxix.-xl.; his promotion at the Egyptian court, ch. xli.; the journeys of his brothers to Egypt to purchase corn, ch. xli.-xlii.; removal of Jacob and family to, and settlement in Egypt, ch. xliii.-xliv.; Jacob's blessing on his sons, ch. xliv.; his death and burial, and death of Joseph, ch. xlv.

There is another division of Genesis designated by the superscriptions, "These are the generations," or "This is the book of the generations," at the head of various sections. It is not however of the importance which Kurz (Die Einheit der Genesis, p. 159, Berlin, 1870) attaches to it: for strictly speaking there are eleven such superscriptions, and not ten, as he maintains—two of them in the genealogy of Esau, ch. xxxiv. 1, 9, and five only have a direct bearing on the plan of Genesis. These are the generations of Adam, ch. ii.-vi.; Noah, ch. vi.-iv. 29; Abraham included in that of Terah, ch. xi. 27-xxx. 11; Isaac, ch. xxvii.-xxxv.; and Jacob, ch. xxxvii.-liii.; for upon these members of the genealogical register the whole history hinges.

11. Nature and importance of its history.—It was entirely to mistake the character of the history of Genesis, or indeed of the Bible at large, to view it as having any other than a sacred purpose. It is in no sense a civil history, or record of general revolutions in human affairs, or even of intellectual and social progress. Genesis opens with an account of the origin of the earth and its various inhabitants, showing the preparations made for man, the special subject of this history, in his moral and spiritual relations. The object of this record, however, it is obvious was not to teach science or natural history, but to point out distinctly the relation of Creator and creature, the fundamental idea of all true religion and worship. Nor are the delineations of the progress of human affairs given in the immediately succeeding portions of Genesis composed in the spirit of mere secular history. There are indeed incidental notices of the kind which constitutes the staple of such compositions: as the origin of the arts by the Cainites, the founding of cities and empires by Nimrod, and particularly the wars of the confederate kings in the time of Abraham; but all these matters are referred to in a way which plainly shows their entire subordination to the sacred character of the narrative. The whole history of the Cainites is disposed of in the compass of a few verses, 6:14-29, while the particulars there noticed are added only as indications of the character of this elder branch of the human family, and of the sources whence they looked for happiness. The wars of the kings, too, are noticed simply on account of the part Abraham performed in rescuing his kinman Lot, and of his interview on this occasion with Melchizedek. But it is from the relative importance given to the several subjects introduced, that the special purpose of the historian more fully appears. In the narrative of creation, the religious aim of the writer at once appears from the comparatively large space occupied with the account of man, when compared with the biographic sketches of the Hebrew patriarchs. The simplest domestic incidents in the lives of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are, in the view of the historian of Genesis, of greater moment than the rise and revolutions of empires. But even when the details are most exquisite, it is the moral and spiritual life of the individual concerned that comes prominently into view. In the account, for instance, of Abraham’s sojourn in Egypt, where an opportunity was afforded to the writer for stating many interesting particulars regarding that country, only one incident is recorded, beauteous living on the patriarch’s character, and though not redounding to his honour, yet manifesting the protection afforded him by God. That the historian, had it suited his purpose, could have furnished particulars which a modern Egyptologist would highly prize, appears from the matters incidentally introduced in this connection. Such information, however, was foreign to the aim of this record as a revelation of God’s plan which is never lost sight of or subordinated to any other consideration.

Nevertheless with respect to such foreign and subordinate matters on which it incidentally touches the history of Genesis is of inestimable value. Even in a secular point of view there is no record which can be brought into competition with it. Taking the very lowest estimate there is absolutely nothing in the whole range of ancient literature which could supply the place of this document if lost; while it is further to be observed that if confidence cannot be reposed in its authenticity, no reliable information exists on many subjects with which it is desirable man should be acquainted, and after which there is indeed naturally an intense longing in the human mind; as for instance the origin and the earliest history of mankind, a subject which without the information supplied in Genesis must be involved in impenetrable darkness. But this is taking the very lowest ground; for the matters adverted to and others of a like character are of little moment except when viewed in the relation which they occupy in this history, by means of its disclosures on the subject of human redemption. With regard to this point the notices in Genesis are very full, showing the necessity in which such a revelational provision originated, and the form in which it was first announced, and subsequently repeated with ever-increasing definiteness, but which even in its obscurest announcements gave being to a life of faith, various evidences and examples of which appear throughout and from the very commencement of this history, giving form and substance to the narrative.

It is accordingly a revelation of God, and of man as related to God his Creator and Redeemer, that the importance of Genesis is to be estimated. More particularly this record was intended to serve as an introduction to the theocracy, or peculiar arrangement into which God entered with the Israelites for the purpose of carrying out his covenant with Abraham and his posterity. It was, therefore according to the great principle which gives coherence not only to Genesis but to the whole biblical history.

The second portion of Genesis is intimately connected with the first, which is an introduction not so much to the lives of the patriarchs as to the whole history and contents of the sacred volume. Abraham is pre-eminent the head of a new dispensation, but his appearance on the page of history has nothing in it abrupt or unexpected. On the contrary the patriarch stands forth in the closest relation to the fundamental principle which directs this narrative. His descent is clearly traced from Adam, the father of the human family, through Seth, “the seed given in the room of Abel,” 6:13-25, down to Noah, the second father of mankind, and thence in the line of Shem, who, it was predicted, should occupy a special relation to Jehovah, and mediately as regards his brethren, ch. 11, 25, 26. Abraham’s divine call and consequent migration to Canaan form the first practical step in furtherance of that peculiar mediatorial arrangement, the germ of which appeared in the announcement of the relation of Shem and Japheth, and through which, as afterwards more fully declared to Abraham, mankind should ultimately be blessed, ch. 12, 18. In the history of man, as recorded in the first portion of Genesis, every step in advance showed only a further divergence from the original unity, moral and social, and locally from the central residences first in Eden, ch. 4, 15, and afterwards in the plain of Shinar, ch. 10, migrations and dispersions required and contemplated indeed in the original constitution, but without the feelings of alienation which subsequently ensued. In the call of Abraham, however, a new unity was established; an individual was elected out of the mass for the purpose of uniting the scattered nations by new and indissoluble bonds. Yet as if seemingly to defeat this purpose, one branch after another of Abraham's posterity is excluded from the chosen line: first Ishmael, and next Esau; but this excision served in reality to consolidate to the utmost the desired unity; for this prolongation of the single stem to the third generation gave the required direction to its vital energies, besides answering other purposes in the divine economy, as showing that the promised blessings were dependent not on the ordinary course of nature but solely on divine grace.

III. IHi Prophecic Character.—Scripture history, even in its strictest sense, and this preeminently the case with that of Genesis, is not simply retrospective; it has also from its very nature and aim a special aspect to the future, being largely induced with prophetic elements in addition to predictions which are more expressly such. It is concerned with principles more than with persons, and with the latter only or chiefly as illustrating the former. It is certainly not on the ground of mere prediction or any similar partiality that the Mosaic history is a record of the failings, no less truly than of the heroism of the "father of the faithful" and the other patriarchs. It is a revelation of God by its being at the same time a revelation of man, who in creation was constituted "the image of God." Thus too it is that while the earliest notices of Genesis are few and fragmentary as regards the history of the times or of individuals, more especially previous to the Abrahamic age, they nevertheless with all their scantiness afforded comparatively ample materials for elucidating and confirming the truths which, whether deducible from its history or announced doctrinally, constituted the Bible, when it contained no more than the book of Genesis, a suitable religious instructor. How inaccessible an element the past or merely personal formed in this history appears, for instance, from the scanty notices of Adam after the fall compared with the particulars recorded of him prior to that event, when he sustained a relation affecting his posterity and all future time. So also with regard to the history of Cain and Abel, ch. iv. where little more is mentioned than an act of worship and the consequences which thence resulted. But as one of the few notices of Adam, ch. iii. 28, evinced his dependence on the first prophecy of the gospel, ch. ii. 15, so the specific purpose of the history of the first two brothers was to show how, notwithstanding the spread of sin with the propagation of the race, the divine idea embodied in the promise of redemption through "the seed of the woman" began to be realized in and through humanity, by the establishment of the kingdom of God in antagonism to the power of evil which was now visibly exercising an influence in the world, ch. iv. 25, 26.

It is this prophetic element, consistently presented from the commencement almost of the biblical narrative, and gradually developed through the progress of events, rather than the more external or formal links of genealogy and chronology, that imparts a living unity not only to Genesis, but to the entire volume to which it forms an introduction. Through the influence of this principle too the use of faith in primitive times "called on the name of the Lord," ch. iv. 26, and had their hopes directed to a future which should witness the removal of the curse imposed on the ground for man's sin, ch. v. 29, while, without advertting to the intermediate examples, Jacob, at the very close of Genesis, sustained in the same way, with his dying breath intimates, "I have waited for the salvation, O Lord," ch. xliii. 16. The entire series of divine revelations, as well as those on other points, was of a progressive character, the earlier being truly the germ of the later development, and however formally yet not essentially different from it. It is this which gives to Genesis its intrinsic value, and secures for it a permanent place in the volume of inspiration, and in fact prevents any portion of that volume from ever becoming obsolete. The truth announced in the promise "the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent," and running like a golden thread through successive systems and dispensations till reduced to the historic form, "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law," ch. iii. 15, further gives to the whole a unity which palpably stamps on it a divine signature; for He only who sees the end from the beginning could direct such various and complicated adjustments for carrying out the purposes announced in this history.

IV. Its Generality and Credibility.—Reserving for the article PENTATEUCH the general discussion as to the unity, anti-unity, authorship, and credibility of that portion of Scripture ascribed to Moses, notice need be here taken only of such special objections as apply to Genesis. These are to the effect that it bears traces of the production not of one but of several writers, and of an age long subsequent to that of Moses. Certain German critics, by the application of rules and criteria of their own, pronounce the whole Pentateuch, but especially Genesis, to be an aggregate of heterogeneous fragments, without however being able to agree as to their nature or the manner of their combination; some supposing them to be the productions of two or at most three writers, whereas others, with equal confidence, have maintained another, the highest of these numbers; some again assuming that the several documents or fragments have been connected by the merest accident, while others discern in the compilation a most skilful literary operation. Hence the various names "document," "fragment," and "complement hypothesis," used in this disintegrating criticism. At first this theory was limited to the book of Genesis; and while so limited by Vitringa, who was among the first to raise the question as to the sources of Moses' information on matters prior to his own time, and subsequently by Astruc, who sought to define the number and character of the supposed memoirs, it excited little interest, for such an use of earlier documents was perfectly reconcilable with the Mosaic authorship and inspired character of Genesis. Even Eichhorn's scheme, a modification of Astruc's, was of a somewhat harmless character, notwithstanding his doubts that the compiler of Genesis from the two original documents might have been another than Moses, for this did not necessarily follow from the scheme itself, which was still confined to the pre-Mosaic period. Eichhorn, while admitting the extreme difficulty of separating documents so carefully interwoven, set himself to mark off their respective portions, larger and smaller, sometimes consisting only of verses or even clauses, distinguishing also the interpolations of the compiler, and even to correct the errors of the original autograph, due, as he said, to the inad- vance of the compiler. This arbitrary emendation of the text, which, but for the fact that it was Scripture that was subjected to such treatment, might be viewed as critical pleasantry, was carried to a greater length by Eichhorn's followers, as by thus conforming the text to the theory there was an easy avoidance of all perplexities. The separation of the assumed documents was effected chiefly through the recurrence of the divine names Elohim and Jehovah, alleged to be characteristic of different writers. Subsidiary texts were also resorted to, and latterly to a greater extent than when the scheme was first propounded; but the interchange of the divine names has always been its governing principle, and hence in no case, that much weight is attached to other characteristics of style and expression. In some passages there is a concurrence of these with the divine name supposed to be appropriate to them; but even when, as often happens, the reverse is the case, it occasions no difficulty to the critics, as they at once assume that there has been an interpolation from the other document, or that the anomaly is owing to an oversight of the compiler. But even this did not suffice; the scheme itself has been subjected to modifications which continually present it in new aspects. Hagen would modify it by rejecting the interpolations of Eichhorn, and assuming the existence of three original documents instead of two; the result of which was that passages which, on leaving the hands of Eichhorn, had some extent and uniformity, were by Hagen's process reduced to a complete mosaic. Other theories specially followed, differing from the original and from one another; for while Hagen and Gramberg were labouring to perfect the scheme of Eichhorn, but in reality were only showing its untenable character, others were actively setting about its destruction, with the view of substituting in its stead something fitted to tell more powerfully against the genuineness of the Pentateuch. Such was the aim of the "fragment-hypothesis" of Vater, extended to the whole Pentateuch, but of so wild a character that it found no reception. De Wette attempted, but unsuccessfully, to form a compromise between it and the other schemes. Meantime so effectually were these views combated by Banke, Hengstenberg, and Havernick, in works embracing the whole Pentateuch, and by Ewald, Denkel, and more recently Kurtz, so far as concerned Genesis, that De Wette was changing his ground with almost every successive edition of his Eichhorn. To the reaction thus occasioned must be further ascribed the "complement-hypothesis" of Tuch — a formidable opponent to the "document-hypothesis" both in its earlier and later forms. Tuch admits a definite plan and internal connexion in Genesis, and so escapes many of the objections to which the other theories were exposed, and which necessitated a constant change in the position of their advocates. But there are other objections to which this theory only gives additional force, and which are overlooked only by expediency as forced and arbitrary as any of Eichhorn's. It is unnecessary however to pursue this subject further, or attempt the refutation of these conflicting theories, the newest forms of which are successively supplanting the older. The more recent are those of Ewald and Hayfield; the former so utterly extravagant that it has found no advocate beyond its author, and the other a revival of the scheme of Gramberg. But as a more tangible ground of objection to the genuineness of Genesis is the alleged traces of a post-Mosaic age, these require to be considered. A distinction, it is obvious, must be made between anachronisms of a subjective character, originating merely in dogmatic preconceptions, and such as relate to matters of fact. Thus, the rejection of prophecy leads critics like Vater, Von Bohlen, and Kalisch, to conclude that passages of Scripture declaratory of matters realized in the history of Israel must have been written subsequent to such events. But even as regards matters of fact, the existence of anachronisms requires to be placed beyond doubt, before they can have any weight in such a case, just because of the improbability of a writer who wished his work to pass as that of an earlier age allowing such contradictions. To notice, however, a few examples: Hebron, Genesis i. 18, xii. 2; it is alleged from Jos. xiv. 15; xv. 13, it was not so named until the entrance into Canaan, its ancient name being Kirjath-Arba, Genesis xxv. 2. That Hebron was the original name appears from the fact that on its first mention it is so designated. In Abraham's time it was also called Mamre, Genesis xviii. 19, from an Amorite prince of that name, Genesis xiii. 18; xiv. 3. Subsequently, but prior to the Mosaic age, the Anakim possessed the place, when it received the name of Kirjath-Arba, Genesis xiv. 13, "a great man among the Anakim," Judges ii. 10. The place Dan, Genesis ii. 10, it is also alleged, received that name only in the time of the judges from the tribe of Dan, its original name being Leish or Leshem, Judges xii. 16, xiii. 20. The locality however is quite distinct: the former is Dan-Jaan between Gilead and the country round about Zidon, 2 Kings xi. 16, the adjacent Jaan being intended to distinguish it from Dan-Leish in the same neighbourhood. The explanatory remarks added to the names of certain places as "Ib.a, which is Zear," Genesis xv. 2, "En-mishpat, which is Kadesh," Numbers xxv. 7, and some others, the opponents of the genuineness regard as indications of a later age, but considering that these explanations were required even for the Mosaic age, as the ancient designations were forgotten or rarely used. For proving them to be anachronisms it must be shown that the new names were unknown in the time of Moses, though with the exception of "the king's dukes," Judges i. 7, which does not again occur till 2 Samuel viii. 18, almost all the names are retained in the books of the immediately succeeding period. The notice that "the Canaanites were then in the land," Genesis viii. 5; xiv. 7, is thought to imply that the Canaanites were still in possession of Palestine, and so could not have been written till after their expulsion. But such is not the import of the passage. The descent of the Canaanites from Ham, and their progress from the south towards Palestine, had been described, Genesis x. 16, and they are now represented as in possession of the land to which the "sons of Eber" were advancing from an opposite point. Standing in connection with the promise of the land to Abraham, this notice contrasts the present with the promised future. The remark, "while there reigned any king over the children of Israel," Genesis xxxiv. 11, could not have been made, it is maintained, until the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy—an assumption which oversteps the relation of this statement to the promises to the patriarchs of a royal posterity, and especially that in an immediately preceding passage, Genesis xxxv. 9. It stands in a relation similar to Deuteronomy xiv. 14, where the erection of a kingdom is viewed as a necessary step in Israel's development. This explanation will of course not satisfy those who hold that in a simple historical style a statement having such prophetic reference, "is not only preposterous but impossible" (Kilgour, Genesis, p. 401), but against prepossessions of this kind there is no arguing.

To the credibility of Genesis there are numerous attestations. Every department of learning and research, wherever they bear upon its contents, are favourable in their testimony. Even scientific discoveries, which for a time were viewed as standing in opposition to some of its earliest statements, are now found not only to admit of reconciliation with a correct exposition of the text, but also to prove that the writer must have drawn his information from a higher source than human reasonings or imaginations. Particularly important is the confirmation which the genealogical table in Ge. x. is daily receiving at the hands of philologists and scientific explorers: all the lines of history and science converge to an original unity of mankind, and to the plains of Shinar as the second cradle of the race. A striking characteristic of this table, compared with the legends of heathenism respecting the origin of nations, is its freedom from all mythical elements. Everything rests on the basis of ordinary humanity; there is nothing of gods, demigods, or heroes. The founders of nations have nothing in name or character of the confused mixture of divine and human so prominent in Indian and Greek ethnologies. And it is so little confirmation of the truth of this record, that besides the testimony of modern ethnology, the heathen legends when stripped of their embellishments wonderfully harmonize with its statements.

It is however when the biblical narrative refers to Egypt that the most ample confirmations of its historical accuracy can be produced. Something, indeed, may be gathered from the researches of Layard, Rawlinson, and Lutfis amid the ruins of Asyria and Babylonia, but it was not till after the Mosaic age that the great empire on the Tigris and Euphrates rose into importance. Not so however with Egypt, the birthplace of the accredited author of the Pentateuch, and whose intimate acquaintance with all that related to that country—its history, manners and laws, its productions and physical peculiarities—while one of the strongest testimonies in favour of the Mosaic origin of the work, is no less conclusive with respect to its credibility. Had space permitted, numerous particulars might be adduced fully bearing out this statement, but this is the less necessary because the whole subject is fully illustrated in several popular works, by Taylor, Hengstenberg, Osburn, and Hawkins. One example only need be cited, showing the accuracy of the Hebrew historian as compared with such writers as Plutarch and Herodotus. The notice of the vine in the account of the chief butler's dream was objected to because of certain statements by these writers; one to the effect that the Egyptian kings were not permitted to drink wine until a period long subsequent to that referred to in Genesis, and the other that no vines grew in Egypt. But an appeal to the monuments puts the matter beyond dispute, and decides it in favour of the author of Genesis (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 140-158).

But it is not upon this or any other external testimony, however favourable to its historical credibility, that the authority of Genesis or any other portion of Scripture is to be rested. This most ancient of records in particular carries in it its own evidence. Its contents, particularly its prophetic intimations, whether conveyed by type or in express terms, show it to be part of one harmonious whole, whose vast and varied arrangements, dating from "the beginning," and genuinely comprehending all theology and history, could have been the production only of God.

V. Its Chronology. All the more important questions connected with the chronology of Genesis having been considered in the article CHRONOLOGY, they need not be introduced here. Additional remarks on the biblical date of the human period, as contrasted with the speculations of some modern writers on the subject, and with the extravagant claims to antiquity by several heathen nations, will be found in the article Creation, where it is shown that the moderation of the Hebrew historian in this respect is a strong testimony in favour of his work.

expression to it; and their carnal folly and infatuation drew along with it a fearful retribution, especially at the last, when, refusing to do the part it behoved them to do to the Gentiles, the Jews as a people were cast off, and the Gentiles brought into their place. By this relative exchange of places the Gentiles are warned to remember by what tenure they hold their position, and are also admonished to do with all zeal and fidelity for the Jews what the Jews have been so severely punished for refusing to do for them. Ex. xxi.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE, See Temple.

GENTLE-BATH (גנטל), a Hebrew word, but possibly of Egyptian origin, the name of the son of Hadad, born to him in Egypt of his Egyptian wife, Ex. xvi. 22. The father left Egypt in order to prosecute his hostile designs against Solomon, but nothing is known of Gentle-bath except that he was weaned by Tahpenes, the queen of Egypt, and brought up in the royal household, as if he had been a son of Pharaoh.

GERA (קרג), is given at Ge. xxvi. 21 as one of the sons of Benjamin. In the fresh-table of Benjamin's offspring given at Nu. xxvi. 51, seq., Gera is not mentioned, which probably rose from the respect there evidently had to families, so that the descendants of Gera would be included among the Ephraites. Again, in the table found at 1 Ch. xiii. 1-5, there are two Geras, the second being probably a corruption in the text, and both sons of Bech, the eldest son of Benjamin. It is probable that Gera was actually the son of Bech, and the grandson of Benjamin, and that in Genesis he is reckoned among the sons of Benjamin, as having ultimately become the head of a family of that tribe. Others seem to be mentioned as in the same generation, not as being actually the immediate sons of Benjamin.

GERAH, the smallest Hebrew coin, the twentieth part of a shekel, equal to about three halfpence of our money. (See Weights.)

GERAR [probably place of mischief, helplessness], a Philistine town of great antiquity. It occurs in the history both of Abraham and of Isaac, Ge. xvi. 20-21, and was even then the seat of a chieftain or king, who bore the name of Abimelech. It lay between Kadesh and Shur, and consequently towards what was afterwards the extreme south-west of the land of Canaan. This also appears from the proximity in which it lay to Beer-sheba, Ne. xxxv. 22-25. That it was in those early times a more than usually fertile region, or somehow had command of resources which were not elsewhere enjoyed in the neighborhood, may be inferred from its having been resorted to both by Abraham and Isaac in a time of famine. It appears also to have been in existence in the comparatively later periods of Israelitic history, being mentioned in the wars of Achi, 2 Ch. xiv. But it must have relatively decreased in importance, as it never appears again or is it once mentioned in the history of the warlike operations that were carried on between the Israelites and the Philistines after the period of the conquest. In the inventory of Elisha and Jerome it is placed 25 Roman miles to the south of Eleutheropolis. Robinson and most modern travellers speak of having been unable to find any traces of it. But Mr. Williams (Holy City) appeared, on his way from Gaza to Khelban, came in the direction to what was called Joseph's Gera, the reputed grave of Gera, and found near this certain ruins, which he took to be those of the ancient Gerar. It may be so, but the information seems rather scanty for founding any definite conclusion upon.

Vol. I.
GEHUR [hö-yör], a place or district first associated with Ammon or Syria, as among the conquests of Jair, the son of Manasseh. After stating that he had three and twenty cities in the land of Gilead, it is said, Jair took "Geshur and Aram, with the towns of Jair, from them, with Kenath, and the towns thereof, three-score cities," Josh. xiii. While these places were taken, they were held only as subject territories, still to a great extent occupied by their original inhabitants. For it is expressly stated in Josh. xvi. 15, that notwithstanding that the land of Gilead, and the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites; and all Bashan, had been subdued, yet, "the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites until this day." It is plain, however, from these notices, that Geshur lay in that portion of Syria which was connected with, or adjoined to, the land of Gilead, and that the conquered but not expelled Geshurites probably dwelt in the rocky fastnesses of Argoß. This region is supposed to be the same with that now called the Lejah, and is remarkable for its singularly wild and ragged character. Burckhardt says, "In the interior parts of the Lejah the rocks are in many places sheer-sided, so that the whole hill appears shivered, and in the act of falling down." &c. And Porter, after quoting Burckhardt, says, "No description can approach the reality. One cannot repress a shudder when he finds himself in such a den, surrounded by armed hordes, on whose faces the country seems to have stamped its own savage aspect." Ibrahim Pasha, flushed with victory, and moved by the obstinacy of a handful of Broches, attempted to drive them away from this stronghold; but, however, a soldier who entered returned, every neck cocked an enemy. . . . The Lejah has for ages been a sanctuary for outlaws, and not uncommonly a refuge for the oppressed" (Handbook for Syria and Palestine, p. 261).

It was the king of this wild and rocky district, Talmai king of Geshur, whose daughter Maachah was taken by David for one of his wives, 2 Sam. iii. 8. She was probably a person of superior beauty, as she became the mother of the two handsomest of David's children, Absalom and Tamar. How David should have thought of getting a wife from such a quarter, or what prior link of connection between himself and the king of Geshur might have led to such a result, is left unnoted in the history. But possibly the Geshurites, who are mentioned among the tribes against whom David made incursions while he dwelt in Ziklag, 1 Sam. xix. 8, and who, from the name being once found in connection with the Philistines, Jos. xiii. 3, are generally supposed to have been a different tribe from the other, may after all have been the same. The Geshurites, very probably, from their fastnesses in Argoß were wont to sally forth, like the Amalekites, in occasional raids upon the districts to the south and east of Palestine, without having any settled habitations there; and David might justly regard them (though located at some distance), equally with the Amalekites who are mentioned along with them, as fair subjects for making reprisals upon. In that case he would be brought into close contact with Talmi, first, indeed, as occupying a hostile relation to him, but not unceasingly afterwards as wishing to form with him a bond of alliance. Amid the troubles and difficulties which accompanied David's access to the throne, a marriage into the family of the king of Geshur might seem to afford a prospect not to be slighted of strengthening his position. As it ultimately proved, this alliance became the source of one of his greatest dangers, in giving birth to the fascinating, but restless and aspiring Absalom. Any temporary advantage David might derive from being married to the daughter of such a king, was nothing compared with the misfortune of having such a son. And in fleeing, as Absalom did, after committing the outrage on his brother Amnon, to the court of his maternal grandfather at Geshur, 2 Sam. xix. 23, one can easily understand how secure a refuge he might find there, while he required to be in concealment, but at the same time how unlikely it was his ambition could remain long satisfied with its treacherous aspect and dreadful seduction.

GETHESEMANE [probably compounded of Ὠδεῖα, "oil press," and ἔσσω, "press," "oil press," a place where oil from the olives growing in the neighbourhood was wont to be made; but in gospel history the place which has been rendered for ever sacred and memorable by the last sufferings of our Lord. The descriptions given by the evangelists of this spot are singularly brief and general. With St. Matthew it is merely "a place called Gethsemane," so also St. Mark; in St. Luke it is "he went, as he was wont, to the Mount of Olives." St. John is the most specific, who says, "Jesus went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered with his disciples." Not even here, however, is the locality clearly defined; and putting all together, we learn no more from the sacred poesy, than that Gethsemane was a garden—by the very name is probably to be understood a sort of orchard—on the farther side of the brook Cedron, and somewhere about the foot of the Mount of Olives. The traditional site—fixed on, it is supposed, at the visit of Helena, the mother of Constantine, in A.D. 326—places it a very little beyond the Cedron (145 feet), and quite near to the church of the Virgin Mary, alleged to have been built over her tomb. Maunder describes it in his day (1667) as "an open plot of ground, not above fifty-seven yards square, lying between the foot of mount Olivet and the brook Cedron. It is well planted with olive trees, and those of so old a growth that they are believed to be the same that stood there in our blessed Saviour's time, in virtue of which persuasion the olives, and olive stones, and oil which they produce become an excellent commodity in Spain." That the antiquity of the olives was so very great, Maunder could not believe, because of what is related in Josephus (War, vi. 19), that Titus cut down all the trees within a hundred furlongs of Jerusalem, to supply himself with materials for prosecuting the siege. There can, indeed, be no certainty as to the precise age of the trees; but it is admitted by all travellers, that the eight which still stand upon the spot in question near the marks of a venerable antiquity—having gnarled trunks and a thin foliage. Some years ago the plot of ground was bought by the Latin church; and having been inclosed by a wall, the interior is hid out in walks and flower-beds after the fashion of a modern European garden—a kind of gardening which cannot be regarded as an improvement. The Armenian or Greek church, however, denies that this is the actual site, and has fixed upon another as the proper one, at some little distance to the north of it. It is doubtful if either is the actual scene of our Lord's agony. The Latin site, in particular, is so near to the city, and so close upon the thoroughfare which must have been connected with the bridge and roads in the immediate neighbourhood, that it seems to have been impossible of affording the secrecy indispensable to such a scene. Even the Armenian or Greek site appears too near for the purpose; and some place probably several hundred yards farther up the vale, and to the north-east of the church of St. Mary, is thought by the more judicious explorers to answer better to the requirements of the evangēlical narrative (see, for example, Robinson, Thomson, partly also Stanley, Bichmann, &c.) It is plain, however, that the materials are wanting for enabling any one to decide with absolute certainty upon the precise spot.

GEZER, or GAZER (ancient part, probably isolated or precordial), the name of one of the royal cities of the Canaanites, belonging to what afterwards became the territory of Ephraim, and somewhere in its western border. Jos. xvi. 24. It was afterwards assigned to the Levites, although the ancient inhabitants were not expelled from it, Jos. xxii. 44; iv. 19. In process of time the Israelites took possession of it, and it is mentioned among the places which were allotted and fortified by Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 26; but this was only after it had been taken by Pharaoh king of Egypt, and its former occupants set to the sword. Pharaoh gave it as part of his daughter's dowry on her marriage to Solomon. It is once or twice coupled with Beth-horon, in such a way as to indicate that the places were not far distant; but the exact site of Gezer remains unknown.

GEZITES, according to the Masoretic correction and the English text, but more properly Gezrites, were a tribe dwelling somewhere in the extreme south of the territory of Judah, and mentioned among those who suffered from the incursions of David, while he dwelt in the country of the Philistines, 1 Sam. xxv. 19. Nothing further is known of them. Some would identify the name with Gerizim, but without any proper foundation.

GHOST, the English form of the German geist, or spirit; seldom used now in a religious sense except as the third person in the Trinity of the Holy Ghost. (See Holy Ghost.)

GIANTS. There are two words in Hebrew which are rendered by this term in English גזע (mophillim), and 예수님 (ophanim).

1. The mophillim are first mentioned in the antediluvian period of the world's history, and in connection with the deeds of violence which were the immediate precursors of the divine judgment. The mophillim (giants) were in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they brought forth of them, the same became mighty men which were from of old, men of renown, Gen. vi. 1. All the ancients concur in understanding as mophillim here giants, although the etymology of the word is somewhat doubtful. It is, however, most commonly derived from the causal form of the verb גוזש (mophash), to fall, hence to make to fall, to fall, fall down, persons whose gigantic strength, coupled with their fierce dispositions, caused every one to fall before them. Those who understand by the sons of God in the passage just quoted the angels (such as in the present day Delitzsch, Hoffman, Stier, Kurtz,) regard the gigantic race whose heaven-daring exploits brought on the deluge, as the offspring of the unnatural alliance between the angelic and human nature; so that the mophillim who are said to have existed in those days are only more particularly described by what follows respecting the alliances in question. This, however, is an opinion pressed into the text, rather than required by the sense of the words. Whatever might be the nature of the connections formed between the sons of God and the daughters of men (for which see Sons of God), the heroes that sprung from them appear to be distinguished from the mophillim, who are mentioned as a class regenerate to the other, yet rather superadditio nal and distinct than properly identified. And in proof of the mophillim being simply a race of men, not hybrids of a lower and higher sphere, though a race of gigantic proportions, we have the same word applied to a class of persons who lived after the deluge, and formed part of the original population of Palestine.

The spies who brought back an evil report of the land of Canaan, gave it as the climax of the difficulties it presented to their own people, the mophillim, sons of Anak, who are of the mophillim, and we were in our own eyes as grass-hoppers, and so were we in their eyes. Num. xiii. 33. To say with some of the authors above referred to, that the Anakim merely gave themselves out to be descendants of those semi angelic semi human beings, who bore the name of mophillim before the flood, and that the Israelitish spies foolishly accredited the tradition, is again to press an opinion into the text which is rather sought for than actually found there. The whole that can be legitimately gathered from the words is, that in the mind and judgment of the Israelitish spies, sons of Anak were of the giant class denominated mophillim: and if this may not in the circumstances be deemed absolutely conclusive evidence, it still is the testimony of some of the leading members of the community of Israel, and is the best we are acquainted with.

The word mophillim never occurs again in Old Testament scripture; but the sons of Anak, or the Anakim, with whom the spies identified them, are occasionally mentioned as a tall and powerful race, dwelling though only it would appear in a few families—about Hebron and some other places toward the south of the land of Canaan at the period of the conquest, Josh. xiii. 13, 2; xxii. 11. And the whole that the testimony of Scripture amounts to, as regards giants in this most distinctive sense, and in connection with this somewhat peculiar name, is, that they existed to a certain extent before the flood, having a share in the litigious proceedings that precipitated the deluge; and that they again appeared, or were held by common report to have appeared, in the giant race of the Anakim (the long necked, as the name imports), who were found by the Israelites in the south of Canaan, and by them nearly exterminated. All else regarding them is but supposition or conjecture.

2. The other word identified with giants in Old Testament scripture, mophillim, seems to have been originally a proper name, and it has even been matter of doubt whether it was of Israelite, or even Canaan, origin. In Gen. xi. 20 the Rephaim are mentioned as a distinct race, or tribes, holding possessions, along with other tribes, in the land of Canaan. At the period of the conquest, Og king of Bashan is said to have remained alone (probably meaning to the east of Jordan) of the remnant of the Rephaim, Deut. xi, and then, in proof of this connection with the Rephaim, mention is immediately made of his enormous bestowed, which was nine cubits long and four broad. The word was hence very naturally taken in a general sense for giants; and the Septuagint, though not in this passage of Deuteronomy, yet in those of Genesis, and also where the word occurs in Joshua, render it by the common word for giants (γίγαντες). But the descendants of the Philistine giants, who are elsewhere associated with the Anakim, were also called Rehobots, 2 Sam. xxii. 22; and so also were some, probably of the same stock, who dwelt about Mount Ephraim, Josh. xiii. 15. In these latter cases, the word is probably used much as a general designation for giants, yet not without respect to their family connection with an ancient race, from which they inherited their vast proportions and their martial prowess. The name originally of a tribe that were peculiarly distinguished for such properties, the word came in the course of time to be applied to those who were remarkable for properties, whether they were descended from that tribe or from some other similarly distinguished.

Beide the Anakim and Rehobots, as originally distinct tribes or families that were accounted giants, we are told also of two others that belonged substantially to the same class—the Emim and the Zuzanim, Deut. xii. 20. Tallness and strength are predicaments of these families, such as assimilated them to the Anakim; so that they were also classed with the giant races. Very little specific information is given us, either, of the races that thus distinctively bore the name of giants, or of any individuals of their number. We know that they exceeded in stature and in robustness of frame the tribes or families that dwelt around them; but distinctions of this sort are always relative; and possibly the actual size and bodily strength of the giants of Scripture did not surpass what is often found in individuals, and even in whole families in modern times. Qualities of this description, it is well known, like others of a merely physical nature, are capable of being propagated from parent to child, and even of being nurtured by proper care and precautions into higher and higher degrees of eminence. And in these rude and comparatively unsettled times, when so much depended upon personal strength and valor, and might so often proved itself to be identical with right, there was the greatest inducement for those who possessed such properties in any marked degree to cultivate them to the utmost, and render them as far as possible a hereditary distinction. In addition to the security furnished by the properties themselves, the very name they acquired for their possessors was itself a defense. But it could only be so, while the ruder stages of society lasted. As art, and skill, and mental resources of all kinds increase, more animal strength and corporeal stature come to be relatively of less avail. And so, it was only in the infancy of the world that the simply giant races could maintain the ascendency; and to that period accordingly the traditions connected with them properly belong. Their power and prestige necessarily gave way before the advance of knowledge and civilization; and nothing could more clearly show the inferiority of the one, as compared with the other, ground of stability and might, than the gradual decay and ultimate disappearance of the giant races that anciently hung around the borders of Canaan, and for a time spread far and wide the terror of their name. The settlement even of imperfectly organized communities reduced them to comparative insignificance; and the establishment afterwards by God of a commonwealth founded in truth and righteousness, left them once more without a name or a possession in the land.

2. Gibbethon [gent. place], a town originally of the Philistines, but afterwards assigned to the tribe of Dan, Josh. xvi. 29. So late as the times of Nahash and Basha, it still belonged to the Philistines; and it was while engaged there in a vigorous siege, that Basha, one of Nahash's officers, smote his master, and took possession of the throne, 1 Kings ii. 18. Nothing is known of its exact site.

Gibeath [Gib], 1. Of the places that bore this name, the most noted was called Gibeath of Benjamin, sometimes also Gibeath of Saul, 1 Sam. xiv. 8, 33, 18. It was the birth-place of Saul, and continued to be his residence after he became king, 1 Sam. xiv. 19; xv. 14. It was doubtless on this account that it was chosen as the scene of that mournful tragedy, in which seven of Saul's sons were executed together, at the suit of the Gibeni, for wrongs inflicted upon them by Saul's bloody house, and which drew forth a singularly touching manifestation of maternal tenderness on the part of Rizpah, the mother of two of the victims, 2 Sam. xvi. 7. Stanley (p. 275) would rather identify this transaction with Gibeah, from its being said that the seven men were "hung in the hill before the Lord," which seems to indicate the immediate neighbourhood of the tabernacle then standing at Gibeah. But the expression might be used with reference to the Lord's judgment in the matter: it was done as in his presence, because of the respect it had to his manifested displeasure. Gibeah had been also the scene of tragedies of a still more mournful and distressing nature at an earlier period—first in respect to the atrocity perpetrated upon the concubine of the Levite, who, on his way to Mount Ephraim, tarried there for the night; and then in respect to the bloody and destructive war which ensued between Benjamin and the other tribes, and in which seven of Saul's sons were slain. This is the event of one of the darkest spots in the records of Israel's history; and not only Gibeath, but the whole tribe of Benjamin, came by it to the very brink of destruction. By the time of Saul, however, Gibeath must have again attained to considerable prosperity and importance.

The comparative nearness of Gibeah to Jerusalem, and the notices respecting it in ancient writers, as well as Scripture, have left little doubt as to the precise hill on which it was situated. It is now called Tiel-El-Ful, the hill of the Diseases. It is distinctly seen from Jerusalem, and lies nearly right north from it, at the distance of four or five miles, on the way to Ramah and Bethel. No remains, however, exist of the ancient city, unless a confused heap of earth and stones can be called such. Even in Jerome's day the city had become a ruin: for when giving a narrative o Paul's journey, and noticing that she stopped at Gibeah, and called to mind its ancient crime, and the concave cut in pieces, he states that it was then levelled to the ground (vi. 23, add. Paterum). The hill is so situated as to command extensive views of the surrounding country, especially in the direction of the Dead Sea and the mountains on its farther side.

2. Gibeath, a town in Mount Ephraim, where the high-priest Eleazar, son of Aaron, was buried by Phinehas his son, and his son-in-law, Eleazar's English version, however, translates to Gibeah there, and says Eleazar "was buried in a hill." There was possibly no town on it at that time; but by and by there certainly appears to have been a town bearing the name; and in the Omounciation it is set down as at five Roman miles from Gophna, on the road to Shechem. Dr. Robinson sup-pposed it to have been in the Wady-el-Jib—a narrow valley about half-way between Shechem and Jerusalem. It was probably the same with what was called Gibeah in the field, Josh. xvi. 21.

Gibeon. The town appears to have been a town of this name in Judah, though only mentioned once, and with no indication of its precise locality, Josh. xvii. 27. It is supposed to have been the same with the Gibbathah of Eiseschim and Jerome, which they place at twelve miles on the way to Eclentropolis.

Gibeon [gib'e-on], one of the ancient royal cities of the Canaanites; a "great city" of the Hivites, who at an early stage of Joshua's conquests entered into a stratagem to get terms of peace for the time being. They did it by false persons, the local dry and needly in their bags, they proceeded to come from a far country, and having heard by report of the wonderful things done by Israel, they sought an alliance with them. So craftily did the Gibeonites play their part, that the chief of the congregation of Israel had agreed to the proposal before they had any suspicion of the artifice used on the occasion. It was also resolved that the covenant entered into should be religiouslv preserved; but that to mark the sense entar-tained of the conduct of the Gibeonites, a perpetual service should be laid upon them; they were to be beowers of wood and drawers of water for the tabernacle of the Lord for ever. Jos. x. Gibeon fell afterwards to the lot of Benjamin, and stood a little to the west of Gibeah, about eight or ten miles from Jerusalem.
It was also made a Levitical city; and the tabernacle was transferred thither from Nob after the slaughter of the priests, and remained for a considerable time, though without the ark, which was brought by David to Jerusalem, and placed first in a new tabernacle, and ultimately in the temple. It was Solomon at the commence ment of his reign, went to Gibeon and sacrificed a thousand burnt-offerings; where also in a dream by night he received from God an assurance of the great wisdom and prosperity that were to be given to him. We have no subsequent notice of Gibeon in Israelitish history; and almost the only earlier one we have beside those already mentioned, is what is stated of the engagement by two chosen champions on each side, between the men of David and Ahim, who all fell, each by the hand of his fellow. It was by the "Pool of Gibeon," of which remains are still said to appear, that the conflict took place, 2 Sam.

Gibeon was a place of some importance from its being the key to the pass of Beth-horon; and it probably continued during all the better times of Israelitish history to be well fortified. It has been identified with the village El-Jib. "This village stands on the top of a little isolated hill, composed of horizontal layers of limestone, here and there forming regular steps, in some places steep, and difficult of ascent and easy and wросл capable of being strongly fortified. Round it is spread out one of the finest and richest plains in central Palestine, meadow-like in its smoothness and verduro, dotted near the village with vineyards and olive-groves, and sending out branches like the rays of a star-fish among the rocky crevices that encircle it. The houses of El-Jib are scattered irregularly over the broad summit of the hill, whose sides, where not too steep, are covered with trees and terraced vineyards.

They are almost all, in whole or in part, ancient, but in a badly dilapidated state. One massive building still stands among them, and was probably a kind of chapel. The lower rooms are vaulted, the arches being somewhat circular, and of admirable workmanship. On the western side of the hill, at the foot of a low cliff, is a fine fountain, springing up in a cave excavated in the rock so as to form a large subterranean reservoir. Not far below it, among the venerable olive trees, are the remains of an open reservoir, similar to the large one at Hebron." (Perowne's Syria and Palestine, p. 228.)

Gibeonites, the remnants of the ancient inhabitants of Gibeon, have acquired an unhappy notoriety from an incidental notice recorded of them in the history of the times of David and Saul. It is said, in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah, had sought to slay them; and had declared that they were persons, though he did not succeed in utterly destroying them, resolu-rious, violating, while he did so, the covenant and oath given to their forefathers at the time of the compact.
It was in See also in the latter days of Saul that this atrocity was perpetrated, who in being forsaken of God and given up to the morbid and tormented workings of an evil spirit, his zeal took the most arbitrary and capricious directions. And it might be partly on this account that the reign of Saul was allowed to close without any special account of him, as being taken in time of any peculiar violation of judgment being sent to chastise it. But other reasons must have led to its being called into remembrance and made the ground of a proscribed famine, as it was, in the latter days of David's administration; this plainly implied that David's house and people needed to have the straitened solemnly called to the mat, and to receive from it a warning against incurring similar judgments in the time to come. Suffering under the reproach of a three years' famine, David inquired of the Lord, and found that it was "for Saul and his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites." On learning this, David left it to the Gibeonites themselves to say what they would regard as a proper satisfaction; and they demanded that seven sons of the man who had consumed them, and who had even meditated their complete extermination, should be publicly executed. David acceded to their request; and it is said that "the Lord was inclined for the land," ver it. There is not the slightest evidence for the allegation which has been sometimes made against David, that he purposely contrived or readily fell in with this device, in order to weaken the house of Saul, and place it under a darker stigma. On the contrary, David's conduct throughout to that house was in the highest degree generous and noble; and at the very time when this fresh public calamity fell on it, he took occasion to have the bones of Saul and Jonathan, along with the bones of the seven now publicly hanged, gathered together and honourably buried in the repuddle of Kish. This was not like the procedure of a man who had not many to satisfy against the fallen, and secretly rejoiced over their deeper prostration.
Indeed, David had no longer any need to be afraid of the house of Saul; for the sons of his kingdom the re-billion of Abrahaam had too clearly shown to be found near prayer; they were those of his own house. And on this account both he and they required to be admonished, by every available means of instruction, of the righteousness that every characterizes God’s administration, and which ought in a measure to be found also in that of the earthly kingdom which more peculiarly represented it. If the latter failed in this respect, judgment must infallibly come, and it might even go down from one generation to another as a descending and entailed curse; for though passing into different hands, the kingdom in Israel, as imaging the character and government of God, was still thus unsound. It was especially for the purpose of teaching these truths, and by solemn transactions in history impressing them deeply on the mind, that the circumstances now referred to were appointed by God. All must know, and in particular the reigning house in Israel must know, that God required faithfulness to covenant-engagements, and that if they violated these, their own measure must be meted to them. This is the general principle and design of what took place—both in perfect union with the divine plan, and if we knew the circumstances more fully, even the details might admit of a reasonable explanation.

GILETIES, who plunily belonged to the Phoenician territory, are understood to have been the people of Byblos, a city of the Phoenicians between Tripoli and Berytus. The Hebrews seem to have called it Gebal. “The land of the Giletis” is coupled with “all Lebanon,” as together belonging to the territory of the Israelites on the northern side. And in connection with the shipping and merchandise of Tyre, the prophet Ezekiel mentions “the ancient of Gebal” as furnishing carvers, or perhaps generally ship-carpenters, Ezek. xxvii. The Gileites are not mentioned in immediate connection with the affairs of Israel; if they did come into direct contact with these, it must have been for evil and not for good. For Byblos was the seat of the worship of the Syrian Tannam or Avon—a worship which certainly found its way, among other corruptions, into the later idolatries of the Jewish people, Deut. viii. 14, but whether directly from Byblos, or from other parts of Phoenicia, we have no means of ascertaining.

GIDEON (utter down; destroyer; called also from an action in his life, Jerubbaal, i.e. Rival of one who contends or pleads against Baal), the fifth in order of the men whom the Lord successively raised up to deliver and judge Israel. He was the son of Joash, the least, as he himself said, meaning thereby perhaps the youngest, in his father’s house, Judges vi. The house was of the tribe of Manasseh, and Joash himself with his family dwelt at Ophrah; but whether this lay in the territory of Manasseh to the east of Jordan, in the land of Gilgal, or in that to the west, has not been conclusively determined. As, however, the chief scene of Gideon’s great exploits with the Midianites was manifestly on the west of Jordan, and his future residence also on the same side, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Shechem, the probabilities undoubtedly are in favour of the supposition that both Ophrah and the family of Gideon belonged to the western division of Manasseh. Mount Gilgal, indeed, is named in connection with the movement of Gideon against Midian, but probably only as the first place of rendezvous for his army, Judges v. For the sake of security he might be obliged to assemble the people on the mountains last to the east of Jordan. Stanley (Saud and Palestine, p. 324) and others, without any authority from MSS., would substitute Gilgal for Gilead in the passage referred to. This is otherwise objectionable, as one does not see how thousands from Asher, Naphtali, and beyond Eschrenath, could have been met on Gilgal, with the Midianites lying between.

Gideon appeared on the theatre of affairs in a time of general backsliding, and when great oppression was exercised over Israel by the Midianites. So completely had this warlike Arabian race recovered from the terrible slaughter they sustained at the hand of the Israelites, shortly before the death of Moses, Num. xxxi., that now, probably about 200 years later, they had come up in progresive force and numbers, so as entirely to overpower the children of Israel. For the better accomplishment of their purpose, they had entered into league with the Amalekites and other tribes of the desert; and the united bands at last overspread the territory of Canaan with hordes of cattle and multitudes of camels, to an extent which threatened to consume the whole produce of the land. The people of Israel fled wherever they could into dens, and caves, and strongholds; they durst scarcely venture into the light of day, even to provide themselves with the means necessary for their support; and the valiant Gideon, when thrashing what for his family, had to carry on his operations beside the vine-press, instead of on the open threshing-floor, in order to escape the notice of the Midianites. Such was the position and such the employment in which he was found by the angel of the Lord, who appeared to him and said, “Jehovah is with thee, thou mighty man of valor.” It was a startling address, and one that seemed rather like a bitter irony, when viewed in connection with the existing state of affairs, than the words of solemnest and truth. Therefore Gideon replied, “Oh! say Lord, if Jehovah be with us, why then is all this befallem us? and where be all the miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not Jehovah bring us up from Egypt? But now Jehovah hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites.” The responding tone of the reply was not unnatural in the circumstances, and what followed was designed to reassure his mind, and brace him with energy and fortitude for the occasion. Jehovah, it is said—for instead of the angel of Jehovah, as formerly, it is now Jehovah himself—“Jehovah looked upon him, and said, Go in this thy might, and shall save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have I not sent thee?” Gideon still expressed his fear of the result, mentioning his own comparative insignificance, and that of his father’s family, but was again met with a word of encouragement, “Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man.”

As Gideon’s heart now began to take courage, but to make him sure that it really was a divine messenger he was dealing with, and that the commission he had received was from the Lord, he requested a sign from heaven; and it was given him in connection with an offering, which he was allowed to present, of a kid and some unleavened cakes. These the angel touched with the tip of his staff, and it presently rose out of the rack and consumed them. Immediately the angel himself disappeared, though not till he had by a word of peace quieted the mind of Gideon, which had been frightened by the thought of having seen the face of the Lord.
And now, as a preparation for the work of deliverance to which he was called, and to make it evident in whose name and might he was going to undertake it, he proceeded to do the part of a practical reformer in his father's house. The family of Jasho also had fallen under the prevailing spirit of idolatry; images of Baal and Ashtarah (improperly translated gross in ch. vi. 25, 26) were standing on his father's property; and the eating of the flesh of them during the ensuing night, Gideon cut down, and in their stead reared an altar to Jehovah, and offered on it a burnt-sacrifice. So strong was the spirit of idolatry in his father's household, and among the people of Ophrah generally, that he felt it necessary to accomplish this work of reform and sacrifice, with the help of a few chosen men, during the dead of night; and on the morrow, when they knew who had done it, they demanded of Jasho the life of his son. But Jasho, who had foolishly learned from Gideon the instruction on which he rested, refused to hear the boldly-challenging them to take up the cause of Baal, and even called upon Baal to show his power, if he had any, by avenging it himself. This seems to have had the desired effect. Jasho called his son Jurebbaal (Bad-driver), and was content to leave it to the decisions of Providence whether Gideon or Baal was to prevail in the conflict.

The matter was long in coming to an issue. The Midianites and Amaleckites, in a mighty host, had pitched in the splendid valley of Edom which, in intensive, no doubt, as heretofore, to feast themselves at pleasure on the fat of the land. But the Spirit of the Lord came on Gideon, and he blew the trumpet through Abiezer first, then throughout Manasseh, Asher, and Naphtali: and presently thousands responded to the call, and gathered themselves around him. It might have seemed as if this were enough, and that he might now proceed with a dauntless spirit to the conflict with the enemy. But the weakness and backsliding of the past still lingered in the soul of Gideon, and like an ill-concealed appari- tion, rose up and shook his resolve when water was needed for the march on the morrow. He again, therefore, cast himself on the mercy of God, and prayed, in addition to former assurance, a double sign-first, that dew might fall on a fleece while the earth remained dry, and next, that the earth might be wetted with dew while none fell upon the fleece. Both signs were granted: so that Gideon could no longer doubt he had the direction and support of Heaven on his side. But having thus tried God, he had himself in turn to be tried. Situated as Israel at the time was, too much appearance of preparation for the coming struggle was as much to be deprecated and feared as too little more; indeed, as regarded the spiritual interests at stake. It was not simply victory that they needed; but such a victory as would display the finger of Jehovah, and so magnify his power in their eyes as to shame them out of their false confidence in Baal. Therefore, since so many had assembled around the standard of Gideon, lest they should vanquish themselves, and imagine that their own hand might achieve for them a victory, Gideon was put upon measures that should reduce his effective force to a very limited number. He was first of all to proclaim that whosoever was of a fearful spirit should return; and two-thirds of the numbers who had rallied around him took advantage of the liberty which this proclamation gave them: twenty-two thousand left, and only ten remained. But even this force appeared much too great, and by another, apparently somewhat arbitrary test, it was reduced from thousands to hundreds. Gideon was ordered to bring them down to the water what water we are not told, and it is vain to conjecture, and to separate those who lapped of the water with the tongue, as a dog lapping, from those who bent down on their knees to drink. The lapping is more particularly explained by the persons who seek that method being said to put their faces to their mouth, at once. There were only three hundred of them who did so, and the Lord said to Gideon, 'By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand.' It was but a slight circumstance that marked the difference between them and the others; but still it indicated a specific quality; they were the persons that took the more expeditious method of quenching their thirst, and thereby gave proof of a readiness and alacrity which bespeaks a fitness for executing the work of prevailing at the enemy or pursuing an enemy. This affords a perfectly sufficient and natural explanation, and there is no need for resorting, as many do, to peculiar usages in the East, and most who knows anything of the manners of people in rural and highland districts, can need to be told how common it is for them, when wishing to get a hastily refresheinent at a running stream, to lift the water to their mouths in the palm of their hand, instead of leisurely bending down, or lowering themselves along to get a full draught.

The three hundred men, therefore, were given to Gideon as a select band, with which he was to put to flight the congregated forces of Midian and Amaleck. The rest were not sent home, but kept in their tents, to be ready when occasion called for them. The three hundred were divided into three companies, and each, in addition to their swords, supplied with a trumpet, and an earthen pitcher containing a lamp. The pitcher merely served to conceal the lamp, till it was necessary that this should be exhibited. It was arranged that in the dead of night the three companies should approach at three different points, and at one and the same moment, all following the example set by Gideon himself, were to break their pitchers, hold up their lamps in the one hand, and blow with their trumpets in the other so as to create the impression of their being but the advance-guard of an immense attacking force. The maneuver, employed as it was under the divine sanction, and after an encouraging visit paid to the Midianitish camp in the earlier part of the night by Gideon and his servant, had the desired effect; the enemy were struck with a sudden panic, and thrown into insatiable confusion, when thus they perceived so many lights flashing on them, and heard so many trumpets accompanied by the loud war-cry, 'The sword of the Lord (Jehovah) and of Gideon.' They fell by the sword, not merely of Gideon and his valiant little band, but also of another, not being able in the terror of the moment and the darkness of night to distinguish friend from foe. And thus a dreadful slaughter and discomfiture ensued, which was followed up on the next day and following days by a general rising of the people in the surrounding districts, who proved of great service in consummating the triumph, however disdained they might be to face the enemy in his strength. No fewer than 120,000, it is said, fell in the conflict, i.e., viz: beside what might afterwards be slain of the 15,000 that escaped, in the first instance, with Zela and Zalmonna, but were overtaken, and in a subsequent battle defeated by Gideon. "Thus," as the sacred historian remarks, "was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more." Juz. viii. 28. They never regained sufficient strength from the disaster to assume an attitude of hostility against Israel; and the references made in later writings to the victory of Gideon point to it as emphatically a day of Jehovah's right hand, in which he completely prostrated the strength of a most powerful enemy, Eee: ix. 26, xiv. 7; xxii. 3. There were, however, certain abate-ments to the honours of the day. The Ephraimites were disqualified at not having been called at the first by Gideon to take part in the enterprise, and were only quieted by his according to them the praise of having done more at the end for the common cause, than he had at the beginning, Juz. viii. 2. They should, in truth, have merited no such soothing compliment, but should rather in thoughtful silence have marked how peculiarly the hand of God had ordered as well the circumstances that preceded as those that accompanied the conflict. The men of Succoth offended in a different way; they acted a cowardly part to the last, and refused to supply Gideon and his party with a few loaves of bread, when faint with pursuing Zela and Zalmonna, the two kings of Midian, who had managed to escape. Succoth lay to the east of Jordan, at no great distance from the border of the Midianitish territory; and the men of the place, no doubt, thought that in their case discretion was the better part of valour; that it was too much to ask them openly to befriended a pursuing force, so long as such powerful neighbours as Zela and Zalmonna were still alive; nor would it seem at all likely to them that much success could attend Gideon's army, in their attempt to carry the war into the native country of the Midianites. In this case, however, as so often happens in great emergencies, worldly wisdom proved a poor substitute for a humble and reliable faith; and by the chasmine inflicted on the men of Succoth on Gideon's return, they were taught a salutary lesson, which, it may be hoped, was not without permanent advantage to them, Juz. vii. 13-18.

The results of the victory wrought by God through the instrumentality of Gideon were not such, at least, in a spiritual respect, as might have been expected. External rest followed, and lasted, it is said, for forty years, to the close of Gideon's lifetime. But the spirit of idolatry was far from being subdued, and even in Gideon's own household sprung into efflorescence during that period of outward peace and prosperity. Gideon himself behaved nobly, having refused to take the place of supreme ruler or king, when requested by the people; he said, No, "neither I nor my son shall rule over you; Jehovah shall rule over you," Juz. viii. 23. He would have no personal recompense for the services he had rendered his people, except that every one would give him the earnings of his prey; and even this, though amounting to 17,000 shekels of gold weight, he would not appropriate to his private use, but turned it into the form of an ephod—the more distinctive part of the priest's attire—and placed it in the town of Ophrah. He obviously meant it to serve as a sacred memorial of the Lord's goodness, and to point men's attentions away from himself, as the mere instrument, to Jehovah, by whose grace, and counsel, and might the work of deliverance had really been won. But the gross spirit of the times in great measure defeated this object. The golden ephod "became a snare to Gideon and to his house;" it was turned into a sort of idol. Success had also marred the simplicity of Gideon's manner, and by degrees introduced looseness and disorder into his family. He took to himself many wives and concubines, who brought him indeed a numerous offspring, there being no fewer than seventy sons; but it inevitably brought also the usual attendant of polygamy, a bower of domestic jealousies, corruptions, and miseries. The moral influence of the family ceased apparently even before Gideon himself had finished his career; for as soon as he was gone, the men of his very place and neighbourhood were ripe for a general movement in favour of idolatry, and they agreed together to make Baal-berith, that is, Baal of the covenant, their God, Juz. vii. 23. The state of the case seems to have been, that they occurred in setting up an idol to worship, and erecting an idol temple; hence, in reference to the Shechemites, we read of the house of their god Berith, Juz. ix. 14. It implied that the Israelites made a compromise with the surrounding heathenism; the object of their common worship was to be a Baal, but Baal of the covenant; not, therefore, absolutely and formally different from Jehovah, but Jehovah under a special name and character, consequently worshipped in a manner that he could not regard. Can we wonder, after such a defection, that the spirit of evil should break out, as it so soon did, with the violence of a whirlwind, in Gideon's house and among the people of Ablozer? The family, on which the sun of divine favour had for a time shone so brightly, became in the next generation a plague and a ruin, itself receiving into its bosom the vials of heaven's wrath, and in its calamities course becoming the occasion of involving multitudes around it in the same! A most striking proof in its history both how righteousness exists, and how sin becomes ruin of any people!

GIER-EAGLE [pachuv, pacham, racham, rachamim]. This word occurs only in the enumeration of birds prohibited by the law of Moses as unclean; in the former form in Le. xi. 18, in the latter in De. xiv. 17. The LXX. have rendered it "swan" (giyron) in the former case, and "hawk" (upas) in the latter. The Hebrew word ordinarily signifies hawks or crows, and commentators have sought to establish an identity with one species or another founded on the distinctive habits of the bird, but with little success. The writer of the notes in the Pictorial Bible accepts the first meaning of the LXX.; Boothroyd and Taylor, in Calcutt, will have the king-fisher to be intended.

Gire, however, has sufficiently shown that the bird must be the Egyptian vulture—Neophron percnopterus, which is abundant in the East, and is popularly called Pharaoh's chicken. But it is also well known by the name rachamath, which is literally the old Hebrew appellation. The traveller just cited considers that this name, alluding to the signification mentioned above, commemorates the fact that this vulture was sacred to Isis, and considered an emblem of parental affection. At present the bird, though horribly filthy and obscene in its habits, is held in such esteem in Egypt, that a penalty attaches to any one who kills it near the great cities. This probably is only for its uselessness as a scavenger. The Neophron enjoys a wide geographical range, since it occurs over the whole of Asia, Europe, and Africa. It has even been taken in England and in Norway. It is rather a conspicuous bird; for the plumage is wholly white, except a band of black across each wing: the head, naked face, legs and feet are yellow.

GILPH [properly, a broad, rocky region; but by a slight change in the pronunciation, called, it might signify keep of olives], the name given by Jacob to the heap of stones erected by him on a memorable occasion, Genesis 33. 1. A district east of the Jordan, which included the towns of Beth, Jazer, and Jabesh. Its limits cannot be, and probably never were, strictly defined, and the name seems sometimes to have been applied to the whole Transjordanian country. Its mountains are to be seen from nearly all the hills and table-lands of western Palestine, and seem to form an unbroken ridge bounding the view to the eastward.

To the pilgrim at the sacred sites, and the traveller in the Holy Land, they are the limits of his knowledge, as the Mediterranean was to the Jews, as the Atlantic was to Europe in the middle ages, as the Libyan hills are to the traveler on the Nil. But on approaching them the unbroken appearance of their outline vanishes, and when their summits (2000 or 3000 feet above the Jordan valley) are reached, there opens out a wide table-land tossed about in wild confusion of undulating downs, clothed with rich grass and with magnificent forests of sycamore, beech, terebinth, ilex, and enormous fig trees. These downs are broken by three deep defiles, through which there fall into the Jordan the three rivers of the jarmuk, the jablok, and the Arnon; the latter however is south of the limits of Gilead as generally understood. On the east they melt away into the vast red plain which, by a gradual descent, joins the level of the plain of the Hauran and of the Assyrian desert. The whole of this vast country, being well adapted for pasture, was granted to the Rebubites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh; after it had been won from Sihon king of the Amorites and Og the king of Bashan, Joshua xii, 21. 32. Gilead in its proper sense fell partly to the lot of Gad, partly to Manasseh. Their boundary cannot be accurately laid down, further than that Gad seems to have stuck to the south and west by the Jordan as far north however as the Sea of Chinneroth, Joshua xiii, 27, and Manasseh to the north and east as far south as Mahanaim. The forests and pastures of Gilead seem to have kept alive in its inhabitants that wild and nomadic character which was soon lost by the tribes to the west of the Jordan, while its exposure to the attacks of external enemies nurtured their warlike spirit, and its isolation from the rest of the Holy Land kept them in the background of the history of God's people. At different times too remarkable men suddenly appeared from its forests, Jephthah, the victorious captain, the performer of his rash vow; Elijah the Tishbite, the bold reprover of Ahaz, the asceter of God's honour, the sole antagonist of Baal's four hundred prophets on Mount Carmel. The wildness of the region whose name must have had a similar effect upon the western Ischadites, as had his strange appearance and the accounts they heard of his miraculous nourishment by ravens, of his raising the widow's son, and of his running before Ahaz's chariot from Carmel to Jezreel. In his country too was Gideon, the frontier town, so often taken and retaken by the Syrians, and at last the scene of Ahab's death, as foretold by the prophet.

At other times Gilead comes before us for a moment as it were in the sacred history. It was the scene.
of the crisis of Jacob's life, when, no longer an outcast and a slave, he returned the independent chieftain of a numerous and wealthy tribe to the land of his fathers. For here on Mount Gilgal he finally parted with Laban, who had long deceived and oppressed him, and had pursued him hither from Padan-Aram. At Mahanaim he overheard the inheritance of his descendants, and meditated on his changed fortunes. "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." Here also the angels of God met him, sent no doubt as a support in his trial, and as an earnest of the Almighty's protection. At Peniel took place that mysterious wrestling in prayer, when he received his new name of Israel, the "wrestler with God," more suitable to his altered prospects than Jacob, the supplieate; and thus by converse with God, he prepared for the last trial of this period of his life the doubled meeting with Laban. At Succoth, where he built him a house, and made hedges for his cattle, we trace a further step in his history—the transition from the wandering to the settled agricultural life. (Gen. xxxii. xxxiii.)

On another occasion we are brought back to Gilgal at the time of David's second trial, when he fled to Mahanaim from Absalom, who was defeated and slain in the neighbouring forest of Ephraim. On two special occasions also did the Transjordanic hills afford a safe retreat to God himself from his foes and their dangers in Galilee and Judah. Thither he probably retired after his baptism; thither also in the interval of danger which immediately preceded the end of his earthly course, (Jos. xii. 13.) And these too were the mountains "whither, in obedience to their Master's prophetic bidding, the Christians fled from the siege of Jerusalem, and found at Pella a refuge from the calamities which befell their countrymen."

The balm of Gilgal seems to have been valued for its medicinal properties from the earliest times. The Midianitish merchants to whom Joseph was sold were passing through the valley of Jezreel on their way from Gilgal to Egypt, (Gen. xxxvii.) Josephine often mentions this balm or balsam, but generally as the product of the rich plain of Jericho, for example (Antiq. vii. 1.) "Now when Pompey had pitched his camp at Jericho where the palm-tree grows and that balsam which is an ointment of all the most precious, which upon an incision being made in the wood with a sharp stone discharges out thence like a juice, he marched in the morning to Jerusalem." Dr. Thomson found in the plain of Jericho some thorn bushes called the zakoura, which is like the crab-apple tree, and bears a small nut, from which a kind of liquid balsam is made, and sold by the men as balm of Gilgal so famous in ancient times, and he supposed "that the balm which Jacob sent to Joseph, (Gen. xxxvii. 11.) and that which Jerahmeel, (ib. xii. 22.) refers to for its medicinal qualities, were the same which the trading Ishmaelites were transporting to Egypt, and that it was some resinous extract from the forest trees of Gilgal" (The Land and the Book, p. 167). (Gen. v. 2.)

2. Gilgal. A Gilgal is mentioned in Jn. vii. 5, in connection with the movements of Gilboa, which must have been some place or mountain, not on the east, but on the west of Jordan, and probably in the territories of Naphtali or Zebulon. Some have supposed that Gilgal (גילה) is a corruption of the text for Gilboa. But the MSS. give no countenance to this; and in the present state of the evidence, the natural supposition is, that a Gilgal of some sort, though otherwise unknown, existed near the scene of Gibbon's operations.

3. Gilgal. Two persons are mentioned as bearing this name—a son of Machir, (Num. xxxi. 27.) and the father of Jehoshaphat, (1 Chron. ii. 7.)

Gilgal (גילה, גילה). 1. The place, whether town, or as is more probable, open space, on which Israel made their first encampment after crossing the Jordan, (Num. xii. 25.) It is simply described as being "in the east corner of Jericho." It is placed by Josephus at the distance of ten stadia, or little more than a mile from Jericho, and about five times as much to the west of the Jordan (Antiq. vi. 13, 14.) It is expressly called a hill or rising-ground, (Jos. xi. 12.) and there, resting a little, the host of Joshua performed the rite of circumcision and partook of the passover, before they entered on the work of conquest. It was in regard to the work of circumcision that the place obtained its future name: "And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Therefore the name of the place is called Gilgal into this day," (Jos. vii. 5.) It has been made a question, whether the administration of circumcision should have been called rolling away the reproach of Egypt; whether the reproach had respect simply to their previous uncircumcision condition, or to their condition otherwise, as connected with and indicated by the suspension of circumcision. The latter seems decidedly the preferable view. For, in the first place, the simple fact of circumcision having ceased to be administered during the wilderness sojourn, could scarce have been so generally known in Egypt as to become a matter of reproach there against Israel. The Egyptians had no means of knowing whether it was practised or not. Then, even if it had been known, one does not see how it should have been, as a mere fact, turned into a reproach; because there is no evidence to show that the Egyptians as a people in any way identified their national honour with the rite, nor is it certain that the practice was ever by any means universal, except among the priesthood. Origen speaks of it as confined to them (Hom. iv. 1 John., and Clement of Alexandria merely adds those who sought admission to the mysteries (Strom. i. 13.5, p. 192.) It is chiefly on a misunderstanding of the passage before us, coupled with a general statement of the evangelists (Matt. viii. 2.) as to the general practice of circumcision among the Egyptians, that the absolute and stringent univer- sality of it there has been affirmed. (See, for example, Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, p. 257; Ritse's Cyclopaedia, art. Circumcision.) Besides, if the simple disuse of the ordinance had him so long upon Israel as a reproach, one must say it was very needlessly borne, since it could have been removed any time during the forty years; almost anywhere they could have halted long enough for the purpose. In reality it had been done, when for the command to circumcise was now given to Joshua, it came as an order to "circumcise them again, the second time," (Jos. v. 2.) The former time would doubtless be when they lay encamped around Siani, so that the forty years of discontinuance mentioned could not be absolutely forty; the term is used in a general way for the period of the wilderness sojourn. When leaving Sinai and marching toward Canaan, the administration of the ordinance required to be suspended for a time, on account of the incessant movements to and fro. But when, for their wars of faith and frequent backslidings, the people were doomed to continue in the wilderness for nearly forty years longer, as this was a suspension of the covenant itself, so the ordinance, which was its more peculiar badge and seal, was fitly suspended too. Not from any external difficulty in practicing it, but as a sign of their humbled and dishonoured condition, was it henceforth allowed to fall into abeyance by the lawgiver. Hence it is expressly connected here with their having disbelieved God's voice, and losing in consequence the fulfilment of the great promise of the covenant, ver. 6. This was emphatically the reproof of Egypt, viz, the reproach of having been led out of Egypt with high hopes of future advancement, which had not been realized. It was precisely such a reproach which Moses dreaded, and which led him on one occasion to say, "When for toil should the Egyptians speak and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth." Ex. xxiv. 12. Now that they had become again a circumcised people, by the express command of God, the portal bar was taken off; they were acknowledged by him as in the proper sense his covenant-people, in whose behalf he was ready to execute the word on which he had caused their fathers to hope. Thus, no longer should Egypt have occasion to taunt them with having been circumcised with false expectations and promises; being unfurnished. The deed at Gilgal terminated the period of shame, and commenced a holier era (see ch. xxiv. 4-8.

2. Gilgal, from which Elijah and Eliza went down to Bethel, ch. xix. 9, was apparently a different place from that just noticed for, had it been meant, the passage from the one place to the other could never have been represented as a descent, Bethel being upwards of four miles above the banks of the Jordan. There must therefore have been a Gilgal somewhere in the district of Bethel, and at a higher elevation than it, of which the remains are supposed to have been found in certain ruins, bearing the name of Jilqah or Jilqah, situated a few miles to the north of the ancient Bethel (Robinson, in p. 157).

3. Gilgal, not far from Shechem, beside the plains of Moreh, Josh. xxiv. 12. This may, however, have been the same with the immediately preceding; but it is impossible to decide with certainty. The passage in Joshua speaks of the nations or peoples of Gilgal, whose king fell under the hand of Joshua; implying that it was a place of some importance at the time of the conquest, and formed a centre to several tribes in the neighbourhood.

GILLOH, a town situated somewhere in the hill-country of Judah, and known simply as the birthplace of Ahihophel, 2 Sam. xv. 12. In Josh. xv. 51, it is mentioned along with Debir and E Church; but hitherto no traces have been found of it.

GIRDLE, an article of dress, of such importance in the East, worn both by men and women. Its several nature and use, as well as the spiritual application made of it in Scripture, have been described under Dress. It is enough to indicate here a few leading points. For persons in plain attire the girdle was very commonly of leather; but was also not infrequently made of linen, and sometimes highly ornamented with embroidery, and even with gold, silver, and precious stones. Of this costlier sort presents were often made, 2 Sam. xvii. 11. Its chief use was for binding up the loose and flowing garments that were worn alike by both sexes, so as to admit of their moving with more freedom, and addressing themselves to active employment.

Hence to girdle or girdle up the loins, was a common expression for putting one's self in readiness for any service that might be required, as in ch. xxv. 10. Daggers were usually stuck in the girdle; but the sword was sometimes at least suspended by a belt thrown over the shoulder, as in xiv. 22. p. 167. Among other incidental purposes served by the girdle, it was so held as frequently to supply the wants of a strip curtain.

The girdle of the priests had a name of its own (palliais), and was in various respects peculiar. (See PRIEST, CLOTHING, etc.)

GIRGASHITES, one of the tribes who inhabited Canaan before the conquest of the land under Joshua. The name frequently occurs, xvi. 18; xx. 12; xxi. 14, Josh. xi. 1; xxia. 1; but always in connection with the names of other tribes; and it is altogether doubtful to what districts of the land their possessions should be assigned. They are generally associated with the neighbourhood of the Sea of Galilee; but it rests on no solid grounds, and without intimates that nothing was known of them in his time but the name (A.V. 6:23).

GITTITES, men of Gath, six hundred of whom attached themselves to David, and became part of his body-guard, 2 Sam. xix. 15. It has been supposed by some, that they were the six hundred men who had followed David to Gath, 1 Sam. xvii. 20 (see CHERITHITES); but it is rather against this view, that Bithi, who appears to have been their leader, is called "a stranger and an exile," xvi. 29. There can be little doubt, however, that if natives of Gath, they submitted to circumcision, and became Israelites in faith and worship, though they were strangers by birth. Obadiah is called a Gittite, 2 Sam. xvi. 10, but as he was a Levite, this must have arisen either from his having had some accidental connection with Gath, or perhaps more probably from his being a native of Gath-rimon, a Levitical city.

GITTITH, a term occurring in the titles of some of the Psa. Mers, probably the name of a particular kind of musical instrument: (See PSALMS.)

GLASS. There remains no longer any doubt as to the remote antiquity of the manufacture of glass, it was beyond all question one of the arts practised in ancient Egypt, and from the paintings of Beni Hasson, exhibited, it is supposed, during the reign of the first Ottoman and his immediate successors - that is, from sixteen to fourteen hundred years before the Christian era-representations have been found of the subject.
The subjoined are given by Wilkinson (vol. iii., p. 60), exhibiting two sets of glass-blowers: and as the glass at the end of the blow-pipe was painted green, no doubt, as Wilkinson remarks, can exist as to the intention of the artist.

There is other evidence, however, of the antiquity of the art; for images of glazed pottery, belonging to much the same period, covered with a vitrified substance of the same quality as glass, have been discovered in the monuments; and beads and other ornaments of glass have been found, glass vases and bottles also, considered to be of a remote antiquity. Various glass articles have been excavated from the ruins of Pompeii though the glass, it is believed, had been of inferior quality, and adapted to few of the purposes to which it is now applied. This may have been so at Rome:

and in Europe generally; for it was in Egypt and Phcenicia, and more especially in Egypt, that the art was cultivated in early times, and brought in some of its branches to a very high degree of perfection. In Egypt they had the advantage, not only of an earlier application to the art, but also of a peculiar earth, which appears to have been necessary to the production of some of the more valuable and brilliant kinds of glass; hence a great part of the glass were used at Rome about the Christian era and subsequently came from Alexandria; and the emperor Hadrian was presented by an Egyptian priest with some vases, which were reckoned so fine that they were produced only on grand occasions (Strabo, lxxxii.; Vopiscus in Vitr., iii., c. 9).
Winckelmann has given it as his opinion, that "the ancients carried the art of glass-making to a higher degree of perfection than ourselves," and Wilkinson states respecting the Egyptians, "Such was their skill in the manufacture of glass, and in the mode of staining it of various colors, that they contrived to suc-sess the anatlist and other precious stones, and even arrived at an excellence in the art which their successors have been unable to retain, and which our European workmen, in spite of their improvements in other branches of this manufacture, are still unable to imitate.
For not only do the colours of some Egyptian epiqque glass offer the most varied devices on the exterior, dis-transparency. Hence, glass was not applied in ancient times to windows; when these were not, as they commonly were in the East, simply open apertures by day, with wooden doors placed on them by night, a kind of semi-transparent stone, a sort of paste, called \[\textit{opus sacer-basius},\] was generally used, and continued to be so for centuries after the Christian era. Nor was glass in ancient times, so far as we know, ever applied to the production of mirrors. These were made of some sort of metal—the larger and more expensive ones of silver, and those in more common use of what is denominated bras, though it is understood to have been a compound of copper and tin, not copper and zinc, which are the real ingredients in brass. Hence the hiver for the tabernacle was made of the looking-glasses which had belonged to the priests women who stately attended upon the serdices of the sanctuary, &c. xxxviii. 18. Hence also Job the sly is spoken of as being spread out "like a moth looking glass," xxiii. 18. And in 1 Co. viii. 12,

"for now we see through a glass darkly (\textit{de adi diaire}, in a mystery)"-though nothing is implied as to the substance composing the glass, yet it seems best to understand the apostle as speaking of glass in the same sense as where the word is elsewhere used, 2 Co. iii. 13;
Ta. 1, 23, &c., that is, of glass in the sense of mirror, reflecting, though somewhat dimly and imperfectly (more so in ancient times than now), the objects exhibited in
it. To the eye of the spectator such objects appear to be seen through the glass, on its farther side, and with a degree of darkness or mystery corresponding to the imperfection of the instrument employed. God’s Word is a mirror of this sort in respect to spiritual and divine things, in which and through which, as it were, the eye of faith can apprehend them, yet imperfectly, as in the far distance and amid a haze of dimness and obscurity. This is the only meaning of the passage that appears to be justified by the state of ancient art. Wetstein and Schöttgen have sought to establish another meaning by such rabbinical utterances as the following: “All the prophets saw through a dark glass, Moses through a bright glass” — which, if it have reference to window-glass, or any substance used instead, must have contemplated a state of things long posterior to the gospel age. The other interpretation therefore must be acquitted in as the more natural and certain; the rather so, as in the second epistle to the Corinthians, the apostle has again connected the gospel with glass in the sense of a reflecting mirror.

GLASS, or MIRROR. So Looking-Glass.

GLEANING. The right of the poor to glean after the reapers in harvest and in the vintage was one of the merciful provisions of the law of Moses, Ex. xxiii. 10.; 19. How it was carried out by the latter part of the covenant people is beautifully exhibited in the history of Ruth.

GLEDE (גלאד, read). The name of some unclean bird prohibited in De. xiv. 15. The only passage in which the word occurs is in the parallel list in Lev. xi. 19., where the word גלאד, gled, a verb in similar connection, which our version renders colure. The great similarity between the letters ג and כ renders it highly probable that these two terms represent one and the same word. At all events the LXX., and the Vulgate render both by the same term, the former by γλαῦτων, the vulture, the latter by µελίτας, the kite. Each term presents us with a good etymology, κόννωσις expressing vision, δύσαλος flight. The vultures and the kites are pre-eminent for fleetness of wing and for piercing sight; and we may be tolerably sure that one of these genera is intended. Under these circumstances there is no need to change the English rendering.

The kite (Milvus aegyptius) is spread over the whole of Europe, Western Asia, and North Africa. In England it is much more rare than formerly, though still a well-known bird. In some districts it retains the old Saxon name of glede, which alludes to its smooth and gliding flight. This, owing to its great length of wing and deeply-forked tail, is performed with the slightest possible apparent exertion. “Occasionally it soars in circles, with its rudder-like tail by its inclination governing the curve, then soars and remains stationary for a time, the tail expanded widely, and, with its long wings, simulating its flight, apparently from the extent of surface the bird is able to cover” (Varley’s British Birds, i. 99). Sir William Jardine describes it as everywhere a fine accessory to the landscape; one of the most harmonious appendages of the forest — its graceful flight and sailing gyrations heightening the effect of some dark and craggy forest scene in the Scottish Highlands, and breaking the quiet by its sudden and peculiarly shrill shriek.

The prey of the glede consists of small quadrupeds, birds, and reptiles, and is generally taken on the ground by a sudden pounce.

GLORY is, perhaps, more variously used in Scripture than in most other writings; yet its scriptural meanings are not quite so manifold and arbitrary as they have sometimes been represented. For example, it has been supposed that this word, or its synonym in the original, has been occasionally used as a designation of the Holy One, the supposed seat of the emotions, especially of the more powerful emotions anger and love. This meaning has been attributed to it as used by Isaiah, respecting Solomon and Levi: “With them, my glory, and my delight, I will rejoice” (Is. xxvii. 1). Others, in this last passage, and in Ps. livii. 8., “Awake up, my glory,” Ps. cviii. 1., “I will sing and give praise, even with my glory,” have understood it of the tongue, as the most honourable member of the body. But there is no ground for such explanations. The glory meant by the psalmist is but another word for the heart or soul; the seat of emotion, and feeling, and will, and as such the glory of man is a living and rational nature. Indeed, in all the applications of the word, one can easily trace the fundamental idea involved in it. Properly it is the exercise and display of what constitutes the distinctive excellence of the subject of which it is spoken; thus, in respect to God, his glory is the manifestation of his divine attributes and perfections, or such a visible efficiency as indicates the possession and presence of these, 1. xiii. xvii. 18., 19. 22., 23., 1. xlv. 11., 12., xvi. 5., 6., 1. lxv. 12. In respect to man, his glory is found in the things which discover his honourable estate and character, such as wisdom, righteousness, superiority of position, or that outward magnificence which is expressive of what, in the lower sphere, bespeaks the high position of its possessor. So many examples occur of such applications of the word glory in Scripture, that it is needless to point to individual cases. But it is also, and by a very natural extension, used for the property or possession itself, which tends to thrust around its subject a halo of glory, or in some respect to crown it with honour; as when the glory of man is identified with his soul; the glory of Lebanon with its trees, 1. xcv. 9. the glory of herbs with the beauty of their flower, 1. xxvii. 10. the glory of God with his infinite perfections, and especially with his pure and unchanged righteousness, 1. iii. xlvii. 8. In this last sense God is the glory of his people, Jer. xii. 11., Zech. ii. 13., because he is the living root and spray of all that distinguishes them for good; and they are his glory in the other sense, as xiii. 6.

KID, a small two-winged fly, only too well known in all climates for its venomous assaults on man and beast. There are many species, distinguished by the generic name Calliphora, but all having a similar con formation and similar habits. The species found in foreign countries are generally known as musquitoes; but mosquitoes and gnats are the same thing.

The weapon with which the gnat makes its attack is a long and slender proboscis, which projects from the mouth like a fine bristle, appearing to the naked eye quite simple. Under the magnifying power of the microscope, however, it is seen to be a flexible sheath of six distinct pieces, two of which are cutting blades, or lancets, two matched like a saw with reverted teeth, a tubular canal, and the central one an excessively acute point which is also tubular. When the attack is made, the gnat brings the tip of the organ within its sheath to press upon the skin, into which it presently enters, the sheath remaining without, and bending into an angle as the lancets descend. When the weapon has penetrated to its base—a distance of one-sixth of an inch or more—the lancets move laterally, and thus cut the flesh on either side, promoting the flow of blood from the superficial vessels; at the same moment a highly irritating fluid is poured into the wound, which has the effect of diluting the blood, and thus of rendering it more capable of flowing up the skinner central tube into the throat of the insect. It then sucks, if undisturbed, till its stomach is filled to repletion, leaving a painful tumour accompanied with an intolerable itching. It is the female gnat alone which is noxious; the male, whose proboscis is feathered, has no power of sucking blood.

In low and leisurely parts of our own country the gnat is an intolerable plague; but those who have visited the unfrequented regions and forests of other lands are aware how much more formidable are the gouts there. Dr. Clarke, travelling in the Crimea, tells us that the bodies of himself and his companions, in spite of gloves, clohes, and handkerchiefs, were rendered one entire wound, and the consequent irritation and swelling excited a considerable degree of fever. In a most sultry night, when not a breath of air was stirring, exhausted by fatigue, pain, and heat, he sought shelter in his carriage; and though almost suffocated, could not venture to open a window for fear of the mosquitoes. Swarms nevertheless found their way into his hiding-place; and in spite of the handkerchiefs with which he had bound up his head, filled his mouth, nostrils, and ears. In the midst of his torment he succeeded in lighting a lamp, which was extinguished in a moment by such a prodigious number of these insects, that their currents actually filled the glass chimney, and formed a large conical heap over the burner. The noise they make in flying cannot be conceived by persons who have only heard gnats in England. It is to all that hear it a most fearful sound (Dr. Clarke's Travels, 200). A traveller in Morocco feehingly complains, that notwithstanding the weariness of a journey of fifty miles, he could take no repose for the terrible musquitoes, and that his face and hands appeared, from their stings, as if he were suffering from the most virulent sort of smallpox (Jackson's Memoirs, 31). In America the Indians are said to pass the night buried in sand, the head only exposed, which they cover, though most imperfectly, with a handkerchief (ibid).

Nor are the coldest climates exempt from these minute pests. In Lapland the prodigious swarms are compared to snow-storms when the flakes fill the air, or to the clouds of dust raised by the wind. The miserable natives cannot take a mouthful of food, or lie down to sleep in their huts, except in an atmosphere of smoke that almost suffocates them as well as the musquitoes. In the open air it is rarely possible to open the mouth without inhaling dozens of them, and meats and drinks are presently blackened by the alighting crowds.

In Palestine and the surrounding regions these insects are sufficiently numerous to be a great annoyance to the inhabitants. Herodotus tells us that the inhabitants of the lower parts of Egypt were accustomed to obtain a certain degree of immunity from them by sleeping under the cover of a net used for fishing. Much doubt has been thrown upon his meaning by those who could not conceive how the coarse meshes of a fishing-net could keep off insects so minute. But some curious observations of Mr. Spence made in Italy go to prove that, from whatever cause, certain flies will not pass through a window across which threads are placed, though far wider apart than the breadth of their own bodies.

 Gnats were placed by the law among unclean animals; and because the custom of straining liquids to stop the flies from them the bodies of such insects accidentally immersed. The Lord Jesus alludes, Matt. xxiii. 21, to the practice, in reproving the hypocrisy of those who, zealous about the minute punctilios of the law, neglected its weightier matters—judgment, mercy, and faith: "Ye blind guides! which strain out [for so it should be], not stain out of a gnat, and swallow a camel." They would take great pains to avoid transgressions as minute as a gnat, while they could swallow without scruple sins as vast as a camel. The reproof is not altogether obsolete even in our days. [Pil. c.]

GOAT [py., πίγ. attul. πίγγ. tenip. πιγ. altir.
pig. tibsh. Kin. πίγ. god]. Of these terms attul, tenipir, and tibsh are used to signify the he-goat, the first being the ordinary appellation, while tenipir and tibsh are used in the same sense more rarely; κι is also an ordinary word, often rendered "goat" in the general, but always implying the she-goat, as in the phrase "a kid of the goats," or "an he-goat of the goats” (Heb.), so’t signifies hairy, and may be considered a descriptive appellation, like the Latin soricis for a horse.

From very remote antiquity goats have formed an important part of pastoral wealth in the East. They are not mentioned by name in the enumeration of Abram’s possessions, Gen. xxxi. 26, nor in those of Job, Job xxxiii. 29, but perhaps they are included under the generic term of “beasts,” which Lot, Gen. xix. 16, and, it appears, Abram possessed; and a she-goat formed part of the sacrifice offered by Abram on the occasion of the promise of Isaac, Gen. xvii. 1.

In the account of the miraculous increase of Jacob’s cattle, Gen. xxxiii. 12, we find mention of attalin, which though rendered in the English version ren, doubtless means hogs, as everywhere else, and as appears by a comparison with ch. xxxii. 32, of sept., where the part-coloured are goats and the brown sheep, these being the exceptions to the general rule, the goats being commonly black and the sheep white.

The goat was used, together with the sheep and ox, for those sacrifices of blood which prefigured the offering up of the Lord Jesus. The paschal “lamb,” might, at the pleasure or convenience of any father in Israel, have been a kid: “Ye shall take it out from the sheep, or from the goats,” Ex. xii. 5. The burnt-offering might be “of the sheep or the goats,” Lev. i. 10; the peace-offering might be “a goat,” Lev. vi. 12; the sin-offering “a kid of the goats,” male, Lev. vi. 27, or female, ver. 2, and the trespass-offering the same, ver. 6. The goat plays a prominent part in that very remarkable ceremony by which the transfer of the guilt of the believer to Christ, and his bearing it away beyond the recognition of God, is represented—the scape-goat. Here two goats were taken from the flock and presented before the Lord: one was then slain and his blood carried within the vail; the high priest then put his hands on the head of the other goat and confessed all the iniquities of Israel: “He will put his hands upon the head of the goat;” which was then sent away into the uninhabited wilderness, and there let go, Lev. xvi.

In the domestic economy of the pastoral peoples of the East the goat has always been of great value. The flesh of the adult is rank and unfit for food, but that of the kid is excellent. It was with “two kids of the goats” that Rebekah made the inviting venison with which Isaac was deceived—“savoury meat such as he loved,” Gen. xxvi. 31. In the law it was repeatedly forbidden to “seethe a kid in its mother’s milk,” Ex. xxii. 26; a prohibition the reason for which has greatly puzzled commentators. The most likely reason that has been assigned is, that such a practice existed as an idola trous rite. Edward words that in an old Kanaite commentary on the Pentateuch, he met with the statement that it was a custom with the ancient idolaters at the ingathering of their fruits to take a kid and seethe it in the milk of its dam, and then to go about and sprinkle with the broth their trees, fields, and gardens in a magical manner, under the impression that by this process they insured their fruitfulness in the ensuing year. Spencer also mentions a similar rite as in use among the Zabians. It is a remarkable corroboration of this view, which seems more probable than any of the others, that this command is first mentioned, Ex. xxii. 26, in immediate, but otherwise unintelligible connection with the laws concerning the season of ingathering, and the bringing of the first-fruits to the house of the Lord (Pictorial Bible on N. xiv. 20).

The “milk of the flock” was doubtless largely derived from the she-goats. From a passage in the Proverbs, ch. xxxiii. 27, it would seem that goats’ milk was an important source of profit, as well as an object of domestic consumption. “The lamb are for thy clothing, and the goats are the price of the field; and thou shalt have goats’ milk enough for thy food, for the food of thy household, and for the maintenance of thy household.”

The former of these statements recalls a phrase familiar to the ears of those who have travelled among the peasants in Ireland, where the pig is pre-eminently the domestic animal. “Tis he that pays the rent.” And the latter may receive illustration from the observations of Dr. Kitto, who, speaking of Palestine and the contiguous countries, says, “From the beginning of April to September the towns are supplied with milk by large herds of goats, which pass through the streets every morning and are milked before the houses of the customers. The produce from the milk is consumed in abundance at the same season. Butter and cheese are, among the nomades who principally supply the towns, made of goats’ and sheep’s milk, although cows’ milk is also used in the towns. It may be had fresh through the season, so may kebabiêt, which has some resemblance to Devonshire cream. And, above all, there is keba, a Scripture name for the same thing—our buttermilk, which forms the principal beverage of the Arabs, and is much used in their dishes. Large quantities are also consumed in the towns. The season lasts it makes up a great part of the food of the poorer classes; it is also served up at all tables, either in small bowls by itself, or mixed up with salad herbs, and is sometimes poured over the roast meat and ragouts.”

Kebab from the milk of the buffalo is also much esteemed. These things are brought to the towns from the villages and the camps of the wandering tribes. The scriptural name of kebab is still applied to fresh milk, as that of keba to dried Kitto’s Pictorial, p. 110.

The skin of the goat was, and is, used to make the bottles which are so often alluded to in the sacred Scriptures. Resplendent as the custom appears to our taste, all the oriental nations, particularly such as are nomads in their habits, keep their water, milk, wine, and other liquors, in skin bottles. “These leather bottles are made of goat-skins. When the animal is killed, they cut off its feet and its head, and they draw it in this manner out of the skin without opening the belly. They afterwards sew up the places where the legs were cut off, and the tail, and when it is killed they tie it about the neck. These nations and the country of Persia never go a journey without a small leathern bottle of water hanging by their side like a strip. The great leathern bottles are made of the skin of the goat, and the small ones, that serve instead of a bottle of water on the road, are made of a kid's skin (compris). These bottles are frequently rent when old and much used, and are capable of being repaired by being bound up.

Goats' hair is enumerated among the articles contributed by the Bedouins in the wilderness for the construction of the tabernacle, Ex. xxx. It was spun by the women, Ex. xx. 25, and formed into curtains for the covering of the edifice, Ex. xxx. xi. “All work of goats' hair” is mentioned, Ex. xxx. 26, in such a connection as implies that the manner, arrangements, or furniture of the warriors that had fought against Midian were made of this material. And we read of a “pillow of goats' hair” in David's bed, 1 Sam. vi. 1; either stuffed with goats' hair, or more probably the pillow-case (or what with us would be the felúd) woven of the finer hair of the goat.

There are several breeds of goats which have been cultivated and preserved with great care from time immemorial in the East, the hair of which is used in the formation of textile fabrics. One of the most celebrated is the Angora goat, whose hair is very long and of a silky fineness. The goat-herds of Asia Minor are said to bestow much labour on their charge, frequently washing and combing their fleece, which has their delicacy and degenerate in another climate. Then there is the Syrian goat, which Lamhems made a distinct species under the name of Capra mamelonia, remarkable for its long pendulous ears, its convex (and therefore sheep-like) face, and its ample, long, and usually coarse hair. This race is generally black, and the Bolognesi commonly make their tents of a coarse cloth woven from their hair. To this the bride in the Song alludes, when she describes herself as black, like the tents of Kebar, while the bridegroom gracefully compares her rather to the curtains of Solomon. For the passage should probably be thus read:

Beck. —I am black.
Bolognese. —But comely
Beck. —As the tents of Kebar.
Bolognese. —As the curtains of Solomon.

If the latter were woven of the fine shawl-wool of the Thibet or Cashmere goat, it would make the turn of the comparison the more elegant.
